There is a remarkable amount of evidence of excessive volcanism during the decline of the Wisconsin ice cap.[26] Far to the south of the frozen Alaskan mucks, thousands of prehistoric animals and plants were mired, all at once, in the famous La Brea tar pits of Los Angeles. Among the creatures unearthed were bison, horses, camels, sloths, mammoths, mastodons and at least seven hundred sabre-toothed tigers.[27] A disarticulated human skeleton was also found, completely enveloped in bitumen, mingled with the bones of an extinct species of vulture. In general, the La Brea remains ('broken, mashed, contorted, and mixed in a most heterogeneous mass'[28]) speak eloquently of a sudden and dreadful volcanic cataclysm.[29]

Similar finds of typical late Ice Age birds and mammals have been unearthed from asphalt at two other locations in California (Carpinteria and McKittrick). In the San Pedro Valley, mastodon skeletons were discovered still standing upright, ungulfed in great heaps of volcanic ash and sand. Fossils from the glacial Lake Floristan in Colorado, and from Oregon's John Day Basin, were also excavated from tombs of volcanic ash.[30]

Although the tremendous eruptions that created such mass graves may have been at their most intense during the last days of the Wisconsin, they appear to have been recurrent throughout much of the Ice Age, not only in North America but in Central and South America, in the North Atlantic, in continental Asia, and in Japan.[31]

It is difficult to imagine what this widespread volcanism might have meant for people living in those strange and terrible times. But those who recall the cauliflower-shaped clouds of dust, smoke and ash ejected into the upper atmosphere by the eruption of Mount Saint Helens in 1980 will appreciate that a large number of such explosions (occurring sequentially over a sustained period at different points around the globe) would not only have had devastating local effects but would have caused a severe deterioration in the world's climate.

Mount Saint Helens spat out an estimated one cubic kilometre of rock and was small-scale by comparison with the typical volcanism of the Ice Age.[32] A more representative impression would be the Indonesian volcano Krakatoa, which erupted in 1883 with such violence that more than 36,000 people were killed and the explosion was heard 3000 miles away. From the epicentre in the Sunda Strait, tsunamis 100 feet high roared across the Java Sea and the Indian Ocean, carrying steamships miles inland and causing flooding as far away as East Africa and the western coasts of the Americas. Eighteen cubic kilometres of rock and vast quantities of ash and dust were pumped into the upper atmosphere; skies all over the world were noticeably darker for more than two years and sunsets notably redder. Average global temperatures fell measurably during this period because volcanic dust-particles reflect the sun's rays back into space.[33]

During the episodes of intense volcanism which characterized the Ice Age, we must envisage not one but many Krakatoas. The combined effect would at first have been a great intensification of glacial conditions, as the light of the sun was cut by the boiling dust clouds, and as already low temperatures plummeted even further. Volcanoes also inject enormous volumes of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere, and carbon dioxide is a 'greenhouse gas', so it is reasonable to suppose, as the dust began to settle during periods of relative calm, that a degree of global warming would have occurred. A number of authorities attribute the repeated advances and retreats of the great ice sheets to precisely this see-saw interaction between volcanism and climate.[34]

Global flooding

Geologists agree that by 8000 BC the great Wisconsin and Wurm ice-caps had retreated. The Ice Age was over. However, the seven thousand years prior to that date had witnessed climatic and geological turbulence on a scale that was almost unimaginable. Lurching from cataclysm to disaster and from misfortune to calamity, the few scattered tribes of surviving humans must have led lives of constant terror and confusion: there would have been periods of quiescence, when they might have hoped that the worst was over. While the melting of the giant glaciers continued, however, these episodes of tranquillity would have been punctuated again and again by violent floods. Moreover, sections of the earth's crust hitherto pressed down into the asthenosphere by billions of tons of ice would have been liberated by the thaw and begun to rise again, sometimes rapidly, causing devastating earthquakes and filling the air with terrible noise.

Some times were much worse than others. The bulk of the animal extinctions took place between 11,000 BC and 9000 BC when there were violent and unexplained fluctuations of climate.[35] (In the words of geologist John Imbrie, 'a climatic revolution took place around 11,000 years ago.'[36]) There were also greatly increased rates of sedimentation[37] and an abrupt temperature increase of 6-10 degrees Centigrade in the surface waters of the Atlantic Ocean.[38]

Another turbulent episode, again accompanied by mass extinctions, took place between 15,000 BC and 13,000 BC. We saw in the previous chapter that the Tazewell Advance brought the ice sheets to their maximum extent around 17,000 years ago and that a dramatic and prolonged thaw then ensued, completely deglaciating millions of square miles of North America and Europe in less than two thousand years.

There were some anomalies: all of western Alaska, the Yukon territory in Canada, and most of Siberia including the New Siberian Islands (now among the coldest parts of the world), remained unglaciated until the Ice Age was near its end. They acquired their present climate only about 12,000 years ago, apparently very abruptly, when the mammoths and other large mammals were frozen in their tracks.[39]

Elsewhere the picture was different. Most of Europe was buried under ice two miles thick.[40] So too was most of North America where the ice-cap had spread from centres near Hudson Bay to enshroud all of eastern Canada, New England and much of the Midwest down to the 37th parallel—well to the south of Cincinnati in the Mississippi Valley and more than halfway to the equator.[41]

At its peak 17,000 years ago, it is calculated that the total ice volume covering the northern hemisphere was in the region of six million cubic miles, and of course there were extensive glaciations in the southern hemisphere too as we noted. The surplus water flow from which these numerous ice-caps were formed had been provided by the world's seas and oceans which were then about 400 feet lower than they are today.[42]

It was at this moment that the pendulum of climate swung violently in the opposite direction. The great meltdown began so suddenly and over such vast areas that it has been described 'as a sort of miracle'.[43] Geologists refer to it as the Bolling phase of warm climate in Europe and as the Brady interstadial in North America. In both regions:

> An ice-cap that may have taken 40,000 years to develop disappeared for the most part, in 2000. It must be obvious that this could not have been the result of gradually acting climatic factors usually called upon to explain ice ages ... The rapidity of the deglaciation suggests that some extraordinary factor was affecting the climate. The dates suggest that this factor first made itself felt about 16,500 years ago, that it had destroyed most, perhaps three-quarters of the glaciers by 2000 years later, and that [the vast bulk of these dramatic developments took place] in a millennium or less.'[44]

[39] The reader may recall that inexplicably warm conditions prevailed in the New Siberian Islands until this time, and it is worth noting that many other islands in the Arctic Ocean were also unaffected for a long while by the widespread glaciations elsewhere (e.g. on Baffin Island the remains of alder and birch trees preserved in peat indicate a relatively warm climate extending at least from 30,000 to 17,000 years ago. It is also certain that large parts of Greenland remained enigmatically ice-free during the Ice Age. Path of the Pole, p. 93, 96.

In North America, where the ice reached its maximum extent between 17,000 and 16,500 years ago, geologists have made the following discoveries: 'Leaves, needles and fruits' that flourished around 15,300 years ago in Massachusetts; 'A bog which developed over glacial material in New Jersey at least 16,280 years ago, immediately after the interruption of the ice advance.'; 'In Ohio we have a postglacial sample dated about 14,000 years ago. And that was spruce wood, suggesting a forest that must have taken a few thousand years, by conservative estimate, to get established. What, indeed, does this mean? Does it not clearly suggest that the ice cap, estimated to have been at its maximum at least a mile thick in Ohio, disappeared from Delaware County in that state within only a few centuries?'

Likewise, 'in the Soviet Union, in the Irkutsk area, deglaciation was complete and Inevitably the first consequence was a precipitous rise in sea levels, perhaps as much as 350 feet.[45] Islands and land bridges disappeared and vast sections of low-lying continental coastline were submerged. From time to time great tidal waves rose up to engulf higher land as well. They ebbed away, but in the process left unmistakable traces of their presence.

In the United States, 'Ice Age marine features are present along the Gulf coast east of the Mississippi River, in some places at altitudes that may exceed 200 feet.'[46] In bogs covering glacial deposits in Michigan, skeletons of two whales were discovered. In Georgia marine deposits occur at altitudes of 160 feet, and in northern Florida at altitudes of at least 240 feet. In Texas, well to the south of the farthest extent of the Wisconsin Glaciation, the remains of Ice Age land mammals are found in marine deposits. Another marine deposit, containing walrus, seals and at least five genera of whales, overlies the seaboard of the north-eastern states and the Arctic coast of Canada. In many areas along the Pacific coast of North America Ice Age marine deposits extend 'more than 200 miles inland.'[47] The bones of a whale have been found north of Lake Ontario, about 440 feet above sea level, a skeleton of another whale in Vermont, more than 500 feet above sea level, and another in the Montreal-Quebec area about 600 feet above sea level.[48]

Flood myths from all over the world characteristically and recurrently describe scenes when humans and animals flee the rising tides and take refuge on mountain tops. The fossil record confirms that this did indeed happen during the melting of the ice sheets and that the mountains were not always high enough to save the refugees from disaster. For example, fissures in the rocks on the tops of isolated hills in central France are filled with what is known as 'osseous breccia', consisting of the splintered bones of mammoths, woolly rhinoceroses and other animals. The 1430 feet peak of Mount Genay in Burgundy 'is capped by a breccia containing remains of mammoth, reindeer, horse and other animals'.[49] Much farther south, so too is the Rock of Gibraltar where 'a human molar and some flints worked by Paleolithic man were discovered among the animal bones.'[50]

postglacial life fully established by 14,500 years ago. In Lithuania another bog developed as early as 15,620 years ago. These two dates taken together are rather suggestive. A bog can develop much faster than a forest. First, however, the ice must disappear. And let us not forget that there was a great deal of ice.'

wolf and lion, have been found in England, in the neighbourhood of Plymouth on the Channel.[51] The hills around Palermo in Sicily disclosed an 'extraordinary quantity of bones of hippopotami—in complete hecatombs'.[52] On the basis of this and other evidence, Joseph Prestwich, formerly professor of Geology at Oxford University, concluded that Central Europe, England, and the Mediterranean islands of Corsica, Sardinia and Sicily were all completely submerged on several occasions during the rapid melting of the ice sheets:

> The animals naturally retreated, as the waters advanced, deeper into the hills until they found themselves embayed ... They thronged together in vast multitudes, crushing into the more accessible caves, until overtaken by the waters and destroyed ... Rocky debris and large blocks from the sides of the hills were hurled down by the currents of water, crushing and smashing the bones ... Certain communities of early man must have suffered in this general catastrophe.[53]

It is probable that similar flood disasters occurred in China at much the same time. In caves near Peking, bones of mammoths and buffaloes have been found in association with human skeletal remains.[54] A number of authorities attribute the violent intermingling of mammoth carcasses with splintered and broken trees in Siberia 'to a great tidal wave that uprooted forests and buried the tangled carnage in a flood of mud. In the polar region this froze solid and has preserved the evidence in permafrost to the present.'[55]

All over South America, too, Ice-Age fossils have been unearthed, 'in which incongruous animal types (carnivores and herbivores) are mixed promiscuously with human bones. No less significant is the association, over truly widespread areas, of fossilized land and sea creatures mingled in no order and yet entombed in the same geological horizon.'[56]

North America was also badly affected by flooding. As the great Wisconsin ice sheets melted they created huge but temporary lakes which filled up with incredible speed, drowning everything in their paths, then drained away in a few hundred years. Lake Agassiz, for example, the largest glacial lake in the New World, once occupied an area of 110,000 square miles, covering large parts of what are now Manitoba, Ontario and Saskatchewan in Canada, and North Dakota and Minnesota in the United States.[57] Remarkably, it endured for less than a millennium, indicating a catastrophically sudden episode of melting and flooding followed by a period of quiescence.[58]

A token of good faith

It was long believed that human beings did not reach the New World until around 11,000 years ago, but recent finds have steadily pushed that horizon back. Stone implements dating to 25,000 BC have been identified by Canadian researchers in the Old Crow Basin in the Yukon Territory of Alaska.[59] In South America (as far south as Peru and Tierra del Fuego) human remains and artefacts have been found which have been reliably dated to 12,000 BC—with another group between 19,000 BC and 23,000 BC.[60] With this and other evidence taken into account, 'a very reasonable conclusion on the peopling of the Americas is that it began at least 35,000 years ago, but may well have included waves of immigrants at later dates too.'[61]

Those newly arriving Ice Age Americans, trekking in from Siberia across the Bering land bridge, would have faced the most appalling conditions between 17,000 and 10,000 years ago. It was then that the Wisconsin glaciers, all at once, went into their ferocious meltdown, forcing a 350-foot rise in global sea levels amid scenes of unprecedented climatic and geological turmoil. For seven thousand years of human experience, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and immense floods, interspersed with eerie periods of peace, must have dominated the day-to-day lives of the New World peoples. Perhaps this is why so many of their myths speak with such conviction of fire and floods and times of darkness and of the creation and destruction of Suns.

Moreover, as we have seen, the myths of the New World are not in this respect isolated from those of the Old. All around the globe, a remarkable uniformity reveals itself over issues such as 'the great flood' and 'the great cold' and 'the time of the great upheaval'. It is not just that the same experiences are being recounted again and again; that, on its own, would be quite understandable since the Ice Age and its after-effects were global phenomena. More curious by far is the way in which the same symbolic motifs keep recurring: the one good man and his family, the warning given by a god, the seeds of all living things saved, the survival ship, the enclosure against the cold, the trunk of a tree in which the pregenitors of future humanity hide themselves, the birds and other creatures released after the flood to find land ... and so on.

Isn't it also odd that so many of the myths turn out to contain descriptions of figures like Quetzalcoatl and Viracocha, said to have come in the time of darkness, after the flood, to teach architecture, astronomy, science and the rule of law to the scattered and devastated tribes of survivors.

Who were these civilizing heroes? Were they figments of the primitive imagination? Or gods? Or men? If they were men, could they have tampered with the myths in some way, turning them into vehicles for transporting knowledge through time?

The Machinery of Heaven

> Although a modern reader does not expect a text on celestial mechanics to read like a lullaby, he insists on his capacity to understand mythical 'images' instantly, because he can respect as 'scientific' only page-long approximation formulas, and the like.
> He does not think of the possibility that equally relevant knowledge might once have been expressed in everyday language. He never suspects such a possibility, although the visible accomplishments of ancient cultures—to mention only the pyramids or metallurgy—should be a cogent reason for concluding that serious and intelligent men were at work behind the stage, men who were bound to have used a technical language ...[1]

The quotation is from the late Giorgio de Santillana, professor of the History of Science at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In the chapters that follow, we shall be learning about his revolutionary investigations into ancient mythology. In brief, however, his proposition is this: long ages ago, serious and intelligent people devised a system for veiling the technical terminology of an advanced astronomical science behind the everyday language of myth.

Is Santillana right? And if he is right, who were these serious and intelligent people—these astronomers, these ancient scientists—who worked behind the stage of prehistory?

Let us start with some basics.

The wild celestial dance

The earth makes a complete circuit around its own axis once every twenty-four hours and has an equatorial circumference of 24,902.45 miles. It follows, therefore, that a man standing still on the equator is in fact in motion, revolving with the planet at just over 1000 miles per hour.[2] Viewed from outer space, looking down on the North Pole, the direction of rotation is anti-clockwise.

While spinning daily on its own axis, the earth also orbits the sun (again in an anti-clockwise direction) on a path which is slightly elliptical rather than completely circular. It pursues this orbit at truly breakneck speed, travelling as far along it in an hour—66,600 miles—as the average motorist will drive in six years. To bring the calculations down in scale, this means that we are hurtling through space much faster than any bullet, at the rate of 18.5 miles every second. In the time that it has taken you to read this paragraph, we have voyaged about 550 miles farther along earth's path around the sun.[3]

With a year required to complete a full circuit, the only evidence we have of the tremendous orbital race we are participating in is the slow march of the seasons. And in the operations of the seasons themselves it is possible to see a wondrous and impartial mechanism at work distributing spring, summer, autumn and winter fairly around the globe, across the northern and southern hemispheres, year in and year out, with absolute regularity.

The earth's axis of rotation is tilted in relation to the plane of its orbit (at about 23.5° to the vertical). This tilt, which causes the seasons, 'points' the North Pole, and the entire northern hemisphere away from the sun for six months a year (while the southern hemisphere enjoys its summer) and points the South Pole and the southern hemisphere away from the sun for the remaining six months (while the northern hemisphere enjoys its summer). The seasons result from the annual variation in the angle at which the sun's rays reach any particular point on the earth's surface and from the annual variation in the number of hours of sunlight received there at different times of the year.

The earth's tilt is referred to in technical language as its 'obliquity', and the plane of its orbit, extended outwards to form a great circle in the celestial sphere, is known as the 'ecliptic'. Astronomers also speak of the 'celestial equator', which is an extension of the earth's equator into the celestial sphere. The celestial equator is today inclined at about 23.5° to the ecliptic, because the earth's axis is inclined at 23.5° to the vertical. This angle, termed the 'obliquity of the ecliptic', is not fixed and immutable for all time. On the contrary (as we saw in Chapter Eleven in relation to the dating of the Andean city of Tiahuanaco) it is subject to constant, though very slow, oscillations. These occur across a range of slightly less than 3°, rising closest to the vertical at 22.1° and falling farthest away at 24.5°. A full cycle, from 24.5° to 22.1°, and back again to 24.5°, takes approximately 41,000 years to complete.[4]

So our fragile planet nods and spins while soaring along its orbital path. The orbit takes a year and the spin takes a day and the nod has a cycle of 41,000 years. A wild celestial dance seems to be going on as we skip and skim and dive through eternity, and we feel the tug of contradictory urges: to fall into the sun on the one hand; to make a break for the outer darkness on the other.

Recondite influences

The sun's gravitational domain, in the inner circles of which the earth is held captive, is now known to extend more than fifteen trillion miles into space, almost halfway to the nearest star.[5] Its pull upon our planet is therefore immense. Also affecting us is the gravity of the other planets with which we share the solar system. Each of these exerts an attraction which tends to draw the earth out of its regular orbit around the sun. The planets are of different sizes, however, and revolve around the sun at different speeds. The combined gravitational influence they are able to exert thus changes over time in complex but predictable ways, and the orbit changes its shape constantly in response. Since the orbit is an ellipse these changes affect its degree of elongation, known technically as its 'eccentricity'. This varies from a low value close to zero (when the orbit approaches the form of a perfect circle) to a high value of about six per cent when it is at its most elongated and elliptical.[6]

There are other forms of planetary influence too. Thus, though no explanation has yet been forthcoming, it is known that shortwave radio frequencies are disturbed when Jupiter, Saturn and Mars line up.[7] And in this connection evidence has also emerged > of a strange and unexpected correlation between the positions of Jupiter, Saturn and Mars, in their orbits around the sun, and violent electrical disturbances in the earth's upper atmosphere. This would seem to indicate that the planets and the sun share in a cosmic-electrical balance mechanism that extends a billion miles from the centre of our solar system. Such an electrical balance is not accounted for in current astrophysical theories.[8]

Inner planets of the solar system.

The New York Times, from which the above report is taken, does not attempt to clarify matters further. Its writers are probably unaware of just how much they sound like Berosus, the Chaldean historian, astronomer and seer of the third century BC, who made a deep study of the omens he believed would presage the final destruction of the world. He concluded, 'I Berosus, interpreter of Bellus, affirm that all the earth inherits will be consigned to flame when the five planets assemble in Cancer, so arranged in one row that a straight line may pass through their spheres.'[9]

A conjunction of five planets that can be expected to have profound gravitational effects will take place on 5 May in the year 2000 when Neptune, Uranus, Venus, Mercury and Mars will align with earth on the other side of the sun, setting up a sort of cosmic tug-of-war.[10] Let us also note that modern astrologers who have charted the Mayan date for the end of the Fifth Sun calculate that there will be a most peculiar arrangement of planets at that time, indeed an arrangement so peculiar that 'it can only occur once in 45,200 years ... From this extraordinary pattern we might well expect an extraordinary effect.'[11]

No one in his or her right mind would rush to accept such a proposition. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that multiple influences, many of which we do not fully understand, appear to be at work within our solar system. Among these influences, that of our own satellite, the moon, is particularly strong. Earthquakes, for example, occur more often when the moon is full or when the earth is between the sun and the moon; when the moon is new or between the sun and the earth; when the moon crosses the meridian of the affected locality; and when the moon is closest to the earth on its orbit.[12] Indeed, when the moon reaches this latter point (technically referred to as its 'perigree'), its gravitational attraction increases by about six per cent. This happens once every twenty-seven and one-third days. The tidal pull that it exerts on these occasions affects not only the great movements of our oceans but those of the reservoirs of hot magma penned within the earth's thin crust (which has been described as resembling 'a paper bag filled with honey or molasses swinging along at a rate of more than 1000 miles an hour in equatorial rotation, and more than 66,000 miles an hour in orbit'[13]).

The wobble of a deformed planet

All this circular motion, of course, generates immense centrifugal forces and these, as Sir Isaac Newton demonstrated in the seventeenth century, cause the earth's 'paper bag' to bulge outwards at the equator. The corollary is a flattening at the poles. In consequence, our planet deviates slightly from the form of a perfect sphere and is more accurately described as an 'oblate spheroid'. Its radius at the equator (3963.374 miles) is about fourteen miles longer than its polar radius (3949.921 miles).[14]

[13] Biblical Flood and the Ice Epoch, p. 49.

For billions of years the flattened poles and the bulging equator have been engaged in a covert mathematical interaction with the recondite influence of gravity. 'Because the Earth is flattened,' explains one authority, 'the Moon's gravity tends to tilt the Earth's axis so that it becomes perpendicular to the Moon's orbit, and to a lesser extent the same is true for the Sun.'[15]

At the same time the equatorial bulge—the extra mass distributed around the equator—acts like the rim of a gyroscope to keep the earth steady on its axis.[16]

Year in, year out, on a planetary scale, it is this gyroscopic effect that prevents the tug of the sun and the moon from radically altering the earth's axis of rotation. The pull these two bodies jointly exert is, however, sufficiently strong to force the axis to 'precess', which means that it wobbles slowly in a clockwise direction opposite to that of the earth's spin.

This important motion is our planet's characteristic signature within the solar system. Anyone who has ever set a top spinning should be able to understand it without much difficulty; a top, after all, is simply another type of gyroscope. In full uninterrupted spin it stands upright. But the moment its axis is deflected from the vertical it begins to exhibit a second behaviour: a slow and obstinate reverse wobble around a great circle. This wobble, which is precession, changes the direction in which the axis points while keeping constant its newly tilted angle.

A second analogy, somewhat different in approach, may help to clarify matters a little further:

1 Envisage the earth, floating in space, inclined at approximately 23.5° to the vertical and spinning around on its axis once every 24 hours.
2 Envisage this axis as a massively strong pivot, or axle, passing through the centre of the earth, exiting via the North and South Poles and extending outwards from there in both directions.
3 Imagine that you are a giant, striding through the solar system, with orders to carry out a specific task.
4 Imagine approaching the tilted earth (which, because of your great size, now looks no bigger to you than a millwheel).
5 Imagine reaching out and grasping the two ends of the extended axis.
6 And imagine yourself slowly beginning to inter-rotate them, pushing one end, pulling the other.

7 The earth was already spinning when you arrived.

8 Your orders, therefore, are not to get involved in its axial rotation, but rather to impart to it its other motion: that slow clockwise wobble called precession.

9 To fulfill this commission you will have to push the northern tip of the extended axis up and around a great circle in the northern celestial hemisphere while at the same time pulling the southern tip around an equally large circle in the southern celestial hemisphere. This will involve a slow swivelling pedalling motion with your hands and shoulders.

10 Be warned, however. The ‘millwheel’ of the earth is heavier than it looks, so much heavier, in fact, that it’s going to take you 25,776 years[17] to turn the two tips of its axis through one full precessional cycle (at the end of which they will be aiming at the same points in the celestial sphere as when you arrived).

11 Oh, and by the way, now that you’ve started the job we may as well tell you that you’re never going to be allowed to leave. As soon as one precessional cycle is over another must begin. And another ... and another ... and another ... and so on, endlessly, for ever and ever and ever.

12 You can think of this, if you like, as one of the basic mechanisms of the solar system, or, if you prefer, as one of the fundamental commandments of the divine will.

13,000 years ago the North Pole pointed towards Vega, as it will do again in 12,500 years from now.
The North Pole today points towards Polaris.

Precession.

In the process, little by little, as you slowly sweep the extended axis around the heavens, its two tips will point to one star after another in the polar latitudes of the southern celestial hemisphere (and sometimes, of course, to empty space), and to one star after another in the polar latitudes of the northern celestial hemisphere. We are talking here, about a kind of musical chairs among the circumpolar stars. And what keeps everything in motion is the earth's axial precession—a motion driven by giant gravitational and gyroscopic forces, that is regular, predictable and relatively easy to work out with the aid of modern equipment. Thus, for example, the northern pole star is presently alpha Ursae Minoris (which we know as Polaris). But computer calculations enable us to state with certainty that in 3000 BC alpha Draconis occupied the pole position; at the time of the Greeks the northern pole star was beta Ursae Minoris; and in AD 14,000 it will be Vega.[18]

A great secret of the past

It will not hurt to remind ourselves of some of the fundamental data concerning the movements of the earth and its orientation in space:

- It tilts at about 23.5° to the vertical, an angle from which it can vary by as much as 1.5° on either side over periods of 41,000 years.
- It completes a full precessional cycle once every 25,776 years.[19]
- It spins on its own axis once every twenty-four hours.
- It orbits the sun once every 365 days (actually 365.2422 days).
- The most important influence on its seasons is the angle at which the rays of the sun strike it at various points on its orbital path.

Equinoxes and solstices.

Let us also note that there are four crucial astronomical moments in the year, marking the official beginning of each of the four seasons. These moments (or cardinal points), which were of immense importance to the ancients, are the winter and the summer solstices and the spring and autumn equinoxes. In the northern hemisphere the winter solstice, the shortest day, falls on 21 December, and the summer solstice, the longest day, on 21 June. In the southern hemisphere, on the other hand, everything is literally upside down: there winter begins on 21 June and summer on 21 December.

The equinoxes, by contrast, are the two points in the year on which night and day are of equal length all over the planet. Once again, however, as with the solstices, the date that marks the onset of spring in the northern hemisphere (20 March) marks that of autumn in the southern hemisphere, and the date for the onset of autumn in the northern hemisphere (22 September) marks the onset of spring in the southern hemisphere.

Like the subtler variations of the seasons, all this is brought about by the benevolent obliquity of the planet. The northern hemisphere's summer solstice falls at that point in the orbit when the North Pole is aimed most directly towards the sun; six months later the winter solstice marks that point when the North Pole is aimed most directly away from the sun. And, logically enough, the reason that day and night are of exactly equal length all over the planet on the spring and autumn equinoxes is that these mark the two points when the earth's axis of rotation lies broadside-on to the sun.

Let us now take a look at a strange and beautiful phenomenon of celestial mechanics.

This phenomenon is known as 'the precession of the equinoxes'. It has rigid and repetitive mathematical qualities that can be analysed and predicted precisely. It is, however, extremely difficult to observe, and even harder to measure accurately, without sophisticated instrumentation.

In this, there may lie a clue to one of the great mysteries of the past.

The First Crack in an Ancient Code

The plane of the earth's orbit, projected outwards to form a great circle in the celestial sphere, is known as the ecliptic. Ringed around the ecliptic, in a starry belt that extends approximately 7° north and south, are the twelve constellations of the zodiac: Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, Libra, Scorpius, Sagittarius, Capricornus, Aquarius and Pisces. These constellations are irregular in size, shape and distribution. Nevertheless (and one assumes by chance!) their spacing around the rim of the ecliptic is sufficiently even to bestow a sense of cosmic order upon the diurnal risings and settings of the sun.

To picture what is involved here, do the following: (1) mark a dot in the centre of a blank sheet of paper; (2) draw a circle around the dot, about half an inch away from it; (3) enclose that circle in a second, larger, circle.

The dot represents the sun. The smaller of the two concentric circles represents the earth's orbit. The larger circle represents the rim of the ecliptic. Around the perimeter of this larger circle, therefore, you should now draw twelve boxes, spacing them evenly, to represent the constellations of the zodiac. Since there are 360° in a circle, each constellation can be considered to occupy a space of 30° along the ecliptic. The dot is the sun. The inner of the two concentric circles is the earth's orbit. We know that the earth travels on this orbit in an anti-clockwise direction, from the west towards the east, and that every twenty-four hours it also makes one complete rotation around its own axis (again from the west towards the east).

From these two movements two illusions result:

1 Each day as the planet turns from west to east, the sun (which is of course a fixed point) appears to 'move' across the sky from east to west.
2 Roughly every thirty days, as the spinning earth journeys along its orbital path around the sun, the sun itself slowly appears to 'pass' through one after another of the twelve zodiacal constellations (which are also fixed points), and again it appears to be 'moving' in an east-west direction.

On any particular day of the year, in other words, (corresponding on our diagram to any point we care to choose around the inner concentric circle marking the earth's orbit), it is obvious that the sun will lie between an observer on the earth and one of the twelve zodiacal constellations. On that day what the observer will see, so long as he or she is up and about well before dawn, is the sun rising in the east in the portion of the sky occupied by that particular constellation.

Beneath the clear and unpolluted heavens of the ancient world, it is easy to understand how human beings might have felt reassured by regular celestial motions such as these. It is equally easy to understand why the four cardinal points of the year—the spring and autumn equinoxes, the winter and summer solstices—should everywhere have been accorded immense significance. Even greater significance was accorded to the conjunction of these cardinal points with the zodiacal constellations. But most significant of all was the constellation in which the sun was observed to rise on the morning of the spring (or vernal) equinox. Because of the earth's axial precession, the ancients discovered that this constellation was not fixed or permanent for all time but that the honour of 'housing' or 'carrying' the sun on the day of the vernal equinox circulated—very, very slowly—among all the constellations of the zodiac.

In the words of Giorgio de Santillana: 'The sun's position amongst the constellations at the vernal equinox was the pointer that indicated the "hours" of the precessional cycle—very long hours indeed, the equinoctial sun occupying each zodiacal constellation for almost 2200 years.[1]

The direction of the earth's slow axial precession is clockwise (i.e., east to west) and thus in opposition to the direction of the planet's annual path around the sun. In relation to the constellations of the zodiac, lying fixed in space, this causes the point at which the spring equinox occurs 'to move stubbornly along the ecliptic in the opposite direction to the yearly course Direction in which the vernal point shifts as a result of precession of the sun, that is, against the "right" sequence of the zodiacal signs (Taurus→ Aries→ Pisces→ Aquarius, instead of Aquarius→ Pisces→ Aries→ Taurus).'[2]

During the course of each year the earth's movement along its orbit causes the stellar background against which the sun is seen to rise to change from month to month: Aquarius→ Pisces→ Aries→ Taurus→ Gemini→ Cancer→ Leo, etc, etc. At present, on the vernal equinox, the sun rises due east between Pisces and Aquarius. The effect of precession is to cause the 'vernal point' to be reached fractionally earlier in the orbit each year with the result that it very gradually shifts through all 12 houses of the zodiac, spending 2160 years 'in' each sign and making a complete circuit in 25,920 years. The direction of this 'processional drift', in opposition to the annual 'path of the sun', is: Leo→ Cancer→ Gemini→ Taurus→ Aries→ Pisces→ Aquarius. To give one example, the 'Age of Leo', i.e. the 2160 years during which the sun on the vernal equinox rose against the stellar background of the constellation of Leo, lasted from 10,970 until 8810 BC. We live today in the astrological no man's land at the end of the 'Age of Pisces', on the threshold of the 'New Age' of Aquarius. Traditionally these times of transition between one age and the next have been regarded as ill-omened.

That, in a nutshell, is the meaning of 'precession of the equinoxes'. And that is exactly what is involved in the notion of the 'dawning of the Age of Aquarius'. The famous line from the musical Hair refers to the fact that every year, for the last 2000 years or so, the sun has risen in Pisces on the vernal equinox. The age of Pisces, however, is now approaching its end and the vernal sun will soon pass out of the sector of the Fish and begin to rise against the new background of Aquarius.

The 25,776-year cycle of precession is the engine that drives this majestic celestial juggernaut along its never-ending tour of the heavens. But the details of exactly how precession moves the equinoctial points from Pisces into Aquarius—and thence onwards around the zodiac—are also worth knowing.

Remember that the equinoxes occur on the only two occasions in the year when the earth's tilted axis lies broadside-on to the sun. These are when the sun rises due east all over the world and day and night are of equal length. Because the earth's axis is slowly but surely precessing in a direction opposite to that of its own orbit, the points at which it lies broadside-on to the sun must occur fractionally earlier in the orbit each year. These annual changes are so small as to be almost imperceptible (a one degree shift along the ecliptic—equivalent to the width of your little finger held up to the horizon—requires approximately seventy-two years to complete). However, as de Santillana points out, such minute changes add up in just under 2200 years to a 30° passage through a complete house of the zodiac, and in just under 26,000 years to a 360° passage through a complete cycle of precession.

When did the ancients first work out precession?

In the answer to this question lies a great secret, and mystery, of the past. Before we try to penetrate the mystery and to learn the secret, we should acquaint ourselves with the 'official' line. The Encyclopaedia Britannica is as good a repository as any of conventional historical wisdom, and this is what it tells us about a scholar named Hipparchus, the supposed discoverer of precession:

> Hipparchus, also spelled HIPPARCHOS (b. Nicaea, Bithynia; d. after 127 BC, Rhodes), Greek astronomer and mathematician who discovered the precession of the equinoxes ... This notable discovery was the result of painstaking observations, worked upon by an acute mind. Hipparchus observed the positions of the stars, and then compared his results with those of Timocharis of Alexandria about 150 years earlier and with even earlier observations made in Babylonia. He discovered that the celestial longitudes were different and that this difference was of a magnitude exceeding that attributable to errors of observation. He therefore proposed precession to account for the size of the difference and he gave a value of 45' or 46' (seconds of arc) for annual changes. This is very close to the figure of 50.274 seconds of arc accepted today ...'[3]

First, a point of terminology. Seconds of arc are the smallest subdivisions of a degree of arc. There are 60 of these arc seconds in one arc minute, 60 minutes in one degree, and 360 degrees in the full circle of earth's path around the sun. An annual change of 50.274 seconds of arc represents a distance somewhat under one-sixtieth of one degree so that it takes roughly 72 years (an entire human lifetime) for the equinoctial sun to migrate just one degree along the ecliptic. It is because of the observational difficulties entailed in detecting this snails' pace rate of change that the value worked out by Hipparchus in the second century BC is hailed in the Britannica as a 'notable discovery'.

[3] Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1991, 5:937-8. See also The Death of Gods in Ancient Egypt, p. 205, where the precise figure of 50.274 is given.

Would this discovery seem so notable if it turned out to be a rediscovery? Would the mathematical and astronomical achievements of the Greeks shine so brightly if we could prove that the difficult challenge of measuring precession had been taken up thousands of years before Hipparchus? What if this heavenly cycle, almost 26,000 years long, had been made the object of precise scientific investigations long epochs before the supposed dawn of scientific thought?

In seeking answers to such questions there is much that may be relevant which would never be accepted by any court of law as concrete proof. Let us not accept it either. We have seen that Hipparchus proposed a value of 45 or 46 seconds of arc for one year of precessional motion. Let us therefore not attempt to dislodge the Greek astronomer from his pedestal as the discoverer of precession unless we can find a significantly more accurate value recorded in a significantly more ancient source.

Of course, there are many potential sources. At this point, however, in the interests of succinctness, we shall limit our inquiry to universal myths. We have already examined one group of myths in detail (the traditions of flood and cataclysm set out in Part IV) and we have seen that they possess a range of intriguing characteristics:

1. There is no doubt that they are immensely old. Take the Mesopotamian flood story, versions of which have been found inscribed on tablets from the earliest strata of Sumerian history, around 3000 BC. These tablets, handed down from the dawn of the recorded past, leave no room for doubt that the tradition of a world-destroying flood was ancient even then, and therefore originated long before the dawn. We cannot say how long. The fact remains that no scholar has ever been able to establish a date for the creation of any myth, let alone for these venerable and widespread traditions. In a very real sense they seem always to have been around—part of the permanent baggage of human culture.
2. The possibility cannot be ruled out that this aura of vast antiquity is not an illusion. On the contrary, we have seen that many of the great myths of cataclysm seem to contain accurate eye-witness accounts of real conditions experienced by humanity during the last Ice Age. In theory, therefore, these stories could have been constructed at almost the same time as the emergence of our subspecies Homo sapiens sapiens, perhaps as long as 50,000 years ago. The geological evidence, however, suggests a more recent provenance, and we have identified the epoch 15,000-8000 BC as the most likely. Only then, in the whole of human experience, were there rapid climatic changes on the convulsive scale the myths so eloquently describe.

3. The Ice Age and its tumultuous demise were global phenomena. It is therefore perhaps not surprising that the cataclysm traditions of many different cultures, widely scattered around the globe, should be characterized by a high degree of uniformity and convergence.
4. What is surprising, however, is that the myths not only describe shared experiences but that they do so in what appears to be a shared symbolic language. The same 'literary motifs' keep cropping up again and again, the same stylistic 'props', the same recognizable characters, and the same plots.

According to Professor de Santillana, this type of uniformity suggests a guiding hand at work. In Hamlet's Mill, a seminal and original thesis on ancient myth written in collaboration with Hertha von Dechend (professor of the History of Science at Frankfurt University) he argues that:

> universality is in itself a test when coupled with a firm design. When something found, say, in China, turns up also in Babylonian astrological texts, then it must be assumed to be relevant if it reveals a complex of uncommon images which nobody could claim had risen independently by spontaneous generation. Take the origin of music. Orpheus and his harrowing death may be a poetic creation born in more than one instance in diverse places. But when characters who do not play the lyre but blow pipes get themselves flayed alive for various absurd reasons, and their identical end is rehearsed on several continents, then we feel we have got hold of something, for such stories cannot be linked by internal sequence. And when the Pied Piper turns up both in the German myth of Hamelin and in Mexico long before Columbus, and is linked in both places to certain attributes like the colour red, it can hardly be a coincidence ... Likewise, when one finds numbers like 108, or 9 x 13 reappearing under several multiples in the Vedas, in the temples of Angkor, in Babylon, in Heraclitus' dark utterances, and also in the Norse Valhalla, it is not accident ...[4]

Connecting the great universal myths of cataclysm, is it possible that such coincidences that cannot be coincidences, and accidents that cannot be accidents, could denote the global influence of an ancient, though as yet unidentified, guiding hand? If so, could it be that same hand, during and after the last Ice Age, which drew the series of highly accurate and technically advanced world maps reviewed in Part I? And might not that same hand have left its ghostly fingerprints on another body of universal myths? those concerning the death and resurrection of gods, and great trees around which the earth and heavens turn, and whirlpools, and churns, and drills, and other similar revolving, grinding contrivances?

According to Santillana and von Dechend, all such images refer to celestial events[5] and do so, furthermore, in the refined technical language of an archaic but 'immensely sophisticated' astronomical and mathematical science:[6] 'This language ignores local beliefs and cults. It concentrates on numbers, motions, measures, overall frames, schemas—on the structure of numbers, on geometry.'[7]

[4] Hamlet's Mill, p. 7.

[6] Hamlet's Mill, p. 65.

Where could such a language have come from? Hamlet's Mill is a labyrinth of brilliant but deliberately evasive scholarship, and offers us no straightforward answer to this question. Here and there, however, almost with embarrassment, inconclusive hints are dropped. For example, at one point the authors say that the scientific language or 'code' they believe they have identified is of 'awe-inspiring antiquity'.[8] On another occasion they pin down the depth of this antiquity more precisely to a period at least '6000 years before Virgil'[9]—in other words 8000 years ago or more.

What civilization known to history could have developed and made use of a sophisticated technical language more than 8000 years ago? The honest answer to this question is 'none', followed by a frank admission that what is being conjectured is nothing less than a forgotten episode of high technological culture in prehistoric times. Once again, Santillana and von Dechend are elusive when it comes to the crunch, speaking only of the legacy we all owe to 'some almost unbelievable ancestor civilization' that 'first dared to understand the world as created according to number, measure and weight.'[10]

The legacy, it is clear, has to do with scientific thinking and complex information of a mathematical nature. Because it is so extremely old, however, the passage of time has dissipated it:

> When the Greeks came upon the scene the dust of centuries had already settled upon the remains of this great world-wide archaic construction. Yet something of it survived in traditional rites, in myths and fairy-tales no longer understood ... These are tantalising fragments of a lost whole. They make one think of those 'mist landscapes' of which Chinese painters are masters, which show here a rock, here a gable, there the tip of a tree, and leave the rest to imagination. Even when the code shall have yielded, when the techniques shall be known, we cannot expect to gauge the thought of these remote ancestors of ours, wrapped as it is in its symbols, since the creating, ordering minds that devised the symbols have vanished forever.'[11]

What we have here, therefore, are two distinguished professors of the History of Science, from esteemed universities on both sides of the Atlantic, claiming to have discovered the remnants of a coded scientific language many thousands of years older than the oldest human civilizations identified by scholarship. Moreover, though generally cautious, Santillana and von Dechend also claim to have 'broken part of that code'.[12]

This is an extraordinary statement for two serious academics to have made.

The Cosmic Tree and the Mill of the Gods

In their brilliant and far-reaching study Hamlet's Mill, Professors de Santillana and von Dechend present a formidable array of mythical and iconographic evidence to demonstrate the existence of a curious phenomenon. For some inexplicable reason, and at some unknown date, it seems that certain archaic myths from all over the world were 'co-opted' (no other word will really do) to serve as vehicles for a body of complex technical data concerning the precession of the equinoxes. The importance of this astonishing thesis, as one leading authority on ancient measurement has pointed out, is that it has fired the first salvo in what may prove to be 'a Copernican revolution in current conceptions of the development of human culture.'[1]

Hamlet's Mill was published in 1969, more than a quarter of a century ago, so the revolution has been a long time coming. During this period, however, the book has been neither widely distributed among the general public nor widely understood by scholars of the remote past. This state of affairs has not come about because of any inherent problems or weaknesses in the work. Instead, in the words of Martin Bernal, professor of Government Studies at Cornell University, it has happened because 'few archaeologists, Egyptologists and ancient historians have the combination of time, effort and skill necessary to take on the very technical arguments of de Santillana.'[2]

What those arguments predominantly concern is the recurrent and persistent transmission of a 'precessional message' in a wide range of ancient myths. And, strangely enough, many of the key images and symbols that crop up in these myths—notably those that concern a 'derangement of the heavens'—are also to be found embedded in the ancient traditions of worldwide cataclysm reviewed in Chapters Twenty-four and Twenty-five.

In Norse mythology for example, we saw how the wolf Fenrir, whom the gods had so carefully chained up, broke his bonds at last and escaped: 'He shook himself and the world trembled. The ash-tree Yggdrasil was shaken from its roots to its topmost branches. Mountains crumbled or split from top to bottom ... The earth began to lose its shape. Already the stars were coming adrift in the sky.'

In the opinion of de Santillana and von Dechend, this myth mixes the familiar theme of catastrophe with the quite separate theme of precession. On the one hand we have an earthly disaster on a scale that seems to dwarf even the flood of Noah. On the other we hear that ominous changes are taking place in the heavens and that the stars, which have come adrift in the sky, are 'dropping into the void.'[3]

[2] Martin Bernal, Black Athena: The Afro-asiatic Roots of Classical Civilization, Vintage Books, London, 1991, p. 276.

Such celestial imagery, repeated again and again with only relatively minor variations in myths from many different parts of the world, belongs to a category earmarked in Hamlet's Mill as 'not mere storytelling of the kind that comes naturally'.[4] Moreover the Norse traditions that speak of the monstrous wolf Fenrir, and of the shaking of Yggdrasil, go on to report the final apocalypse in which the forces of Valhalla issue forth on the side of 'order' to participate in the terrible last battle of the gods—a battle that will end in apocalyptic destruction:

> 500 doors and 40 there are
> I ween, in Valhalla's walls;
> 800 fighters through each door fare,
> When to war with the Wolf they go.[5]

With a lightness of touch that is almost subliminal, this verse has encouraged us to count Valhalla's fighters, thus momentarily obliging us to focus our attention on their total number (540 x 800 = 432,000). This total, as we shall see in Chapter Thirty-one is mathematically linked to the phenomenon of precession. It is, unlikely to have found its way into Norse mythology by accident, especially in a context that has previously specified a 'derangement of the heavens' severe enough to have caused the stars to come adrift from their stations in the sky.

To understand what is going on here it is essential to grasp the basic imagery of the ancient 'message' that Santillana and von Dechend claim to have stumbled upon. This imagery transforms the luminous dome of the celestial sphere into a vast and intricate piece of machinery. And, like a millwheel, like a churn, like a whirlpool, like a quern, this machine turns and turns and turns endlessly (its motions being calibrated all the time by the sun, which rises first in one constellation of the zodiac, then in another, and so on all the year round).

The four key points of the year are the spring and summer equinoxes and the winter and summer solstices. At each point, naturally, the sun is seen to rise in a different constellation (thus if the sun rises in Pisces at the spring equinox, as it does at present, it must rise in Virgo at the autumn equinox, in Gemini at the winter solstice and in Sagittarius at the summer solstice). On each of these four occasions for the last 2000 years or so, this is exactly what the sun has been doing. As we have seen, however, precession of the equinoxes means that the vernal point will change in the not so distant future from Pisces to Aquarius. When that happens, the three other constellations marking the three key points will change as well (from Virgo, Gemini and Sagittarius to Leo, Taurus and Scorpius)—almost as though the giant mechanism of heaven has ponderously switched gears ...

[3] The reader will recall from Chapter Twenty-five how Yggdrasil, the world tree itself, was not destroyed and how the progenitors of future humanity managed to shelter within its trunk until a new earth emerged from the ruins of the old. How likely is it to be pure coincidence that exactly the same strategy was adopted by survivors of the universal deluge as described in certain Central American myths? Such links and crossovers in myth between the themes of precession and global catastrophe are extremely common.

Like the axle of a mill, Santillana and von Dechend explain, Yggdrasil 'represents the world axis' in the archaic scientific language they have identified: an axis which extends outwards (for a viewer in the northern hemisphere) to the North Pole of the celestial sphere:

> This instinctively suggests a straight, upright post ... but that would be an oversimplification. In the mythical context it is best not to think of the axis in analytical terms, one line at a time, but to consider it, and the frame to which it is connected, as a whole:... As radius automatically calls circle to mind so axis should invoke the two determining great circles on the surface of the sphere, the equinoctial and solstitial colures.[6]

These colures are the imaginary hoops, intersecting at the celestial North Pole, which connect the two equinoctial points on the earth's path around the sun (i.e. where it stands on 20 March and 22 September) and the two solstitial points (where it stands on 21 June and 21 December). The implication, is that: 'The rotation of the polar axis must not be disjointed from the great circles that shift along with it in heaven. The framework is thought of as all one with the axis.'[7]

Santillana and von Dechend are certain that what confronts us here is not a belief but an allegory. They insist that the notion of a spherical frame composed of two intersecting hoops suspended from an axis is not under any circumstances to be understood as the way in which ancient science envisaged the cosmos. Instead it is to be seen as a 'thought tool' designed to focus the minds of people bright enough to crack the code upon the hard-to-detect astronomical fact of precession of the equinoxes.

It is a thought tool that keeps on cropping up, in numerous disguises, all over the myths of the ancient world.

At the mill with slaves

One example, from Central America (which also provides a further illustration of the curious symbolic 'cross-overs' between myths of precession and myths of catastrophe), was summarized by Diego De Landa in the sixteenth century:

> Among the multitude of gods worshipped by these people [the Maya] were four whom they called by the name Bacab. These were, they say, four brothers placed by God when he created the world at its four corners to sustain the heavens lest they fall. They also say that these Bacabs escaped when the world was destroyed by a deluge.[8]

It is the opinion of Santillana and von Dechend that the Mayan astronomer-priests did not subscribe for a moment to the simple-minded notion that the earth was flat with four corners. Instead, they say, the image of the four Bacabs is used as a technical allegory intended to shed light on the phenomenon of precession of the equinoxes. The Bacabs stand, in short, for the system of coordinates of an astrological age. They represent the equinoctial and solstitial colures, binding together the four constellations in which the sun continues to rise at the spring and autumn equinoxes and at the winter and summer solstices for epochs of just under 2200 years.

Of course it is understood that when the gears of heaven change, the old age comes crashing down and a new age is born. All this, so far, is routine precessional imagery. What stands out, however, is the explicit linkage to an earthly disaster—in this case a flood—which the Bacabs survive. It may also be relevant that relief carvings at Chichen Itza unmistakably represent the Bacabs as being bearded and of European appearance.[9]

Be that as it may, the Bacab image (linked to a number of badly misunderstood references to 'the four corners of heaven', 'the quadrangular earth', and so on) is only one among many that seem to have been designed to serve as thought tools for precession. Archetypal among these is, of course, the 'Mill' of Santillana's title—Hamlet's Mill.

It turns out that the Shakespearean character, 'whom the poet made one of us, the first unhappy intellectual', conceals a past as a legendary being, his features predetermined, preshaped by longstanding myth.[10] In all his many incarnations, this Hamlet remains strangely himself. The original Amlodhi (or sometimes Amleth) as his name was in Icelandic legend, 'shows the same characteristics of melancholy and high intellect. He, too, is a son dedicated to avenge his father, a speaker of cryptic but inescapable truths, an elusive carrier of Fate who must yield once his mission is accomplished ...'[11]

In the crude and vivid imagery of the Norse, Amlodhi was identified with the ownership of a fabled mill, or quern, which, in its time, ground out gold and peace and plenty. In many of the traditions, two giant maidens (Fenja and Menja) were indentured to turn this great contraption, which could not be budged by any human strength. Something went wrong, and the two giantesses were forced to work day and night with no rest:

Forth to the mill bench they were brought,
  To set the grey stone in motion;
He gave them no rest nor peace,
  Attentive to the creak of the mill.

Their song was a howl,
  Shattering silence;
'Lower the bin and lighten the stones!'
  Yet he would have them grind more.[12]

Rebellious and angry, Fenja and Menja waited until everyone was asleep and then began to turn the mill in a mad whirl until its great props, though cased in iron, burst asunder.[13] Immediately afterwards, in a confusing episode, the mill was stolen by a sea king named Mysinger and loaded aboard his ship together with the giantesses. Mysinger ordered the pair to grind again, but this time they ground out salt. At midnight they asked him whether he was not weary of salt; he bade them grind longer. They had ground but a little longer when down sank the ship:

The huge props flew off the bin,
  The iron rivets burst,
The shaft tree shivered,
  The bin shot down.[14]

When it reached the bottom of the sea, the mill continued to turn, but it ground out rock and sand, creating a vast whirlpool, the Maelstrom.[15]

Such images, Santillana and von Dechend assert, signify precession of the equinoxes.[16] The axis and 'iron props' of the mill stand for:

> a system of coordinates in the celestial sphere and represent the frame of a world age. Actually the frame defines a world age. Because the polar axis and the colures form an invisible whole, the entire frame is thrown out of kilter if one part is moved. When that happens a new Pole star with appropriate colures of its own must replace the obsolete apparatus.[17]

Furthermore, the engulfing whirlpool:

> belongs to the stock-in-trade of ancient fable. It appears in the Odyssey as Charybdis in the Straits of Messina, and again in other cultures in the Indian Ocean and the Pacific. It is found there, too, curiously enough, with an overhanging fig-tree to whose boughs the hero can cling as the ship goes down, whether it be Satyavrata in India or Kae in Tonga ... The persistence of detail rules out free invention. Such stories have belonged to the cosmographical literature since antiquity.[18]

The appearance of the whirlpool in Homer's Odyssey (which is a compilation of Greek myths more than 3000 years old), should not surprise us, because the great Mill of Icelandic legend appears there also (and does so, moreover, in familiar circumstances). It is the last night before the decisive confrontation. Odysseus, bent on revenge, has landed in Ithaca and is hiding under the magic spell of the goddess Athena, which protects him from recognition. Odysseus prays to Zeus to send him an encouraging sign before the great ordeal:

> Straightaway Zeus thundered from shining Olympus ... and goodly Odysseus was glad. Moreover, a woman, a grinder at the mill, uttered a voice of omen from within the house hard by, where stood the mills of the shepherd of the people. At these handmills twelve women in all plied their task, making meal of barley and of wheat the marrow of men. Now all the others were asleep, for they had ground out their task of grain, but this one alone rested not yet, being the weakest of all. She now stayed her quern and spake the word ... 'May the [enemies of Odysseus] on this day, for the last time make their sweet feasting in his halls. They that have loosened my knees with cruel toil to grind their barley meal, may they now sup their last!'[19]

Santillana and von Dechend argue that it is no accident that the allegory of the 'orb of heaven that turns around like a millstone and ever does something bad'[20] also makes an appearance in the biblical tradition of Samson, 'eyeless in Gaza at the mill with slaves'.[21] His merciless captors unbind him so that he can 'make sport' for them in their temple; instead, with his last strength, he takes hold of the middle pillars of that great structure and brings the whole edifice crashing down, killing everybody.[22] Like Fenja and Menja, he gets his revenge.

The theme resurfaces in Japan,[23] in Central America,[24] among the Maoris of New Zealand,[25] and in the myths of Finland. There the Hamlet/Samson figure is known as Kullervo and the mill has a peculiar name: the Sampo. Like Fenja and Menja's mill it is ultimately stolen and loaded on board a ship. And like their mill, it ends up being broken in pieces.[26]

It turns out that the word 'Sampo' has its origins in the Sanskrit skambha, meaning 'pillar or pole'.[27] And in the Atharvaveda, one of the most ancient pieces of north Indian literature, we find an entire hymn dedicated to the Skambha:

> In whom earth, atmosphere, in whom sky is set, where fire, moon, sun, wind stand fixed ... The Skambha sustains both heaven and earth; the Skambha sustains the wide atmosphere; the Skambha sustains the six wide directions; into the Skambha entered all existence.

Whitney, the translator (Atharvaveda 10:7) comments in some perplexity: 'Skambha, lit, prop, support, pillar, strangely used in this hymn as frame of the universe'.[28] Yet with an awareness of the complex of ideas linking cosmic mills, and whirlpools and world trees and so on, the archaic Vedic usage should not seem so strange. What is being signalled here, as in all the other allegories, is the frame of a world age—that same heavenly mechanism that turns for more than 2000 years with the sun rising always in the same four cardinal points and then slowly shifts those celestial coordinates to four new constellations for the next couple of thousand years.

This is why the mill always breaks, why the huge props always fly off the bin in one way or another, why the iron rivets burst, why the shaft-tree shivers. Precession of the equinoxes merits such imagery because, at widely separated intervals of time it does indeed change, or break, the stabilizing coordinates of the entire celestial sphere.

Openers of the way

What is remarkable about all this is the way that the mill (which continues to serve as an allegory for cosmic processes) stubbornly keeps on resurfacing, all over the world, even where the context has been jumbled or lost. Indeed, in Santillana and von Dechend's argument, it doesn't really matter if the context is lost. 'The particular merit of mythical terminology,' they say, 'is that it can be used as a vehicle for handing down solid knowledge independently from the degree of insight of the people who do the actual telling of stories, fables, etc.'[29] What matters, in other words, is that certain central imagery should survive and continue to be passed on in retellings, however far these may drift from the original storyline.

An example of such drift (coupled with the retention of essential imagery and information) is found among the Cherokees, whose name for the Milky Way (our own galaxy) is 'Where the Dog Ran'. In ancient times, according to Cherokee tradition, the 'people in the South had a corn mill', from which meal was stolen again and again. In due course the owners discovered the thief, a dog, who 'ran off howling to his home in the North, with the meal dropping from his mouth as he ran, and leaving behind a white trail where now we see the Milky Way, which the Cherokee call to this day ... "Where the Dog Ran".'[30]

In Central America, one of the many myths concerning Quetzalcoatl depicts him playing a key role in the regeneration of mankind after the all-destroying flood that ended the Fourth Sun. Together with his dog-headed companion Xolotl, he descends into the underworld to retrieve the skeletons of the people killed by the deluge. This he succeeds in doing, after tricking Miclantechuhtli, the god of death, and the bones are brought to a place called Tamoanchan. There, like corn, they are milled into a fine meal on a grindstone. Upon this ground meal the gods then release blood, thus creating the flesh of the current age of men.[31]

Santillana and von Dechend do not think that the presence of a canine character in both the above variants of the myth of the cosmic mill is likely to be accidental. They point out that Kullervo, the Finnish Hamlet, is also accompanied by 'the black dog Musti'.[32] Likewise, after his return to his estates in Ithaca, Odysseus is first recognized by his faithful dog,[33] and as anyone who has been to Sunday school will remember, Samson is associated with foxes (300 of them to be precise[34]), which are members of the dog family. In the Danish version of the Amleth/Hamlet saga, 'Amleth went on and a wolf crossed his path amid the thicket.'[35] Last but not least an alternative recension of the Kullervo story from Finland has the hero (rather weirdly) being 'sent to Esthonia to bark under the fence; he barked one year ...'[36]

Santillana and von Dechend are confident that all this 'doggishness' is purposive: another piece of the ancient code, as yet unbroken, persistently tapping out its message from place to place. They list these and many other canine symbols among a series of 'morphological markers' which they have identified as likely to suggest the presence, in ancient myths, of scientific information concerning precession of the equinoxes.[37] These markers may have had meanings of their own or been intended simply to alert the target audience that a piece of hard data was coming up in the story being told. Beguilingly, sometimes they may also have been designed to serve as 'openers of the way'—conduits to enable initiates to follow the trail of scientific information from one myth to another.

Thus, even though none of the familiar mills and whirlpools is in sight, we should perhaps sit up and pay attention when we learn that Orion, the great hunter of Greek myth, was the owner of a dog. When Orion tried to ravish the virgin goddess Artemis she produced a scorpion from the earth which killed him and the dog. Orion was transported to the skies where he became the constellation that bears his name today; his dog was transformed into Sirius, the Dog Star.[38]

Precisely the same identification of Sirius was made by the ancient Egyptians,[39] who linked the Orion constellation specifically to their god Osiris.[40] It is in Ancient Egypt too that the character of the faithful celestial dog achieves its fullest and most explicit mythical elaboration in the form of Upuaut, a jackal-headed deity whose name means 'Opener of the Ways'.[41] If we follow this way opener to Egypt, turn our eyes to the constellation of Orion, and enter the potent myth of Osiris, we find ourselves enveloped in a net of familiar symbols.

The reader will recall that the myth presents Osiris as the victim of a plot. The conspirators initially dispose of him by sealing him in a box and casting him adrift on the waters of the Nile. In this respect does he not resemble Utnapishtim, and Noah and Coxcoxtli and all the other deluge heroes in their arks (or boxes, or chests) riding out the waters of the flood?

Another familiar element is the classic precessional image of the world-tree and/or roof-pillar (in this case combined). The myth tells us how Osiris, still sealed inside his coffer, is carried out into the sea and washed up at Byblos. The waves lay him to rest among the branches of a tamarisk tree, which rapidly grows to a magnificent size, enclosing the coffer within its trunk.[42] The king of the country, who much admires the tamarisk tree, cuts it down and fashions the part which contains Osiris into a roof pillar for his palace. Later Isis, the wife of Osiris, removes her husband's body from the pillar and takes it back to Egypt to undergo rebirth.[43]

The Osiris myth also includes certain key numbers. Whether by accident or by design, these numbers give access to a 'science' of precession, as we shall see in the next chapter.

Though a mill, as such, is nowhere to be seen, many Ancient Egyptian reliefs depict two of the principal characters in the Osiris myth (Horus and Seth) jointly operating a giant drill, again a classic symbol of precession. Hamlet's Mill, p. 162: 'This feature is continuously mislabelled the "uniting of the two countries" whether Horus and Seth serve the churn or, as is more often the case, the so-called Nile Gods.'

The Osiris Numbers

Archaeo-astronomer Jane B. Sellers, who studied Egyptology at the University of Chicago's Oriental Institute, spends her winters in Portland, Maine, and summers at Ripley Neck, a nineteenth-century enclave 'downcast' on Maine's rocky coast. 'There,' she says, 'the night skies can be as clear as the desert, and no one minds if you read the Pyramid Texts out loud to the seagulls ...[1]

One of the few serious scholars to have tested the theory advanced by Santillana and von Dechend in Hamlet's Mill, Sellers has been hailed for having drawn attention to the need to use astronomy, and more particularly precession, for the proper study of ancient Egypt and its religion.[2] In her words: 'Archaeologists by and large lack an understanding of precession, and this affects their conclusions concerning ancient myths, ancient gods and ancient temple alignments ... For astronomers precession is a well-established fact; those working in the field of ancient man have a responsibility to attain an understanding of it.'[3]

It is Sellers's contention, eloquently expressed in her recent book, The Death of Gods in Ancient Egypt, that the Osiris myth may have been deliberately encoded with a group of key numbers that are 'excess baggage' as far as the narrative is concerned but that offer an eternal calculus by which surprisingly exact values can be derived for the following:

1. The time required for the earth's slow precessional wobble to cause the position of sunrise on the vernal equinox to complete a shift of one degree along the ecliptic (in relation to the stellar background);
2. The time required for the sun to pass through one full zodiacal segment of thirty degrees;
3. The time required for the sun to pass through two full zodiacal segments (totalling sixty degrees);
4. The time required to bring about the 'Great Return'[4], i.e., for the sun to shift three hundred and sixty degrees along the ecliptic, thus fulfilling one complete precessional cycle or 'Great Year'.

[4] This phrase was coined by Jane Sellers, whom also detected the precessional calculations embedded in the Osiris myth.

Computing the Great Return

The precessional numbers highlighted by Sellers in the Osiris myth are 360, 72, 30 and 12. Most of them are found in a section of the myth which provides us with biographical details of the various characters. These have been conveniently summarized by E. A. Wallis Budge, formerly keeper of Egyptian Antiquities at the British Museum:

> The goddess Nut, wife of the sun god Ra, was beloved by the god Geb. When Ra discovered the intrigue he cursed his wife and declared that she should not be delivered of a child in any month of any year. Then the god Thoth, who also loved Nut, played at tables with the moon and won from her five whole days. These he joined to the 360 days of which the year then consisted [emphasis added]. On the first of these five days Osiris was brought forth; and at the moment of his birth a voice was heard to proclaim that the lord of creation was born.[5]

Elsewhere the myth informs us that the 300-day year consists of '12 months of 30 days each'.[6] And in general, as Sellers observes, 'phrases are used which prompt simple mental calculations and an attention to numbers'.[7]

Thus far we have been provided with three of Sellers's precessional numbers: 360, 12 and 30. The fourth number, which occurs later in the text, is by far the most important. As we saw in Chapter Nine, the evil deity known as Set led a group of conspirators in a plot to kill Osiris. The number of these conspirators was 72.

With this last number in hand, suggests Sellers, we are now in a position to boot-up and set running an ancient computer programme:

12 = the number of constellations in the zodiac;

30 = the number of degrees allocated along the ecliptic to each zodiacal constellation;

72 = the number of years required for the equinoctial sun to complete a precessional shift of one degree along the ecliptic;

360 = the total number of degrees in the ecliptic;

72 x 30 = 2160 (the number of years required for the sun to complete a passage of 30 degrees along the ecliptic, i.e., to pass entirely through any one of the 12 zodiacal constellations);

2160 x 12 (or 360 x 72) = 25,920 (the number of years in one complete precessional cycle or 'Great Year', and thus the total number of years required to bring about the 'Great Return').

[6] Cited in The Death of Gods in Ancient Egypt, p. 204.

[7] Ibid.

Other figures and combinations of figures also emerge, for example:

> 36, the number of years required for the equinoctial sun to complete a precessional shift of half a degree along the ecliptic;
> 4320, the number of years required for the equinoctial sun to complete a precessional shift of 60 degrees (i.e., two zodiacal constellations).

These, Sellers believes, constitute the basic ingredients of a precessional code which appears again and again, with eerie persistence, in ancient myths and sacred architecture. In common with much esoteric numerology, it is a code in which it is permissible to shift decimal points to left or right at will and to make use of almost any conceivable combinations, permutations, multiplications, divisions and fractions of the essential numbers (all of which relate precisely to the rate of precession of the equinoxes).

The pre-eminent number in the code is 72. To this is frequently added 36, making 108, and it is permissible to multiply 108 by 100 to get 10,800 or to divide it by 2 to get 54, which may then be multiplied by 10 and expressed as 540 (or as 54,000. or as 540,000, or as 5,400,000, and so on). Also highly significant is 2160 (the number of years required for the equinoctial point to transit one zodiacal constellation), which is sometimes multiplied by 10 and by factors often (to give 216,000, 2,160,000, and so on) and sometimes by 2 to give 4320, or 43,200, or 432,000, or 4,320,000, ad infinition.

Better than Hipparchus

If Sellers is correct in her hypothesis that the calculus needed to produce these numbers was deliberately encoded into the Osiris myth to convey precessional information to initiates, we are confronted by an intriguing anomaly. If they are indeed about precession, the numbers are out of place in time. The science they contain is too advanced for them to have been calculated by any known civilization of antiquity.

Let us not forget that they occur in a myth which is present at the very dawn of writing in Egypt (indeed elements of the Osiris story are to be found in the Pyramid Texts dating back to around 2450 BC, in a context which suggests that they were exceedingly old even then[8]). Hipparchus, the so-called discoverer of precession lived in the second century BC. He proposed a value of 45 or 46 seconds of arc for one year of precessional motion. These figures yield a one-degree shift along the ecliptic in 80 years (at 45 arc seconds per annum), and in 78.26 years (at 46 arc seconds per annum). The true figure, as calculated by twentieth century science, is 71.6 years.[9] If Sellers's theory is correct, therefore, the 'Osiris numbers', which give a value of 72 years, are significantly more accurate than those of Hipparchus. Indeed, within the obvious confines imposed by narrative structure, it is difficult to see how the number 72 could have been improved upon, even if the more precise figure had been known to the ancient myth-makers. One can hardly insert 71.6 conspirators into a story, but 72 will fit comfortably.

Working from this rounded-up figure, the Osiris myth is capable of yielding a value of 2160 years for a precessional shift through one complete house of the zodiac. The correct figure, according to today's calculations, is 2148 years.[10] The Hipparchus figures are 2400 years and 2347.8 years respectively. Finally, Osiris enables us to calculate 25,920 as the number of years required for the fulfillment of a complete precessional cycle through 12 houses of the zodiac. Hipparchus gives us either 28,800 or 28,173.6 years. The correct figure, by today's estimates, is 25,776 years.[11] The Hipparchus calculations for the Great Return are therefore around 3000 years out of kilter. The Osiris calculations miss the true figure by only 144 years, and may well do so because the narrative context forced a rounding-up of the base number from the correct value of 71.6 to a more workable figure of 72.

All this, however, assumes that Sellers is right to suppose that the numbers 360, 72, 30 and 12 did not find their way into the Osiris myth by chance but were placed there deliberately by people who understood—and had accurately measured—precession.

Is Sellers right?

Times of decay

The Osiris myth is not the only one to incorporate the calculus for precession. The relevant numbers keep surfacing in various forms, multiples and combinations, all over the ancient world.

An example was given in Chapter Thirty-three—the Norse myth of the 432,000 fighters who sallied forth from Valhalla to do battle with 'the Wolf'. A glance back at that myth shows that it contains several permutations of 'precessional numbers'.

Likewise, as we saw in Chapter Twenty-four, ancient Chinese traditions referring to a universal cataclysm were said to have been written down in a great text consisting of precisely 4320 volumes.

Thousands of miles away, is it a coincidence that the Babylonian historian Berossus (third century BC) ascribed a total reign of 432,000 years to the mythical kings who ruled the land of Sumer before the flood? And is it likewise a coincidence that this same Berossus ascribed 2,160,000 years to the period 'between creation and universal catastrophe'?[12]

Do the myths of ancient Amerindian peoples like the Maya also contain or enable us to compute numbers such as 72, 2160, 4320, etc. We shall probably never know, thanks to the conquistadores and zealous friars who destroyed the traditional heritage of Central America and left us so little to work with. What we can say, however, is that the relevant numbers do turn up, in relative profusion, in the Mayan Long Count calendar. Details of that calendar were given in Chapter Twenty-one. The numerals necessary for calculating precession are found there in these formulae: 1 Katun = 7200 days; 1 Tun = 360 days; 2 Tuns = 720 days; 5 Baktuns = 720,000 days; 5 Katuns = 36,000 days; 6 Katuns = 43,200 days; 6 Tuns = 2160 days; 15 Katuns = 2,160,000 days.[13]

Nor does it seem that Sellers's 'code' is confined to mythology. In the jungles of Kampuchea the temple complex of Angkor looks as though it could have been purpose-built as a precessional metaphor. It has, for example, five gates to each of which leads a road bridging the crocodile-infested moat that surrounds the whole site. Each of these roads is bordered by a row of gigantic stone figures, 108 per avenue, 54 on each side (540 statues in all) and each row carries a huge Naga serpent. Furthermore, as Santillana and von Dechend point out in Hamlet's Mill, the figures do not 'carry' the serpent but are shown to 'pull' it, which indicates that these 540 statues are 'churning the Milky Ocean'. The whole of Angkor 'thus turns out to be a colossal model set up with true Hindu fantasy and incongruousness' to express the idea of precession.[14]

Churning the Milky Ocean, one of the several 'thought tools' for precession encountered in ancient myths.

The same may be true of Java's famous temple of Borobudur, with its 72 bell-shaped stupas, and perhaps also of the megaliths of Baalbeck in the Lebanon—which are thought to be the world's biggest blocks of cut stone. Long predating Roman and Greek structures on the site, the three that make up the so-called 'Trilithion' are as tall as five-storey buildings and weigh over 600 tons each. A fourth megalith is almost 80 feet in length and weighs 1100 tons. Amazingly these giant blocks were cut, perfectly-shaped and somehow transported to Baalbeck from a quarry several miles away. In addition they were skillfully incorporated, at a considerable height above ground-level into the retaining walls of a magnificient temple. This temple was surrounded by 54 columns of immense size and height.[15]

In the subcontinent of India (where the Orion constellation is known as Kal-Purush, meaning Time-Man[16]), we find that Sellers's Osiris numbers are transmitted through a wide range of media in ways increasingly difficult to ascribe to chance. There are, for instance, 10,800 bricks in the Agnicayana, the Indian fire altar. There are 10,800 stanzas in the Rigveda, the most ancient of the Vedic texts and a rich repository of Indian mythology. Each stanza is made up of 40 syllables with the result that the entire composition consists of 432,000 syllables ... no more, and no less.[17] And in Rigveda 1:164 (a typical stanza) we read of 'the 12-spoked wheel in which 720 sons of Agni are established'.[18]

In the Hebrew Cabala there are 72 angels through whom the Sephiroth (divine powers) may be approached, or invoked, by those who know their names and numbers.[19] Rosicrucian tradition speaks of cycles of 108 years (72 plus 36) according to which the secret brotherhood makes its influence felt.[20] Similarly the number 72 and its permutations and subdivisions are of great significance to the Chinese secret societies known as Triads. An ancient ritual requires that each candidate for initiation pay a fee including '360 cash for "making clothes", 108 cash "for the purse", 72 cash for instruction, and 36 cash for decapitating the "traitorous subject".'[21] The 'cash' (the old universal brass coin of China with a square hole in the centre) is of course no longer in circulation but the numbers passed down in the ritual since times immemorial have survived. Thus in modern Singapore, candidates for Triad membership pay an entrance fee which is calculated according to their financial circumstances but which must always consist of multiples of $1.80, $3.60, $7.20, $10.80 (and thus, $18, $36, $72, $108.00, or $360, $720, $1,080, and so on.[22]

Of all the secret societies, the most mysterious and archaic by far is undoubtedly the Hung League, which scholars believe to be 'the depository of the old religion of the Chinese'.[23] In one Hung initiation ritual the neophyte is put through a question and answer session that goes:

Q. What did you see on your walk?

A. I saw two pots with red bamboo.

Q. Do you know how many plants there were?
A. In one pot were 36 and in the other 72 plants, together 108.

Q. Did you take home some of them for your use?
A. Yes, I took home 108 plants ...

Q. How can you prove that?
A. I can prove it by a verse.

Q. How does this verse run?
A. The red bamboo from Canton is rare in the world.
In the groves are 36 and 72.
Who in the world knows the meaning of this?
When we have set to work we will know the secret.

The atmosphere of intrigue that such passages generate is accentuated by the reticent behaviour of the Hung League itself, an organization resembling the medieval European Order of the Knights Templar (and the higher degrees of modern Freemasonry) in many ways that are beyond the remit of this book to describe.[24] It is intriguing, too, that the Chinese character Hung, composed of water and many, signifies inundation, i.e. the Flood.

Finally, returning to India, let us note the content of the sacred scriptures known as the Puranas. These speak of four ‘ages of the earth’, called Yugas, which together are said to extend to 12,000 ‘divine years’. The respective durations of these epochs, in ‘divine years’, are Krita Yuga = 4800; Treta Yuga = 3600; Davpara Yuga = 2400; Kali Yuga = 1200.[25]

The Puranas also tell us that ‘one year of the mortals is equal to one day of the gods’.[26] Furthermore, and exactly as in the Osiris myth, we discover that the number of days in the years of both gods and mortals has been artificially set at 360, so one year of the gods is equivalent to 360 mortal years.[27]

The Kali Yuga, therefore, at 1200 years of the gods, turns out to have a duration of 432,000 mortal years.[28] One Mahayuga, or Great Age (made up of the 12,000 divine years contained in the four lesser Yugas) is equivalent to 4,320,000 years of mortals. A thousand such Mahayugas (which constitute a Kalpa, or Day of Brahma) extend over 4,320,000,000 ordinary years,[29] again supplying the digits for basic precessional calculations. Separately there are Manvantaras (periods of Manu) of which we are told in the scriptures that 'about 71 systems of four Yugas elapse during each Manvantara.'[30] The reader will recall that one degree of precessional motion along the ecliptic requires 71.6 years to complete, a number that can be rounded down to 'about 71' in India just as easily as it was rounded up to 72 in Ancient Egypt.

The Kali Yuga, with a duration of 432,000 mortal years, is, by the way, our own. 'In the Kali Age,' the scriptures say, 'shall decay flourish, until the human race approaches annihilation.'[31]

Dogs, uncles and revenge

It was a dog that brought us to these decaying times.

We came here by way of Sirius, the Dog Star, who stands at the heel of the giant constellation of Orion where it towers in the sky above Egypt. In that land, as we have seen, Orion is Osiris, the god of death and resurrection, whose numbers—perhaps by chance—are 12, 30, 72, and 360. But can chance account for the fact that these and other prime integers of precession keep cropping up in supposedly unrelated mythologies from all over the world, and in such stolid but enduring vehicles as calendar systems and works of architecture?

Santillana and von Dechend, Jane Sellers and a growing body of other scholars rule out chance, arguing that the persistence of detail is indicative of a guiding hand.

If they are wrong, we need to find some other explanation for how such specific and inter-related numbers (the only obvious function of which is to calculate precession) could by accident have got themselves so widely imprinted on human culture.

But suppose they are not wrong? Suppose that a guiding hand really was at work behind the scenes?

Sometimes, when you slip into Santillana's and von Dechend's world of myth and mystery, you can almost feel the influence of that hand ... Take the business of the dog ... or jackal, or wolf, or fox. The subtle way this shadowy canine slinks from myth to myth is peculiar—stimulating, then baffling you, always luring you onwards.

Indeed, it was this lure we followed from the Mill of Amlodhi to the myth of Osiris in Egypt. Along the way, according to the design of the ancient sages (if Sellers, Santillana and von Dechend are right) we were first encouraged to build a clear mental picture of the celestial sphere. Second, we were provided with a mechanistic model so that we could visualize the great changes precession of the equinoxes periodically effects in all the coordinates of the sphere. Finally, after allowing the dog Sirius to open the way for us, we were given the figures to calculate precession more or less exactly.

Nor is Sirius, in his eternal station at Orion's heel, the only doggish character around Osiris. We saw in Chapter Eleven how Isis (who was both the wife and sister of Osiris[32]) searched for her dead husband's body after he had been murdered by Set (who, incidentally, was also her brother, and the brother of Osiris). In this search, according to ancient tradition, she was assisted by dogs (jackals in some versions).[33] Likewise, mythological and religious texts from all periods of Egyptian history assert that the jackal-god Anubis ministered to the spirit of Osiris after his death and acted as his guide through the underworld.[34] (Surviving vignettes depict Anubis as virtually identical in appearance to Upuaut, the Opener of the Ways.)

Last but not least, Osiris himself was believed to have taken the form of a wolf when he returned from the underworld to assist his son Horus in the final battle against Set.[35]

Investigating this kind of material, one sometimes has the spooky sense of being manipulated by an ancient intelligence which has found a way to reach out to us across vast epochs of time, and for some reason has set us a puzzle to solve in the language of myth.

If it were just dogs that kept cropping up again and again, it would be easy to brush off such weird intuitions. The dog phenomenon seems more likely to be coincidence than anything else. But it isn't just dogs.

The ways between the two very different myths of Osiris and Amlodhi's Mill (which nonetheless both seem to contain accurate scientific data about precession of the equinoxes) are kept open by another strange common factor. Family relationships are involved. Amlodhi/Amleth/Hamlet is always a son who revenges the murder of his father by entrapping and killing the murderer. The murderer, furthermore, is always the father's own brother, i.e., Hamlet's uncle.[36]

This is precisely the scenario of the Osiris myth. Osiris and Seth are brothers.[37] Seth murders Osiris. Horus, the son of Osiris, then takes revenge upon his uncle.[38]

Another twist is that the Hamlet character often has some sort of incestuous relationship with his sister.[39] In the case of Kullervo, the Finnish Hamlet, there is a poignant scene in which the hero, returning home after a long absence, meets a maiden in the woods, gathering berries. They lie together. Only later do they discover that they are brother and sister. The maiden drowns herself at once. Later, with 'the black dog Musti' padding along at his heels, Kullervo wanders into the forest and throws himself upon his sword.[40]

There are no suicides in the Egyptian myth of Osiris, but there is the incest of Osiris and his sister Isis. Out of their union is born Horus the avenger.

So once again it seems reasonable to ask: what is going on? Why are there all these apparent links and connections? Why do we have these 'strings' of myths, ostensibly about different subjects, all of which prove capable in their own ways of shedding light on the phenomenon of precession of the equinoxes? And why do all these myths have dogs running through them, and characters who seem unusually inclined to incest, fratricide and revenge? It surely drives scepticism beyond its limits to suggest that so many identical literary devices could keep on turning up purely by chance in so many different contexts.

If not by chance, however, then who exactly was responsible for creating this intricate and clever connecting pattern? Who were the authors and designers of the puzzle and what motives might they have had?

Scientists with something to say

Whoever it was, they must have been smart—smart enough to have observed the infinitesimal creep of precessional motion along the ecliptic and to have calculated its rate at a value uncannily close to that obtained by today's advanced technology.

It therefore follows that we are talking about highly civilized people. Indeed, we are talking about people who deserve to be called scientists. They must, moreover, have lived in extremely remote antiquity because we can be certain that the creation and dissemination of the common heritage of precessional myths on both sides of the Atlantic did not take place in historic times. On the contrary the evidence suggests that all these myths were 'tottering with age' when what we call history began about 5000 years ago.[41]

The great strength of the ancient stories was this: as well as being for ever available for use and adaptation free of copyright, like intellectual chameleons, subtle and ambiguous, they had the capacity to change their colour according to their surroundings. At different times, in different continents, the ancient tales could be retold in a variety of ways, but would always retain their essential symbolism and always continue to transmit the coded precessional data they had been programmed with at the outset.

But to what end?

As we see in the next chapter, the long slow cycles of precession are not limited in their consequences to a changing view of the sky. This celestial phenomenon, born of the earth's axial wobble, has direct effects on the earth itself. In fact, it appears to be one of the principal correlates of the sudden onset of ice ages and their equally sudden and catastrophic decay.

Speaking to the Unborn

It is understandable that a huge range of myths from all over the ancient world should describe geological catastrophes in graphic detail. Mankind survived the horror of the last Ice Age, and the most plausible source for our enduring traditions of flooding and freezing, massive volcanism and devastating earthquakes is in the tumultuous upheavals unleashed during the great meltdown of 15,000 to 8000 BC. The final retreat of the ice sheets, and the consequent 300-400 foot rise in global sea levels, took place only a few thousand years before the beginning of the historical period. It is therefore not surprising that all our early civilizations should have retained vivid memories of the vast cataclysms that had terrified their forefathers.

Much harder to explain is the peculiar but distinctive way the myths of cataclysm seem to bear the intelligent imprint of a guiding hand.[1] Indeed the degree of convergence between such ancient stories is frequently remarkable enough to raise the suspicion that they must all have been 'written' by the same 'author'.

Could that author have had anything to do with the wondrous deity, or superhuman, spoken of in so many of the myths we have reviewed, who appears immediately after the world has been shattered by a horrifying geological catastrophe and brings comfort and the gifts of civilization to the shocked and demoralized survivors?

White and bearded, Osiris is the Egyptian manifestation of this universal figure, and it may not be an accident that one of the first acts he is remembered for in myth is the abolition of cannibalism among the primitive inhabitants of the Nile Valley.[2] Viracocha, in South America, was said to have begun his civilizing mission immediately after a great flood; Quetzalcoatl, the discoverer of maize, brought the benefits of crops, mathematics, astronomy and a refined culture to Mexico after the Fourth Sun had been overwhelmed by a destroying deluge.

Could these strange myths contain a record of encounters between scattered palaeolithic tribes which survived the last Ice Age and an as yet unidentified high civilization which passed through the same epoch?

[1] See Chapter Twenty-four for details of flood myths. The same kind of convergence among supposedly unconnected myths also occurs with regard to precession of the equinoxes. The mills, the characters who work and own and eventually break them, the brothers and nephews and uncles, the theme of revenge, the theme of incest, the dogs that flit silently from story to story, and the exact numbers needed to calculate precessional motion—all crop up everywhere, from culture to culture and from age to age, propagating themselves effortlessly along the jet-stream of time.

[2] Diodorus Siculus, Book I, 14:1-15, translated by C. H. Oldfather, Loeb Classical Library, London, 1989, pp. 47-9.

And could the myths be attempts to communicate?

A message in the bottle of time

'Of all the other stupendous inventions,' Galileo once remarked, > what sublimity of mind must have been his who conceived how to communicate his most secret thoughts to any other person, though very distant either in time or place, speaking with those who are in the Indies, speaking to those who are not yet born, nor shall be this thousand or ten thousand years? And with no greater difficulty than the various arrangements of two dozen little signs on paper? Let this be the seal of all the admirable inventions of men.[3]

If the 'precessional message' identified by scholars like Santillana, von Dechend and Jane Sellers is indeed a deliberate attempt at communication by some lost civilization of antiquity, how come it wasn't just written down and left for us to find? Wouldn't that have been easier than encoding it in myths? Perhaps.

Nevertheless, suppose that whatever the message was written on got destroyed or worn away after many thousands of years? Or suppose that the language in which it was inscribed was later forgotten utterly (like the enigmatic Indus Valley script, which has been studied closely for more than half a century but has so far resisted all attempts at decoding)? It must be obvious that in such circumstances a written legacy to the future would be of no value at all, because nobody would be able to make sense of it.

What one would look for, therefore, would be a universal language, the kind of language that would be comprehensible to any technologically advanced society in any epoch, even a thousand or ten thousand years into the future. Such languages are few and far between, but mathematics is one of them—and the city of Teotihuacan may be the calling-card of a lost civilization written in the eternal language of mathematics.

Geodetic data, related to the exact positioning of fixed geographical points and to the shape and size of the earth, would also remain valid and recognizable for tens of thousands of years, and might be most conveniently expressed by means of cartography (or in the construction of giant geodetic monuments like the Great Pyramid of Egypt, as we shall see).

Another 'constant' in our solar system is the language of time: the great but regular intervals of time calibrated by the inch-worm creep of precessional motion. Now, or ten thousand years in the future, a message that prints out numbers like 72 or 2160 or 4320 or 25,920 should be instantly intelligible to any civilization that has evolved a modest talent for mathematics and the ability to detect and measure the almost imperceptible reverse motion that the sun appears to make along the ecliptic against the background of the fixed stars (one degree in 71.6 years, 30 degrees in 2148 years, and so on).

[3] Galileo, cited in Hamlet's Mill, p. 10.

The sense that a correlation exists is strengthened by something else. It is neither as firm nor as definite as the number of syllables in the Rigveda; nevertheless, it feels relevant. Through powerful stylistic links and shared symbolism, myths to do with global cataclysms and with precession of the equinoxes quite frequently intermesh. A detailed interconnectedness exists between these two categories of tradition, both of which additionally bear what appear to be the recognizable fingerprints of a conscious design. Quite naturally, therefore, one is prompted to discover whether there might not be an important connection between precession of the equinoxes and global catastrophes.

Although several different mechanisms of an astronomical and geological nature seem to be involved, and although not all of these are fully understood, the fact is that the cycle of precession does correlate very strongly with the onset and demise of ice ages.

Several trigger factors must coincide, which is why not every shift from one astronomical age to another is implicated. Nevertheless, it is accepted that precession does have an impact on both glaciation and deglaciation, at widely separated intervals. The knowledge that it does so has only been established by our own science since the late 1970s.[4] Yet the evidence of the myths suggests that the same level of knowledge might have been possessed by an as yet unidentified civilization in the depths of the last Ice Age. The clear suggestion we may be meant to grasp is that the terrible cataclysms of flood and fire and ice which the myths describe were in some way causally connected to the ponderous movements of the celestial coordinates through the great cycle of the zodiac. In the words of Santillana and von Dechend, 'It was not a foreign idea to the ancients that the mills of the gods grind slowly and that the result is usually pain.'[5]

Three principal factors, all of which we have met before, are now known to be deeply implicated in the onset and the retreat of ice ages (together, of course, with the diverse cataclysms that ensue from sudden freezes and thaws). These factors all have to do with variations in the earth's orbital geometry. They are:

1 The obliquity of the ecliptic (i.e., the angle of tilt of the planet's axis of rotation, which is also the angle between the celestial equator and the ecliptic). This, as we have seen, varies over immensely long periods of time between 22.1 degrees (the closest point that the axis reaches to vertical) and 24.5 degrees (the furthest it falls away from the vertical);

2. The eccentricity of the orbit (i.e., whether the earth's elliptical path around the sun is more or less elongated in any given epoch);

3. Axial precession, which causes the four cardinal points on the earth's orbit (the two equinoxes and the winter and summer solstices) to creep backwards very, very slowly around the orbital path.

We are dipping our toes into the waters of a technical and specialized scientific discipline here—one largely outside the scope of this book. Readers seeking detailed information are referred to the multidisciplinary work of the US National Science Foundation's CLIMAP Project, and to a keynote paper by Professors J. D. Hays and John Imbrie entitled 'Variations in the Earth's Orbit: Pacemaker of the Ice Ages' (see Note 4).

Briefly, what Hays, Imbrie and others have proved is that the onset of ice ages can be predicted when the following evil and inauspicious conjunctions of celestial cycles occur: (a) maximum eccentricity, which takes the earth millions of miles further away from the sun at 'aphelion' (the extremity of its orbit) than is normal; (b) minimum obliquity, which means that the earth's axis, and consequently the North and South poles, stand much closer to the vertical than is normal; and (c) precession of the equinoxes which, as the great cycle continues, eventually causes winter in one hemisphere or the other to set in when the earth is at 'perihelion' (its closest point to the sun); this in turn means that summer occurs at aphelion and is thus relatively cold, so that ice laid down in winter fails to melt during the following summer and a remorseless build-up of glacial conditions occurs.[6]

Levered by the changing geometry of the orbit, 'global insolation'—the differing amounts and intensity of sunlight received at various latitudes in any given epoch—can thus be an important trigger factor for ice ages.

Is it possible that the ancient myth-makers were trying to warn us of great danger when they so intricately linked the pain of global cataclysms to the slow grinding of the mill of heaven?

This is a question we will return to in due course, but meanwhile it is enough to observe that by identifying the significant effects of orbital geometry on the planet's climate and wellbeing, and by combining this information with precise measurements of the rate of precessional motion, the unknown scientists of an unrecognized civilization seem to have found a way to catch our attention, to bridge the chasm of the ages, and to communicate with us directly.

Whether or not we listen to what they have to say is, of course, entirely up to us.

Part VI

The Giza Invitation

Chapter 33

Cardinal Points

Giza, Egypt, 16 March 1993, 3:30 a.m.

We walked through the deserted lobby of our hotel and stepped into the white Fiat waiting for us in the driveway outside. It was driven by a lean, nervous Egyptian named Ali whose job it was to get us past the guards at the Great Pyramid and away again before sunrise. He was nervous because if things went wrong Santha and I would be deported from Egypt and he would go to jail for six months.

Of course, things were not supposed to go wrong. That was why Ali was with us. The day before we'd paid him 150 US dollars which he had changed into Egyptian pounds and spread among the guards concerned. They, in return, had agreed to turn a blind eye to our presence during the next couple of hours.

We drove to within half a mile of the Pyramid, then walked the rest of the way—around the side of the steep embankment that looms above the village of Nazlet-el-Samaan and leads to the monument's north face. None of us said very much as we trudged through the soft sand just out of range of the security lights. We felt excited and apprehensive at the same time. Ali was by no means certain that his bribes were going to work.

For a while we stood still in the shadows, gazing at the monstrous bulk of the Pyramid reaching into the darkness above us and blotting out the southern stars. Then a patrol of three men armed with shotguns and wrapped in blankets against the night chill came into view at the northeastern corner, about fifty yards away, where they stopped to share a cigarette. Indicating that we should stay put, Ali stepped forward into the light and walked over to the guards. He talked to them for several minutes, apparently arguing heatedly. Finally he beckoned to us, indicating that we should join him.

'There's a problem,' he explained. 'One of them, the captain here, [he indicated a short, unshaven, disgruntled looking fellow] is insisting that we pay an extra thirty dollars otherwise the deal is off. What do you want to do?' I fished around in my wallet, counted out thirty dollars and handed the bills to Ali. He folded them and passed them to the captain. With an air of aggrieved dignity, the captain stuffed the money into his shirt pocket, and, finally, we all shook hands.

'OK,' said Ali, 'let's go.'

Inexplicable precision

As the guards continued their patrol in a westerly direction along the northern face of the Great Pyramid, we made our way around the northeastern corner and along the base of the eastern face.

I had long ago fallen into the habit of orienting myself according to the monument’s sides. The northern face was aligned, almost perfectly, to true north, the eastern face almost perfectly to true east, the southern to true south, and the western face to true west. The average error was only around three minutes of arc (down to less than two minutes on the southern face)[1]—incredible accuracy for any building in any epoch, and an inexplicable, almost supernatural feat here in Egypt 4500 years ago when the Great Pyramid was supposed to have been built.

An error of three arc minutes represents an infinitesimal deviation from true of less than 0.015 per cent. In the opinion of structural engineers, with whom I had discussed the Great Pyramid, the need for such precision was impossible to understand. From their point of view as practical builders, the expense, difficulty and time spent achieving it would not have been justified by the apparent results: even if the base of the monument had been as much as two or three degrees out of true (an error of say 1 per cent) the difference to the naked eye would still have been too small to be noticeable. On the other hand the difference in the magnitude of the tasks required (to achieve accuracy within three minutes as opposed to three degrees) would have been immense.

Overview of Giza from the north looking south, with the Great Pyramid in the foreground.

Obviously, therefore, the ancient master-builders who had raised the Pyramid at the very dawn of human civilization must have had powerful motives for wanting to get the alignments with the cardinal directions just right. Moreover, since they had achieved their objective with uncanny exactness they must have been highly skilled, knowledgeable and competent people with access to excellent surveying and setting-out equipment. This impression was confirmed by many of the monument's other characteristics. For example, its sides at the base were all almost exactly the same length, demonstrating a margin of error far smaller than modern architects would be required to achieve today in the construction of, say, an average-size office block. This was no office block, however. It was the Great Pyramid of Egypt, one of the largest structures ever built by man and one of the oldest. Its north side was 755 feet 4.9818 inches in length; its west side was 755 feet 9.1551 inches in length; its east side was 755 feet 10.4937 inches; its south side 756 feet 0.9739 inches.[2] This meant that there was a difference of less than 8 inches between its shortest and longest sides: an error amounting to a tiny fraction of 1 per cent on an average side length of over 9063 inches.

Once again, I knew from an engineering perspective that the bare figures did not do justice to the enormous care and skill required to achieve them. I knew, too, that scholars had not yet come up with a convincing explanation of exactly how the Pyramid builders had adhered consistently to such high standards of precision.[3]

[2] J. H. Cole, Survey of Egypt, paper no. 39: 'The Determination of the Exact Size and Orientation of the Great Pyramid of Giza', Cairo, 1925.

What really interested me, however, was the even bigger question-mark over another issue: why had they imposed such exacting standards on themselves? If they had permitted a margin of error of 1-2 per cent—instead of less than one-tenth of 1 per cent—they could have simplified their tasks with no apparent loss of quality. Why hadn't they done so? Why had they insisted on making everything so difficult? Why, in short, in a supposedly 'primitive' stone monument built more than 4500 years ago were we seeing this strange, obsessional adherence to machine-age standards of precision?

Black hole in history

Our plan was to climb the Great Pyramid—something that had been strictly illegal since 1983 when the messy falls of several foolhardy tourists had forced the government of Egypt to impose a ban. I realized that we were being foolhardy too (particularly in attempting the climb at night) and I didn't feel good about breaking what was basically a sensible law. By this stage, however, my intense interest in the Pyramid, and my desire to learn everything I could about it, had over-ridden my common sense.

Now, after parting company with the guard patrol at the north-eastern corner of the monument, we continued to make our way surreptitiously along the eastern face towards the south-eastern corner.

There were dense shadows among the twisted and broken paving stones that separated the Great Pyramid from the three much smaller 'subsidiary' pyramids lying immediately to its east. There were also three deep and narrow rock-cut pits which resembled giant graves. These had been found empty by the archaeologists who had excavated them, but were shaped as though they had been intended to enclose the hulls of high-prowed, streamlined boats.

Roughly halfway along the Pyramid's eastern face we encountered another patrol. This time it consisted of two guards, one of whom must have been eighty years old. His companion, a teenager with pustulant acne, informed us that the money Ali had paid was insufficient and that fifty more Egyptian pounds would be required if we were to proceed. I already had the notes in my hand and gave them to the lad without delay. I was past caring how much this was costing; I just wanted to make the climb and get down and away before dawn without being arrested.

[3] The conventional explanations, as given in The Pyramids of Egypt, for example, are entirely unsatisfactory, as Edwards himself admits; see pp. 85-7, 206-41.

We walked on, reaching the south-eastern corner at a little after 4:15 a.m.

Very few modern buildings, even the houses we live in, have corners that consist of perfect ninety degree right angles; it is common for them to be a degree or more out of true. It doesn't make any difference structurally and nobody notices such minute errors. In the case of the Great Pyramid, however, I knew that the ancient master-builders had found a way to narrow the margin of error to almost nothing. Thus, while falling short of the perfect ninety degrees, the south-eastern corner achieved an impressive 89° 56' 27". The north-eastern corner measured 90° 3' 2"; the southwestern 90° 0' 33", and the north-western was just two seconds of a degree out of true at 89° 59' 58".[4]

This was, of course, extraordinary. And like almost everything else about the Great Pyramid it was also extremely difficult to explain. Such accurate building techniques—as accurate as the best we have today—could have evolved only after thousands of years of development and experimentation. Yet there was no evidence that any process of this kind had ever taken place in Egypt. The Great Pyramid and its neighbours at Giza had emerged out of a black hole in architectural history so deep and so wide that neither its bottom nor its far side had ever been identified.

Ships in the desert

Guided by the increasingly perspiring Ali, who had not yet explained why it was necessary for us to circumnavigate the Pyramid before climbing it, we now began to make our way in a westerly direction along the monument's southern side. Here there were two further boat-shaped pits, one of which, although still sealed, had been investigated with fibre-optic cameras and was known to contain a high-prowed sea-going vessel more than 100 feet long. The other pit had been excavated in the 1950s. Its contents—an even larger seagoing vessel, a full 141 feet in length[5]—had been placed in the so-called Boat Museum, an ugly modern structure that gangled on stilts beneath the south face of the Pyramid.

Made of cedarwood, the beautiful ship in the museum was still in perfect condition 4500 years after it had been built. With a displacement of around 40 tons, its design was particularly thought-provoking, incorporating, in the words of one expert, 'all the sea-going ship's characteristic properties, with prow and stern soaring upward, higher than in a Viking ship, to ride out the breakers and high seas, not to contend with the little ripples of the Nile.'[6]

Another authority felt that the careful and clever design of this strange pyramid boat could potentially have made it 'a far more seaworthy craft than anything available to Columbus'.[7] Moreover, the experts agreed that it had been built to a pattern that could only have been 'created by shipbuilders from a people with a long, solid tradition of sailing on the open sea.'[8]

Present at the very beginning of Egypt's 3000-year history, who had those as yet unidentified shipbuilders been? They had not accumulated their 'long, solid tradition of sailing on the open sea' while ploughing the fields of the landlocked Nile Valley. So where and when had they developed their maritime skills?

There was yet another puzzle. I knew that the Ancient Egyptians had been very good at making scale models and representations of all manner of things for symbolic purposes.[9] I therefore found it hard to understand why they would have gone to the trouble of manufacturing and then burying a boat as big and sophisticated as this if its only function, as the Egyptologists claimed, had been as a token of the spiritual vessel that would carry the soul of the deceased king to heaven.[10] That could have been achieved as effectively with a much smaller craft, and only one would have been needed, not several. Logic therefore suggested that these gigantic vessels might have been intended for some other purpose altogether, or had some quite different and still unsuspected symbolic significance ...

We had reached the rough midpoint of the southern face of the Great Pyramid when we at last realized why we were being taken on this long walkabout. The objective was for us to be relieved of moderate sums of money at each of the four cardinal points. The tally thus far was 30 US dollars at the northern face and 50 Egyptian pounds at the eastern face. Now I shelled out a further 50 Egyptian pounds to yet another patrol Ali was supposed to have paid off the day before.

'Ali,' I hissed, 'when are we going to climb the Pyramid?'

'Right away, Mr. Graham,' our guide replied. He walked confidently forward, gesturing directly ahead, then added, 'We shall ascend at the south-west corner ...'

Mansion of Eternity

Have you ever climbed a pyramid, at night, fearful of arrest, with your nerves in shreds?

It's a surprisingly difficult thing to do, especially where the Great Pyramid is concerned. Even though its top 31 feet are no longer intact, its presently exposed summit platform still stands more than 450 feet above ground level.[1] It consists, moreover, of 203 separate courses of masonry, with the average course height being about two and a quarter feet.[2]

Averages do not tell you everything, as I discovered soon after we began the climb. The courses turned out to be of unequal depth, some barely reaching knee level while others came up almost to my chest and created formidable obstacles. At the same time the horizontal ledges between each of the steps were very narrow, often only a little wider than my foot, and many of the big limestone blocks, which had looked so solid from below, proved to be crumbling and broken.

Somewhere around 30 courses up Santha and I began to appreciate what we had let ourselves in for. Our muscles were aching and our knees and fingers stiff and bruised—yet we were barely one-seventh of the way to the summit and there were still more than 170 courses to climb. Another worry was the vertiginous drop steadily opening beneath us. Looking down along the ruptured contours that marked the line of the southwestern corner, I was taken aback to see how far we had already climbed and experienced a momentary, giddying presentiment of how easy it would be for us to fall, head over heels like Jack and Jill, bouncing and jolting over the huge layers of stone, breaking our crowns at the bottom.

Ali had permitted a pause of a few moments for us to catch our breaths, but now he signalled that we should press on and began to climb again. Still using the corner as a guideline, he rapidly disappeared into the darkness above.

Somewhat less confidently, Santha and I followed.

Time and motion

The 35th course of masonry was a hard one to clamber over, being made of particularly massive blocks, much larger than any of the others we had so far encountered (except those at the very base) and estimated to weigh between 10 and 15 tons apiece.[3] This contradicted engineering logic and commonsense, both of which called for a progressive decrease in the size and weight of the blocks that had to be transported to the summit as the pyramid rose ever higher. Courses 1-18, which diminished from a height of about 55.5 inches at ground level to just over 23 inches at course 17, did obey this rule. Then suddenly, at course 19, the block height rose again to almost 36 inches. At the same time the other dimensions of the blocks also increased and their weight grew from the relatively manoeuvrable range of 2-6 tons that was common in the first 18 courses to the more ponderous and cumbersome range of 10-15 tons.[4] These, therefore, were really big monoliths that had been carved out of solid limestone and raised more than 100 feet into the air before being placed faultlessly in position.

To have worked effectively the pyramid builders must have had nerves of steel, the agility of mountain goats, the strength of lions and the confidence of trained steeplejacks. With the cold morning wind whipping around my ears and threatening to launch me into flight, I tried to imagine what it must have been like for them, poised dangerously at this (and much higher) altitudes, lifting, manoeuvring and positioning exactly an endless production line of chunky limestone monoliths—the smallest of which weighed as much as two modern family cars.

How long had the pyramid taken to complete? How many men had worked on it? The consensus among Egyptologists was two decades and 100,000 men.[5] It was also generally agreed that the construction project had not been a year-round affair but had been confined (through labour force availability) to the annual three-month agricultural lay-off season imposed by the flooding of the Nile.[6]

As I continued to climb, I reminded myself of the implications of all this. It wasn't just the tens of thousands of blocks weighing 15 tons or more that the builders would have had to worry about. Year in, year out, the real crises would have been caused by the millions of 'average-sized' blocks, weighing say 2.5 tons, that also had to be brought to the working plane. The Pyramid has been reliably estimated to consist of a total of 2.3 million blocks.[7] Assuming that the masons worked ten hours a day, 365 days a year, the mathematics indicate that they would have needed to place 31 blocks in position every hour (about one block every two minutes) to complete the Pyramid in twenty years. Assuming that construction work had been confined to the annual three-month lay-off, the problems multiplied: four blocks a minute would have had to be delivered, about 240 every hour.

Such scenarios are, of course, the stuff construction managers' nightmares are made of. Imagine, for example, the daunting degree of coordination that must have been maintained between the masons and the quarries to ensure the requisite rate of block flow across the production site. Imagine also the havoc if even a single 2.5 ton block had been dropped from, say, the 175th course.

The physical and managerial obstacles seemed staggering on their own, but beyond these was the geometrical challenge represented by the pyramid itself, which had to end up with its apex positioned exactly over the centre of its base. Even the minutest error in the angle of incline of any one of the sides at the base would have led to a substantial misalignment of the edges at the apex. Incredible accuracy, therefore, had to be maintained throughout, at every course, hundreds of feet above the ground, with great stone blocks of killing weight.

Rampant stupidity

How had the job been done?

At the last count there were more than thirty competing and conflicting theories attempting to answer that question. The majority of academic Egyptologists have argued that ramps of one kind or another must have been used. This was the opinion, for example, of Professor I.E.S Edwards, a former keeper of Egyptian Antiquities at the British Museum who asserted categorically: 'Only one method of lifting heavy weights was open to the ancient Egyptians, namely by means of ramps composed of brick and earth which sloped upwards from the level of the ground to whatever height was desired.'[8]

John Baines, professor of Egyptology at Oxford University, agreed with Edwards's analysis and took it further: 'As the pyramid grew in height, the length of the ramp and the width of its base were increased in order to maintain a constant gradient (about 1 in 10) and to prevent the ramp from collapsing. Several ramps approaching the pyramid from different sides were probably used.'[9]

To carry an inclined plane to the top of the Great Pyramid at a gradient of 1:10 would have required a ramp 4800 feet long and more than three times as massive as the Great Pyramid itself (with an estimated volume of 8 million cubic metres as against the Pyramid's 2.6 million cubic metres).[10] Heavy weights could not have been dragged up any gradient steeper than this by any normal means.[11] If a lesser gradient had been chosen, the ramp would have had to be even more absurdly and disproportionately massive.

[10] Peter Hodges and Julian Keable, How the Pyramids Were Built, Element Books, Shaftesbury, 1989, p. 123.

The problem was that mile-long ramps reaching a height of 480 feet could not have been made out of ‘bricks and earth’ as Edwards and other Egyptologists supposed. On the contrary, modern builders and architects had proved that such ramps would have caved in under their own weight if they had consisted of any material less costly and less stable than the limestone ashlars of the Pyramid itself.[12]

Since this obviously made no sense (besides, where had the 8 million cubic metres of surplus blocks been taken after completion of the work?), other Egyptologists had proposed the use of spiral ramps made of mud brick and attached to the sides of the Pyramid. These would certainly have required less material to build, but they would also have failed to reach the top.[13] They would have presented deadly and perhaps insurmountable problems to the teams of men attempting to drag the big blocks of stone around their hairpin corners. And they would have crumbled under constant use. Most problematic of all, such ramps would have cloaked the whole pyramid, thus making it impossible for the architects to check the accuracy of the setting-out during building.[14]

But the pyramid builders had checked the accuracy of the setting out, and they had got it right, because the apex of the pyramid was poised exactly over the centre of the base, its angles and its corners were true, each block was in the correct place, and each course had been laid down level—in near-perfect symmetry and with near-perfect alignment to the cardinal points. Then, as though to demonstrate that such tours-de-force of technique were mere trifles, the ancient master-builders had gone on to play some clever mathematical games with the monument’s dimensions, presenting us, for example, as we saw in Chapter Twenty-three, with an accurate use of the transcendental number pi in the ratio of its height to its base perimeter.[15] For some reason, too, it had taken their fancy to place the Great Pyramid almost exactly on the 30th parallel at latitude 29° 58’ 51”. This, as a former astronomer royal of Scotland once observed, was ‘a sensible defalcation from 30°’, but not necessarily in error:

> For if the original designer had wished that men should see with their body, rather than their mental eyes, the pole of the sky from the foot of the Great Pyramid, at an altitude before them of 30°, he would have had to take account of the refraction of the atmosphere; and that would have necessitated the building standing not at 30° but at 29° 58’ 22”.[16]

Compared to the true position of 29° 58’ 51”, this was an error of less than half an arc minute, suggesting once again that the surveying and geodetic skills brought to bear here must have been of the highest order.

Feeling somewhat overawed, we climbed on, past the 44th and 45th courses of the hulking and enigmatic structure. At the 40th course an angry voice hailed us in Arabic from the plaza below and we looked down to see a tiny, turbaned man dressed in a billowing kaftan. Despite the range, he had unslung his shotgun and was preparing to take aim at us.

The guardian and the vision

He was, of course, the guardian of the Pyramid’s western face, the patrolman of the fourth cardinal point, and he had not received the extra funds dispensed to his colleagues of the north, east and south faces.

I could tell from Ali’s perspiration that we were in a potentially tricky situation. The guard was ordering us to come down at once so that he could place us under arrest. ‘This, however, could probably be avoided with a further payment,’ Ali explained.

I groaned. ‘Offer him 100 Egyptian pounds.’

‘Too much,’ Ali cautioned, ‘it will make the others resentful. I shall offer him 50.’

More words were exchanged in Arabic. Indeed, over the next few minutes, Ali and the guard managed to have quite a sustained conversation up and down the south-western corner of the Pyramid at 4:40 in the morning. At one point a whistle was blown. Then the guards of the southern face put in a brief appearance and stood in conference with the guard of the western face, who had now also been joined by the two other members of his patrol.

Just when it seemed that Ali had lost whatever argument he was having on our behalf, he smiled and heaved a sigh of relief. ‘You will pay the extra 50 pounds when we have returned to the ground,’ he explained. ‘They’re letting us continue but they say that if any senior officer comes along and sees us they will not be able to help us.’

We struggled upwards in silence for the next ten minutes or so until we had reached the tooth course—roughly the halfway mark and already well over 250 feet above the ground. We gazed over our shoulders to the southwest, where a once-in-a-lifetime vision of staggering beauty and power confronted us. The crescent moon, which hung low in the sky to the south-east, had emerged from behind a scudding cloud bank and projected its ghostly radiance directly at the northern and eastern faces of the neighbouring Second Pyramid, supposedly built by the Fourth

Dynasty Pharaoh Khafre (Chephren). This stunning monument, second only in size and majesty to the Great Pyramid itself (being just a few feet shorter and 48 feet narrower at the base) appeared lit up, as though energized from within, by a pale and unearthly fire. Behind it in the distance, slightly offset among the dark desert shadows, was the smaller Pyramid of Menkaure (Mycerinus), measuring 356 feet along each side and some 215 feet in height.[17]

For a moment, against the glittering backdrop of the inky sky, I experienced the illusion of being in motion, of standing at the stern of some great ship of the heavens and looking back at two other vessels which seemed to follow in my wake, strung out in battle order behind me.

So where was this convoy going, this squadron of pyramids? And were the prodigious structures all the work of megalomaniac pharaohs, as the Egyptologists believed? Or had they been designed by mysterious hands to voyage eternally through time and space towards some as yet unidentified objective?

From this altitude, though the southern sky was partially occluded by the vast bulk of the Pyramid of Khafre, I could see all the western sky as it arched down from the celestial north pole towards the distant rim of the revolving planet. Polaris, the Pole Star, was far to my right, in the constellation of the Little Bear. Low on the horizon, about ten degrees north of west, Regulus, the paw-star of the imperial constellation of Leo, was about to set.

Under Egyptian skies

Just above the 150th course, Ali hissed at us to keep our heads down. A police car had come into view around the north-western corner of the Great Pyramid and was now proceeding along the western flank of the monument with its blue light slowly flashing. We stayed motionless in the shadows until the car had passed. Then we began to climb again, with a renewed sense of urgency, heading as fast as we could towards the summit, which we now imagined we could see jutting out above the misty predawn haze.

For what seemed like five minutes we climbed without stopping. When I looked up, however, the top of the Pyramid still seemed as far away as ever. We climbed again, panting and sweating, and once again the summit drew back before us like some legendary Welsh peak. Then, just when we'd resigned ourselves to an endless succession of such disappointments, we found ourselves at the top, under a breathtaking canopy of stars, more than 450 feet above the surrounding plateau on the most extraordinary viewing platform in the world. To our north and east, sprawled out across the wide, sloping valley of the River Nile, lay the city of Cairo, a jumble of skyscrapers and flat traditional roofs separated by the dark defiles of narrow streets and interspersed with the needle-point minarets of a thousand and one mosques. A film of reflected street-lighting shimmered over the whole scene, closing the eyes of modern Cairenes to the wonder of the stars but at the same time creating the hallucination of a fairyland illuminated in greens and reds and blues and sulphurous yellows.

I felt privileged to witness this strange, electronic mirage from such an incredible vantage point, perched on the summit platform of the last surviving wonder of the ancient world, hovering in the sky over Cairo like Aladdin on his magic carpet.

Not that the 203rd course of the Great Pyramid of Egypt could be described as a carpet! Measuring just under 30 feet on each side (as against the monument's side length of around 755 feet at the base) it consisted of several hundred waist-high limestone blocks, each of which weighed about five tons. The course was not completely level: a few blocks were missing or broken, and rising towards the southern end there were the substantial remains of about half an additional step of masonry. Moreover, at the very centre of the platform, someone had arranged for a triangular wooden scaffold to be erected, through the middle of which rose a thick pole, just over 31 feet long, which marked the monument's original true height of 481.3949 feet.[18] Beneath this a scrawl of graffiti had been carved into the limestone by generations of tourists.[19]

The complete ascent of the Pyramid had taken us about half an hour and it was now just after 5 a.m., the time of morning worship. Almost in unison, the voices of a thousand and one muezzins rang out from the balconies of the minarets of Cairo, calling the faithful to prayer and reaffirming the greatness, the indivisibility, the mercy and the compassion of God. Behind me, to the south-west, the top 22 courses of Khafre's Pyramid, still clad with their original facing stones, seemed to float like an iceberg on the ocean of moonlight.

Knowing that we could not stay long in this bewitching place, I sat down and gazed around at the heavens. Over to the west, across limitless desert sands, Regulus had now set beneath the horizon, and the rest of the lion's body was poised to follow. The constellations of Virgo and Libra were also dropping lower in the sky and, much farther to the north, I could see the Great and Little Bears slowly pacing out their eternal cycle around the celestial pole.

I looked south-east across the Nile Valley and there was the crescent moon still spreading its spectral radiance from the bank of the Milky Way.

[19] 'One is irritated by the number of imbeciles' names written everywhere,' Gustave Flaubert commented in his Letters From Egypt. 'On the top of the Great Pyramid there is a certain Buffard, 79 rue St Martin, wallpaper manufacturer, in black letters.'

Following the course of the celestial river, I looked due south: there, crossing the meridian, was the resplendent constellation of Scorpius dominated by the first-magnitude star Antares—a red supergiant 300 times the diameter of the sun. North-east, above Cairo, sailed Cygnus the swan, his tail feathers marked by Deneb, a blue-white supergiant visible to us across more than 1800 light years of interstellar space. Last but not least, in the northern sky, the dragon Draco coiled sinuously among the circumpolar stars. Indeed, 4500 years ago, when the Great Pyramid was supposedly being built for the Fourth Dynasty Pharaoh Khufu (Cheops), one of the stars of Draco had stood close to the celestial north pole and had served as the Pole Star. This had been alpha Draconis, also known as Thuban. With the passing of the millennia, however, it had gradually been displaced from its position by the remorseless celestial mill of the earth's axial precession so that the Pole Star today is Polaris in the Little Bear.[20]

I lay back, cushioned my head in my hands and gazed directly up towards the zenith of heaven. Through the smooth cold stones I rested on, I thought I could sense beneath me, like a living force, the stupendous gravity and mass of the pyramid.

Thinking like giants

Covering a full 13.1 acres at the base, it weighed about six million tons—more than all the buildings in the Square Mile of the City of London added together,[21] and consisted, as we have seen, of roughly 2.3 million individual blocks of limestone and granite. To these had once been added a 22-acre, mirror-like cladding consisting of an estimated 115,000 highly polished casing stones, each weighing 10 tons, which had originally covered all four of its faces.[22]

After being shaken loose by a massive earthquake in AD 1301, the majority of the facing blocks had subsequently been removed for the construction of Cairo.[23] Here and there around the base, however, I knew that enough had remained in position to permit the great nineteenth century archaeologist, W.M. Flinders Petrie, to carry out a detailed study of them. He had been stunned to encounter tolerances of less than one-hundredth of an inch and cemented joints so precise and so carefully aligned that it was impossible to slip even the fine blade of a pocket knife between them. 'Merely to place such stones in exact contact would be careful work', he admitted, 'but to do so with cement in the joint seems almost impossible; it is to be compared to the finest opticians' work on a scale of acres.'[24]

Of course, the jointing of the casing stones was by no means the only 'almost impossible' feature of the Great Pyramid. The alignments to true north, south, east and west were 'almost impossible', so too were the near- perfect ninety-degree corners, and the incredible symmetry of the four enormous sides. And so were the engineering logistics of raising millions of huge stones hundreds of feet in the air ...

Whoever they had been, therefore, the architects, engineers and stonemasons who had designed and successfully built this stupendous monument must indeed have 'thought like men 100 feet tall', as Jean-François Champollion, the founder of modern Egyptology, had once observed. He had seen clearly what generations of his successors were to close their eyes to: that the pyramid builders could only have been men of giant intellectual stature. Beside the Egyptians of old, he had added, 'we in Europe are but Lilliputians.'[25]

Tombs and Tombs Only?

Climbing down the Great Pyramid was more nerve wracking than climbing up. We were no longer struggling against the force of gravity, so the physical effort was less. But the possibilities of a fatal fall seemed greatly magnified now that our attention was directed exclusively towards the ground rather than the heavens. We picked our way with exaggerated care towards the base of the enormous mountain of stone, sliding and slithering among the treacherous masonry blocks, feeling as though we had been reduced to ants.

By the time we had completed the descent the night was over and the first wash of pale sunlight was filtering into the sky. We paid the 50 Egyptian pounds promised to the guard of the pyramid’s western face and then, with a tremendous sense of release and exultation, we walked jauntily away from the monument in the direction of the Pyramid of Khafre, a few hundred metres to the south-west.

Khufu, Khafre, Menkaure ... Cheops, Chephren, Mycerinus. Whether they were referred to by their Egyptian or their Greek names, the fact remained that these three pharaohs of the Fourth Dynasty (2575-2467 BC) were universally acclaimed as the builders of the Giza pyramids. This had been the case at least since Ancient Egyptian tour guides had told the Greek historian Herodotus that the Great Pyramid had been built by Khufu. Herodotus had incorporated this information into the oldest surviving written description of the monuments, which continued:

> Cheops, they said, reigned for fifty years, and on his death the kingship was taken over by his brother Chephren. He also made a pyramid ... it is forty feet lower than his brother’s pyramid, but otherwise of the same greatness ... Chephren reigned for fifty-six years ... then there succeeded Mycerinus, the son of Cheops ... This man left a pyramid much smaller than his father’s.[1]

Herodotus saw the monuments in the fifth century BC, more than 2000 years after they had been built. Nevertheless it was largely on the foundation of his testimony that the entire subsequent judgement of history was based. All other commentators, up to the present, continued uncritically to follow in the Greek historian's footsteps. And down the ages—although it had originally been little more than hearsay—the attribution of the Great Pyramid to Khufu, the Second Pyramid to Khafre and the Third Pyramid to Menkaure had assumed the stature of unassailable fact.

Trivializing the mystery

Having parted company with Ali, Santha and I continued our walk into the desert. Skirting the immense south-western corner of the Second Pyramid, our eyes were drawn towards its summit. There we noted again the intact facing stones that still covered its top 22 courses. We also noticed that the first few courses above its base, each of which had a 'footprint' of about a dozen acres, were composed of truly massive blocks of limestone, almost too high to clamber over, which were about 20 feet long and 6 feet thick. These extraordinary monoliths, as I was later to discover, weighed 200 tons apiece and belonged to a distinct style of masonry to be found at several different and widely scattered locations within the Giza necropolis.

On its north and west sides the Second Pyramid sat on a level platform cut down out of the surrounding bedrock and was thus enclosed within a wide trench more than 15 feet deep in places. Walking due south, parallel to the monument's scarred western flank, we picked our way along the edge of this trench towards the much smaller Third Pyramid, which lay some 400 metres ahead of us in the desert.

Khufu ... Khafre ... Menkaure ... According to all orthodox Egyptologists the pyramids had been built as tombs—and only as tombs—for these three pharaohs. Yet there were some obvious difficulties with such assertions. For example, the spacious burial chamber of the Khafre Pyramid was empty when it was opened in 1818 by the European explorer Giovanni Belzoni. Indeed, more than empty, the chamber was starkly, austerely bare. The polished granite sarcophagus which lay embedded in its floor had also been found empty, with its lid broken into two pieces nearby.[2] How was this to be explained?

To Egyptologists the answer seemed obvious. At some early date, probably not many hundreds of years after Khafre's death, tomb robbers must have penetrated the chamber and cleared all its contents including the mummified body of the pharaoh.

Much the same thing seemed to have happened at the smaller Third Pyramid, towards which Santha and I were now walking—that attributed to Menkaure. Here the first European to break in had been a British colonel, Howard Vyse, who had entered the burial chamber in 1837. He found an empty basalt sarcophagus, an anthropoid coffin lid made of wood, and some bones. The natural assumption was that these were the remains of Menkaure. Modern science had subsequently proved, however, that the bones and coffin lid dated from the early Christian era, that is, from 2500 years after the Pyramid Age, and thus represented the 'intrusive burial' of a much later individual (quite a common practice throughout Ancient Egyptian history). As to the basalt sarcophagus—well, it could have belonged to Menkaure. Unfortunately, however, nobody had the opportunity to examine it because it had been lost at sea when the ship on which Vyse sent it to England had sunk off the coast of Spain.[3] Since it was a matter of record that the sarcophagus had been found empty by Vyse, it was once again assumed that the body of the pharaoh must have been removed by tomb robbers.

A similar assumption had been made about the body of Khufu, which was also missing. Here the scholarly consensus, expressed as well as anyone by George Hart of the British Museum, was that 'no later than 500 years after Khufu's funeral' robbers had forced their way into the Great Pyramid 'to steal the burial treasure'.[4] The implication is that this incursion must have occurred by or before 2000 BC—since Khufu is believed to have died in 2528 BC.[5] Moreover it was assumed by Professor I.E.S Edwards, a leading authority on these matters, that the burial treasure had been removed from the famous inner sanctum now known as the King's Chamber and that the empty 'granite sarcophagus' which stood at the western end of that sanctum had 'once contained the King's body, probably enclosed within an inner coffin made of wood'.[6]

All this is orthodox, mainstream, modern scholarship, which is unquestioningly accepted as historical fact and taught as such at universities everywhere.[7]

But suppose it isn't fact.

The cupboard was bare

The mystery of the missing mummy of Khufu begins with the records of Caliph Al-Ma'mun, a Muslim governor of Cairo in the ninth century AD. He had engaged a team of quarriers to tunnel their way into the pyramid's northern face, urging them on with promises that they would discover treasure. Through a series of lucky accidents 'Ma'mun's Hole', as archaeologists now refer to it, had joined up with one of the monument's several internal passageways, the 'descending corridor' leading downwards from the original concealed doorway in the northern face (the location of which, though known in classical times, had been forgotten by Ma'mun's day). By a further lucky accident the vibrations that the Arabs had caused with their battering rams and drills dislodged a block of limestone from the ceiling of the descending corridor. When the socket from which it had fallen was examined it was found to conceal the opening to another corridor, this time ascending into the heart of the pyramid.

There was a problem, however. The opening was blocked by a series of enormous plugs of solid granite, clearly contemporaneous with the construction of the monument, which were held in place by a narrowing of the lower end of the corridor.[8] The quarriers were unable either to break or to cut through the plugs. They therefore tunnelled into the slightly softer limestone surrounding them and, after several weeks of backbreaking toil, rejoined the ascending corridor higher up—having bypassed a formidable obstacle never before breached.

The implications were obvious. Since no previous treasure-seekers had penetrated this far, the interior of the pyramid must still be virgin territory. The diggers must have licked their lips with anticipation at the immense quantities of gold and jewels they could now expect to find. Similarly—though perhaps for different reasons, Ma'mun must have been impatient to be the first into any chambers that lay ahead. It was reported that his primary motive in initiating this investigation had not been an ambition to increase his vast personal wealth but a desire to gain access to a storehouse of ancient wisdom and technology which he believed to lie buried within the monument. In this repository, according to age-old tradition, the pyramid builders had placed 'instruments of iron and arms which rust not, and glasse which might be bended and yet not broken, and strange spells ...'[9]

The Great Pyramid: detail of corridors, shafts and chambers.

But Ma'mun and his men found nothing, not even any down-to-earth treasure—and certainly not any high-tech, anachronistic plastic or instruments of iron or rustproof weapons ... or strange spells either.

The erroneously named 'Queen's Chamber' (which lay at the end a long horizontal passageway that branched off from the ascending corridor) turned out to be completely empty—just a severe, geometrical room.[10]

More disappointing still, the King's Chamber (which the Arabs reached after climbing the imposing Grand Gallery) also offered little of interest. Its only furniture was a granite coffer just big enough to contain the body of a man. Later identified, on no very good grounds, as a 'sarcophagus', this undecorated stone box was approached with trepidation by Ma'mun and his team, who found it to be lidless and as empty as everything else in the pyramid.[11]

Why, how and when exactly had the Great Pyramid been emptied of its contents? Had it been 500 years after Khufu's death, as the Egyptologists suggested? Or was it not more likely, as the evidence was beginning to suggest, that the inner chambers of the pyramid had been empty all along, from the very beginning, that is, from the day that the monument had originally been sealed? Nobody, after all, had reached the upper part of the ascending corridor before Ma'mun and his men. And it was certain, too, that nobody had cut through the granite plugs blocking the entrance to that corridor.

Commonsense ruled out the possibility of any earlier incursion—unless there was another way in.

Bottlenecks in the well-shaft

There was another way in.

Farther down the descending corridor, more than 200 feet beyond the point where the plugged end of the ascending corridor had been found, lies the concealed entrance to another secret passageway, deep within the subterranean bedrock of the Giza plateau. If Ma'mun had discovered this passageway, he could have saved himself a great deal of trouble, since it provided a readymade route around the plugs blocking the ascending corridor. His attention, however, had been distracted by the challenge of tunnelling past those plugs, and he made no effort to investigate the lower reaches of the descending corridor (which he ended up using as a dump for the tons of stone his diggers removed from the core of the pyramid).[12]

The full extent of the descending corridor was, however, well-known and explored in classical times. The Graeco-Roman geographer Strabo left quite a clear description of the large subterranean chamber it debouched into (at a depth of almost 600 feet below the apex of the pyramid).[13] Graffiti from the period of the Roman occupation of Egypt was also found inside this underground chamber, confirming that it had once been regularly visited. Yet, because it had been so cunningly hidden in the beginning, the secret doorway leading off to one side about two-thirds of the way down the western wall of the descending corridor, remained sealed and undiscovered until the nineteenth century.[14]

What the doorway led to was a narrow well-shaft, about 160 feet in extent, which rose almost vertically through the bedrock and then through more than twenty complete courses of the Great Pyramid's limestone core blocks, until it joined up with the main internal corridor system at the base of the Grand Gallery. There is no evidence to indicate what the purpose of this strange architectural feature might have been (although several scholars have hazarded guesses).[15] Indeed the only thing that is clear is that it was engineered at the time of the construction of the pyramid and was not the result of an intrusion by tunnelling tomb-robbers.[16] The question remains open, however, as to whether tomb-robbers might have discovered the hidden entrance to the shaft, and made use of it to siphon off the treasures from the King's and Queen's Chambers.

Such a possibility cannot be ruled out. Nevertheless, a review of the historical record indicates little in its favour.

[15] In general, it is assumed to have been used as an escape route by workers sealed within the pyramid above the plugging blocks in the ascending passage.

[16] Because, over a distance of several hundred feet through solid masonry, it joins two narrow corridors. This could not have been achieved by accident.

For example, the upper end of the well-shaft was entered off the Grand Gallery by the Oxford astronomer John Greaves in 1638. He managed to descend to a depth of about sixty feet. In 1765 another Briton, Nathaniel Davison, penetrated to a depth of about 150 feet but found his way blocked by an impenetrable mass of sand and stones. Later, in the 1830s, Captain G.B. Caviglia, an Italian adventurer, reached the same depth and encountered the same obstacle. More enterprising than his predecessors, he hired Arab workers to start excavating the rubble in the hope that there might be something of interest beneath it. Several days of digging in claustrophobic conditions followed before the connection with the descending corridor was discovered.[17]

Is it likely that such a cramped, blocked-up shaft could have been a viable conduit for the treasures of Khufu, supposedly the greatest pharaoh of the magnificent Fourth Dynasty?

Even if it hadn't been choked with debris and sealed at the lower end, it could not have been used to bring out more than a tiny fraction of the treasures of a typical royal tomb. This is because the well-shaft is only three feet in diameter and incorporates several tricky vertical sections.

At the very least, therefore, when Ma'mun and his men battered their way into the King's Chamber around the year AD 820, one would have expected some of the bigger and heavier pieces from the original burial to be still in place—like the statues and shrines that bulked so large in Tutankhamen's much later and presumably inferior tomb.[18] But nothing was found inside Khufu's Pyramid, making this and the alleged looting of Khafre's monument the only tomb robberies in the history of Egypt which achieved a clean sweep, leaving not a single trace behind—not a torn cloth, not a shard of broken pottery, not an unwanted figurine, not an overlooked piece of jewellery—just the bare floors and walls and the gaping mouths of empty sarcophagi.

Not like other tombs

It was now after six in the morning and the rising sun had bathed the summits of Khufu's and Khafre's Pyramids with a fleeting blush of pastel-pink light. Menkaure's Pyramid, being some 200 feet lower than the other two, was still in shadow as Santha and I skirted its north-western corner and continued our walk into the rolling sand dunes of the surrounding desert.

I still had the tomb robbery theory on my mind. As far as I could see the only real 'evidence' in favour of it was the absence of grave goods and mummies that it had been invented to explain in the first place. All the other facts, particularly where the Great Pyramid was concerned, seemed to speak persuasively against any robbery having occurred. It was not just a matter of the narrowness and unsuitability of the well-shaft as an escape route for bulky treasures. The other remarkable feature of Khufu's Pyramid was the absence of inscriptions or decorations anywhere within its immense network of galleries, corridors, passageways and chambers, and the same was true of Khafre's and Menkaure's Pyramids. In none of these amazing monuments had a single word been written in praise of the pharaohs whose bodies they were supposed to house.

This was exceptional. No other proven burial place of any Egyptian monarch had ever been found undecorated. The fashion throughout Egyptian history had been for the tombs of the pharaohs to be extensively decorated, beautifully painted from top to bottom (as in the Valley of the Kings at Luxor, for example) and densely inscribed with the ritual spells and invocations required to assist the deceased on his journey towards eternal life (as in the Fifth Dynasty pyramids at Saqqara, just twenty miles to the south of Giza.)[19]

Why had Khufu, Khafre and Menkaure done things so differently? Had they not built their monuments to serve as tombs at all, but for another and more subtle purpose? Or was it possible, as certain Arab and esoteric traditions maintained, that the Giza pyramids had been erected long before the Fourth Dynasty by the architects of some earlier and more advanced civilization?

Neither hypothesis was popular with Egyptologists for reasons that were easy to understand. Moreover, while conceding that the Second and Third Pyramids were completely devoid of internal inscriptions, lacking even the names of Khafre and Menkaure, the scholars were able to cite certain hieroglyphic 'quarry marks' (graffiti daubed on stone blocks before they left the quarry) found inside the Great Pyramid, which did seem to bear the name of Khufu.

A certain smell ...

The discoverer of the quarry marks was Colonel Howard Vyse, during the destructive excavations he undertook at Giza in 1837. Extending an existing crawlway, he cut a tunnel into the series of narrow cavities, called 'relieving chambers', which lay directly above the King's Chamber. The quarry marks were found on the walls and ceilings of the top four of these cavities and said things like this:

THE CRAFTSMEN-GANG,
HOW POWERFUL IS THE WHITE CROWN OF KHNUM—

KHUFU
KHUFU
YEAR SEVENTEEN[20]

It was all very convenient. Right at the end of a costly and otherwise fruitless digging season, just when a major archaeological discovery was needed to legitimize the expenses he had run up, Vyse had stumbled upon the find of the decade—the first incontrovertible proof that Khufu had indeed been the builder of the hitherto anonymous Great Pyramid.

One would have thought that a discovery of this nature would have settled conclusively any lingering doubts over the ownership and purpose of that enigmatic monument. But the doubts remained, largely because, from the beginning, 'a certain smell' hung over Vyse's evidence:

1. It was odd that the marks were the only signs of the name Khufu ever found anywhere inside the Great Pyramid.[21]
2. It was odd that they had been found in such an obscure, out-of-the-way corner of that immense building.
3. It was odd that they had been found at all in a monument otherwise devoid of inscriptions of any kind.
4. And it was extremely odd that they had been found only in the top four of the five relieving chambers. Inevitably, suspicious minds began to wonder whether 'quarry marks' might also have appeared in the lowest of these five chambers had that chamber, too, been discovered by Vyse (rather than by Nathaniel Davison seventy years earlier).[22]
5. Last but not least it was odd that several of the hieroglyphs in the 'quarry marks' had been painted upside down, and that some were unrecognizable while others had been misspelt or used ungrammatically.[23]

Was Vyse a forger?

I know of one plausible case made to suggest he was exactly that,[24] and although final proof will probably always be lacking, it seemed to me incautious of academic Egyptology to have accepted the authenticity of the quarry marks without question. Besides, there was alternative hieroglyphic evidence, arguably of purer provenance, which appeared to indicate that Khufu could not have built the Great Pyramid. Strangely, the same Egyptologists who readily ascribed immense importance to Vyse's quarry marks were quick to downplay the significance of these other, contradictory, hieroglyphs, which appeared on a rectangular limestone stela which now stood in the Cairo Museum.[25]

The Inventory Stela, as it was called, had been discovered at Giza in the nineteenth century by the French archaeologist Auguste Mariette. It was something of a bombshell because its text clearly indicated that both the Great Sphinx and the Great Pyramid (as well as several other structures on the plateau) were already in existence long before Khufu came to the throne. The inscription also referred to Isis as the 'Mistress of the Pyramid', implying that the monument had been dedicated to the goddess of magic and not to Khufu at all. Finally, there was a strong suggestion that Khufu's pyramid might have been one of the three subsidiary structures alongside the Great Pyramid's eastern flank.[26]

All this looked like damaging evidence against the orthodox chronology of Ancient Egypt. It also challenged the consensus view that the Giza pyramids had been built as tombs and only as only. However, rather than investigating the anachronistic statements in the Inventory Stela, Egyptologists chose to devalue them. In the words of the influential American scholar James Henry Breasted, 'These references would be of the highest importance if the stela were contemporaneous with Khufu; but the orthographic evidences of its late date are entirely conclusive ...'[27]

Breasted meant that the nature of the hieroglyphic writing system used in he inscription was not consistent with that used in the Fourth Dynasty but belonged to a more recent epoch: All Egyptologists concurred with this analysis and the final judgement, still accepted today, was that the stela had been carved in the Twenty-First Dynasty, about 1500 years after Khufu's reign, and was therefore to be regarded as a work of historical fiction.[28]

Thus, citing orthographic evidence, an entire academic discipline found reason to ignore the boat-rocking implications of the Inventory Stela and at no time gave proper consideration to the possibility that it could have been based upon a genuine Fourth Dynasty inscription (just as the New English Bible, for example, is based on a much older original). Exactly the same scholars, however, had accepted the authenticity of a set of dubious 'quarry marks' without demur, turning a blind eye to their orthographic and other peculiarities.

Why the double standard? Could it have been because the information contained in the 'quarry marks' conformed strictly to orthodox opinion that the Great Pyramid had been built as a tomb for Khufu? whereas the information in the Inventory Stela contradicted that opinion?

Overview

By seven in the morning Santha and I had walked far out into the desert to the south-west of the Giza pyramids and had made ourselves comfortable in the lee of a huge dune that offered an unobstructed panorama over the entire site.

The date, 16 March, was just a few days away from the Spring Equinox, one of the two occasions in the year when the sun rose precisely due east of wherever you stood in the world. Ticking out the days like the pointer of a giant metronome, it had bisected the horizon this morning at a point a hair’s breadth south of due east and had already climbed high enough to shrug off the Nile mists which clung like a shroud to much of the city of Cairo.

Khufu, Khafre, Menkaure ... Cheops, Chephren, Mycerinus. Whether you called them by their Egyptian or their Greek names, there was no doubt that the three famous pharaohs of the Fourth Dynasty had been commemorated by the most splendid, the most honourable, the most beautiful and the most enormous monuments ever seen anywhere in the world. Moreover, it was clear that these pharaohs must indeed have been closely associated with the monuments, not only because of the folklore passed on by Herodotus (which surely had some basis in fact) but because inscriptions and references to Khufu, Khafre and Menkaure had been found in moderate quantities, outside the three major pyramids, at several different parts of the Giza necropolis. Such finds had been made consistently in and around the six subsidiary pyramids, three of which lay to the east of the Great Pyramid and the other three to the south of the Menkaure Pyramid.

Since much of this external evidence was ambiguous and uncertain, I found it difficult to understand why the Egyptologists were happy to go on citing it as confirmation of the ‘tombs and tombs only’ theory.

The problem was that this same evidence was capable of supporting—as equally valid—a number of different and mutually contradictory interpretations. To give just one example, the ‘close association’ observed between the three great pyramids and the three Fourth Dynasty pharaohs could indeed have come about because these pharaohs had built the pyramids as their tombs. But it could also have come about if the gigantic monuments of the Giza plateau had been standing long before the dawn of the historical civilization known as Dynastic Egypt. In that case, it was only necessary to assume that in due course Khufu, Khafre and Menkaure had come along and built a number of the subsidiary structures around the three older pyramids—something that they would have had every reason to do because in this way they could have appropriated the high prestige of the original anonymous monuments (and would, almost certainly, be viewed by posterity as their builders).

There were other possibilities too. The point was, however, that the evidence for exactly who had built which great pyramid, when and for what purpose was far too thin on the ground to justify the dogmatism of the orthodox ‘tombs and tombs only’ theory. In all honesty, it was not clear who built the pyramids. It was not clear in what epoch they had been built. And it was not at all clear what their function had been.

For all these reasons they were surrounded by a wonderful, impenetrable air of mystery and as I gazed down at them out of the desert they seemed to march towards me across the dunes ...

Anomalies

Viewed from our vantage point in the desert south west of the Giza necropolis, the site plan of the three great pyramids seemed majestic but bizarre.

Menkaure's pyramid was closest to us, with Khafre's and Khufu's monuments behind it to the north-east. These two were situated along a near perfect diagonal—a straight line connecting the south-western and north-eastern corners of the pyramid of Khafre would, if extended to the north-east, also pass through the south-western and north-eastern corners of the Great Pyramid. This, presumably, was not an accident. From where we sat, however, it was easy to see that if the same imaginary straight line was extended to the south-west it would completely miss the Third Pyramid, the entire body of which was offset to the east of the principal diagonal.

Egyptologists refused to recognize any anomaly in this. Why should they? As far as they were concerned there was no site plan at Giza. The pyramids were tombs and tombs only, built for three different pharaohs over a period of about seventy-five years.[1] It made sense to assume that each ruler would have sought to express his own personality and idiosyncrasies through his monument, and this was probably why Menkaure had 'stepped out of line'.

The Egyptologists were wrong. Though I was unaware of it that March morning in 1993, a breakthrough had been made proving beyond doubt that the necropolis did have an overall site plan, which dictated the exact positioning of the three pyramids not only in relation to one another but in relation to the River Nile a few kilometres east of the Giza plateau. With eerie fidelity, this immense and ambitious layout modelled a celestial phenomenon[2]—which was perhaps why Egyptologists (who pride themselves on looking exclusively at the ground beneath their feet) had failed to spot it. On a truly giant scale, as we see in later chapters, it also reflected the same obsessive concern with orientations and dimensions demonstrated in each of the monuments.

Giza, Egypt, 16 March 1993, 8 a.m.

At a little over 200 feet tall (and with a side length at the base of 356 feet) the Third Pyramid was less than half the height and well under half the mass of the Great Pyramid. Nevertheless, it possessed a stunning and imposing majesty of its own. As we stepped out of the desert sunlight and into its huge geometrical shadow, I remembered what the Iraqi writer Abdul Latif had said about it when he had visited it in the twelfth century: 'It appears small compared with the other two; but viewed at a short distance and to the exclusion of these, it excites in the imagination a singular oppression and cannot be contemplated without painfully affecting the sight ...'[3]

[2] The Orion Mystery.

The lower sixteen courses of the monument were still cased, as they had been since the beginning, with facing blocks quarried out of red granite ('so extremely hard', in Abdul Latif s words, 'that iron takes a long time, with difficulty, to make an impression on it').[4] Some of the blocks were very large; they were also closely and cunningly fitted together in a complex interlocking jigsaw-puzzle pattern strongly reminiscent of the cyclopean masonry at Cuzco, Machu Picchu and other locations in far-off Peru.

As was normal, the entrance to the Third Pyramid was situated in its northern face well above the ground. From here, at an angle of 26° 2', a descending corridor lanced arrow-straight down into the darkness.[5] Oriented exactly north to south, this corridor was rectangular in section and so cramped that we had to bend almost double to fit into it. Where it passed through the masonry of the monument its ceiling and walls consisted of well-fitted granite blocks. More surprisingly, these continued for some distance below ground level.

At about seventy feet from the entrance, the corridor levelled off and opened out into a passageway where we could stand up. This led into a small ante-chamber with carved panelling and grooves cut into its walls, apparently to take portcullis slabs. Reaching the end of the chamber, we had to crouch again to enter another corridor. Bent double, we proceeded south for about forty feet before reaching the first of the three main burial chambers—if burial chambers they were.

These sombre, soundless rooms were all hewn out of solid bedrock. The one that we stood in was rectangular in plan and oriented east to west. Measuring about 30 feet long x 15 wide x 15 high, it had a flat ceiling and a complex internal structure with a large, irregular hole in its western wall leading into a dark, cave-like space beyond. There was also an opening near the centre of the floor which gave access to a ramp, sloping westwards, leading down to even deeper levels. We descended the ramp. It terminated in a short, horizontal passage to the right of which, entered through a narrow doorway, lay a small empty chamber, Six cells, like the sleeping quarters of medieval monks, had been hewn out of its walls: four on the eastern side and two to the north. These were presumed by Egyptologists to have functioned as 'magazines ... for storing objects which the dead king wished to have close to his body.'[6]

Coming out of this chamber, we turned right again, back into the horizontal passage. At its end lay another empty chamber,[7] the design of which is unique among the pyramids of Egypt. Some twelve feet long by eight wide, and oriented north to south, its walls and extensively broken and damaged floor were fashioned out of a peculiarly dense, chocolate-coloured granite which seemed to absorb light and sound waves. Its ceiling consisted of eighteen huge slabs of the same material, nine on each side, laid in facing gables. Because they had had been hollowed from below to form a markedly concave surface, the effect of these great monoliths was of a perfect barrel vault, much as one might expect to find in the crypt of a Romanesque cathedral.

Retracing our steps, we left the lower chambers and walked back up the ramp to the large, flat-roofed, rock-hewn room above. Passing through the ragged aperture in its western wall, we found ourselves looking directly at the upper sides of the eighteen slabs which formed the ceiling of the chamber below. From this perspective their true form as a pointed gable was immediately apparent. What was less clear was how they had been brought in here in the first place, let alone laid so perfectly in position. Each one must have weighed many tons, heavy enough to have made them extremely difficult to handle under any circumstances. And these were no ordinary circumstances. As though they had set out deliberately to make things more complicated for themselves (or perhaps because they found such tasks simple?) the pyramid builders had disdained to provide an adequate working area between the slabs and the bedrock above them. By crawling into the cavity, I was able to establish that the clearance varied from approximately two feet at the southern end to just a few inches at the northern end. In such a restricted space there was no possibility that the monoliths could have been lowered into position. Logically, therefore, they must have been raised from the chamber floor, but how had that been done? The chamber was so small that only a few men could have worked inside it at any one time—too few to have had the muscle-power to lift the slabs by brute force. Pulleys were not supposed to have existed in the Pyramid Age[8] (even if they had, there would have been insufficient room to set up block-and-tackle). Had some unknown system of levers been used? Or might there be more substance than scholars realized to the Ancient Egyptian legends that spoke of huge stones being effortlessly levitated by priests or magicians through the utterance of ‘words of power’?[9]

[7] It was in this chamber that Vyse found the intrusive burial (of bones and a wooden coffin lid) referred to in Chapter Thirty-Five. The basalt coffin where he also found (later lost at sea) is believed to have been part of the same intrusive burial and to have not been older than the Twenty-sixth Dynasty. See, for example, Blue Guide, Egypt, p. 433.

[8] The Pyramids of Egypt, p. 220.

Not for the first time when confronted by the mysteries of the pyramids I knew that I was looking at an impossible engineering feat which had nevertheless been carried out to astonishingly high and precise standards. Moreover, if Egyptologists were to be believed, the construction work had supposedly been undertaken at the dawn of human civilization by a people who had not accumulated any experience of massive construction projects.

This was, of course, a startling cultural paradox, and one for to which no adequate explanation had ever been offered by an orthodox academic.

The moving finger writes and having writ it moves on Leaving the underground chambers, which seemed to vibrate at the core of the Third Pyramid like the convoluted, multi-valved heart of some slumbering Leviathan, we made our way along the narrow entrance corridor and into the open air.

Our objective now was the Second Pyramid. We walked along its western flank (just under 708 feet in length), turned right and eventually came to the point on its north side, about 40 feet east of the main north-south axis, where the principal entrances were located. One of these was carved directly into the bedrock at ground level about 30 feet in front of the monument; the other was cut into the northern face at a height of just under 50 feet. From the latter a corridor sloped downwards at an angle of 25° 55’.[10] From the former, by which we now entered the pyramid, another descending corridor led deeply underground then levelled off for a short distance, giving access to a subterranean chamber, then ascended steeply and finally levelled off again into a long horizontal passageway, heading due south (into which also fed the upper corridor that sloped down from the entrance in the north face).

High enough to stand up in, and lined at first with granite and then with smoothly polished limestone, the horizontal passageway was almost at ground level, that is, it lay directly beneath the pyramid’s lowest course of masonry. It was also extremely long, running dead straight for a further 200 feet until it debouched in the single ‘burial chamber’ at the heart of the monument.

As we have already noted, no mummy had ever been found in this latter chamber, nor any inscriptions, with the result that the so-called Pyramid of Khafre was wholly anonymous. Latter-day adventurers had, however, carved their names on to its walls—notably the former circus strongman Giovanni Battista Belzoni (1778-1823) who had forced his way into the monument in 1818. His huge and flamboyant graffito, daubed in black paint high on the south side of the chamber, was a reminder of basic human nature: the desire that all of us feel to be recognized and remembered. It was clear that Khafre himself had been far from immune from this ambition, since repeated references to him (as well as a number of flattering statues) appeared in the surrounding funerary complex.[11] If he had indeed built the pyramid as his tomb, it seemed inconceivable that such a man would have failed to stamp his name and identity somewhere within its interior. I found myself wondering yet again why Egyptologists were so unwilling to consider the possibility that the funerary complex might have been Khafre's work and the pyramid someone else's?

In many ways this—rather than the absence of identifying marks—was the central problem. Prior to the reigns of Khufu, Khafre and Menkaure there was not a single pharaoh whose name could be put forward as a candidate. Khufu’s father Sneferu, the first king of the Fourth Dynasty, was believed to have built the so-called ‘Bent’ and ‘Red’ Pyramids at Dahshur, about thirty miles south of Giza—an attribution that was itself mysterious (if pyramids were indeed tombs) since it seemed strange that one pharaoh required two pyramids to be buried in. Sneferu was also credited by some Egyptologists with the construction of the ‘Collapsed’ Pyramid at Meidum (although a number of authorities insisted that this was the tomb of Huni, the last king of the Third Dynasty).[12] The only other builders in the Archaic Period had been Zoser, the second pharaoh of the Third Dynasty, to whom was attributed the construction of the 'Step Pyramid' at Saqqara,[13] and Zoser's successor, Sekhemkhet, whose pyramid also stood at Saqqara. Therefore, despite the lack of inscriptions, it was now assumed as obvious that the three pyramids at Giza must have been built by Khufu, Khafre and Menkaure and must have been intended to serve as their tombs.

We need not reiterate here the many shortcomings of the 'tombs and tombs only' theory. However, these shortcomings were not limited to the Giza pyramids but applied to all the other Third and Fourth Dynasty Pyramids listed above. Not a single one of these monuments had ever been found to contain the body of a pharaoh, or any signs whatsoever of a royal burial.[14] Some of them were not even equipped with sarcophagi, for example the Collapsed Pyramid at Meidum. The Pyramid of Sekhemkhet at Saqqara (first entered in 1954 by the Egyptian Antiquities Organization) did contain a sarcophagus—one, which had certainly remained sealed and undisturbed since its installation in the 'tomb'.[15] Grave robbers had never succeeded in finding their way to it, but when it was opened, it was empty.[16]

So what was going on? How come more than twenty-five million tons of stone had been piled up to form pyramids at Giza, Dahshur, Meidum and Saqqara if the only point of the exercise had been to install empty sarcophagi in empty chambers? Even admitting the hypothetical excesses of one or two megalomaniacs, it seemed unlikely that a whole succession of pharaohs would have sanctioned such wastefulness.

Pandora's Box

Buried beneath the five million tons of the Second Pyramid at Giza, Santha and I now stepped into the monument's spacious inner chamber, which might have been a tomb but might equally have served some other as yet unidentified purpose. Measuring 46.5 feet in length from east to west, and 16.5 in breadth from north to south, this naked and sterile apartment was topped off with an immensely strong gabled ceiling reaching a height of 22.5 feet at its apex. The gable slabs, each a massive 20-ton limestone monolith, had been laid in position at an angle of 53° 7' 28" (which exactly matched the angle of slope of the pyramid's sides).[17] Here there were no relieving chambers (as there were above the King's Chamber in the Great Pyramid). Instead, for more than 4000 years—perhaps far more—the gabled ceiling had taken the immense weight of the second largest stone building in the world.

I looked slowly around the room, which reflected a yellowish-white radiance back at me. Quarried directly out of the living bedrock, its walls were not at all smoothly finished, as one might have expected, but were noticeably rough and irregular. The floor too was peculiar: of split-level design with a step about a foot deep separating its eastern and western halves. The supposed sarcophagus of Khafre lay near the western wall, embedded in the floor. Measuring just over six feet in length, quite shallow, and somewhat narrow to have contained the wrapped and embalmed mummy of a noble pharaoh, its smooth red granite sides reached to about knee height.

As I gazed into its dark interior, it seemed to gape like the doorway to another dimension.

Made by Some God

I had climbed the Great Pyramid the night before, but as I approached it in the full glare of midday, I experienced no sense of triumph. On the contrary, standing at its base on the north side, I felt fly-sized and puny—an impermanent creature of flesh and blood confronted with the awe-inspiring splendour of eternity. I had the impression that it might have been here for ever, 'made by some god and set down bodily in the surrounding sand', as the Greek historian Diodorus Siculus commented in the first century BC.[1] But which god had made it, if not the God-King Khufu whose name generations of Egyptians had associated with it?

For the second time in twelve hours, I began to climb the monument. Up close in this light, indifferent to human chronologies and subject only to the slow erosive forces of geological time, it reared above me like a frowning, terrifying crag. Fortunately, I only had six courses to clamber over, assisted in places by modern steps, before reaching Ma'mun's Hole, which now served as the pyramid's principal entrance.

The original entrance, still well-hidden in the ninth century when Ma'mun began tunnelling, was some ten courses higher, 55 feet above ground level and 24 feet east of the main north-south axis. Protected by giant limestone gables, it contained the mouth of the descending corridor, which led downwards at an angle of 26° 31' 23". Strangely, although itself measuring only some 3 feet 5 inches x 3 feet 11 inches, this corridor was sandwiched between roofing blocks 8 feet 6 inches thick and 12 feet wide and a flooring slab (known as the 'Basement Sheet') 2 feet 6 inches thick and 33 feet wide.[2]

Hidden structural features like these abounded in the Great Pyramid, manifesting both incredible complexity and apparent pointlessness. Nobody knew how blocks of this size had been successfully installed, neither did anybody know how they had been set so carefully in alignment with other blocks, or at such precise angles (because, as the reader may have realized, the 26° slope of the descending corridor was part of a deliberate and regular pattern). Nobody knew either why these things had been done.

The Beacon

Entering the pyramid through Ma'mun's Hole did not feel right. It was like entering a cave or grotto cut into the side of a mountain; it lacked the sense of deliberate and geometrical purposefulness that would have been conveyed by the original descending corridor. Worse still, the dark and inauspicious horizontal tunnel leading inwards looked like an ugly, deformed thing and still bore the marks of violence where the Arab workmen had alternately heated and chilled the stones with fierce fires and cold vinegar before attacking them with hammers and chisels, battering rams and borers.

[2] The Pyramids of Egypt, p. 88; The Great Pyramid: Your Personal Guide, pp. 30-1.

On the one hand, such vandalism seemed gross and irresponsible. On the other, a startling possibility had to be considered: was there not a sense in which the pyramid seemed to have been designed to invite human beings of intelligence and curiosity to penetrate its mysteries? After all, if you were a pharaoh who wanted to ensure that his deceased body remained inviolate for eternity, would it make better sense (a) to advertise to your own and all subsequent generations the whereabouts of your burial place, or (b) to choose some secret and unknown location, of which you would never speak and where you might never be found?

The answer was obvious: you would go for secrecy and seclusion, as the vast majority of the pharaohs of Ancient Egypt had done.[3]

Why, then, if it was indeed a royal tomb, was the Great Pyramid so conspicuous? Why did it occupy a ground area of more than thirteen acres? Why was it almost 500 feet high? Why, in other words, if its purpose was to conceal and protect the body of Khufu, had it been designed so that it could not fail to attract the attention—in all epochs and under all imaginable circumstances—of treasure-crazed adventurers and of prying and imaginative intellectuals?

It was simply not credible that the brilliant architects, stonemasons, surveyors and engineers who had created the Great Pyramid could have been ignorant of basic human psychology. The vast ambition and the transcendent beauty, power and artistry of their handiwork spoke of refined skills, deep insight, and a complete understanding of the symbols and primordial patterns by which the minds of men could be manipulated. Logic therefore suggested that the pyramid builders must also have understood exactly what kind of beacon they were piling up (with such incredible precision) on this windswept plateau, on the west bank of the Nile, in those high and far away times.

They must, in short, have wanted this remarkable structure to exert a perennial fascination: to be violated by intruders, to be measured with increasing degrees of exactitude, and to haunt the collective imagination of mankind like a persistent ghost summoning intimations of a profound and long-forgotten secret.

Mind games of the pyramid builders

The point where Ma'mun's Hole intersected with the 26° descending corridor was closed off by a modern steel door. Beyond it, to the north, that corridor sloped up until it reached the gables of the monument's original entrance. To the south, as we have seen, the corridor sloped down for almost another 350 feet into the bedrock, before opening out into a huge subterranean chamber 600 feet beneath the apex of the pyramid. The accuracy of this corridor was astonishing. From top to bottom the average deviation from straight amounted to less than 1/4-inch in the sides and 3/10-inch on the roof.[4]

Passing the steel door, I continued through Ma'mun's tunnel, breathing in its ancient air and adjusting my eyes to the gloom of the low-wattage bulbs that lit it. Then ducking my head I began to climb through the steep and narrow section hacked upwards by the Arab diggers in their feverish thrust to by-pass the series of granite plugs blocking the lower part of the ascending corridor. At the top of the tunnel two of the original plugs could be seen, still in situ but partially exposed by quarrying. Egyptologists assumed that they had been slid into their present position from above[5]—all the way down the lag-foot length of the ascending corridor from the foot of the Grand Gallery.[6] Builders and engineers, however, whose trend of thought was perhaps more practical, had pointed out that it was physically impossible for the plugs to have been installed in this way. Because of the leaf-thin clearance that separated them from the walls, floor and ceiling of the corridor, friction would have foiled any 'sliding' operation in a matter of inches, let alone 100 feet.[7]

The puzzling implication was therefore that the ascending corridor must have been plugged while the pyramid was still being built. But why would anyone have wished to block the main entrance to the monument at such an early stage in its construction (even while continuing to enlarge and elaborate its inner chambers)? Moreover, if the objective had been to deny intruders admission, wouldn't it have been much easier and more efficient to have plugged the descending corridor from its entrance in the north face to a point below its junction with the ascending corridor? That would have been the most logical way to seal the pyramid and would have made plugs unnecessary in the ascending corridor.

There was only one certainty: since the beginning of history, the single known effect of the granite plugs had not been to prevent an intruder from gaining access; instead, like Bluebeard's locked door, the barrier had magnetized Ma'mun's attention and inflamed his curiosity so that he had felt compelled to tunnel his way past them, convinced that something of inestimable value must lie beyond them.

Might this not have been what the pyramid builders had intended the first intruder who reached this far to feel? It would be premature to rule out such a strange and unsettling possibility. At any rate, thanks to Ma'mun (and to the predictable constants of human nature) I was now able to insert myself into the unblocked upper section of the original ascending corridor. A smoothly cut aperture measuring 3 feet 5 inches wide x 3 feet 11 inches high (exactly the same dimensions as the descending corridor), it sloped up into the darkness at an angle of 26° 2' 30"[8] (as against 26° 31' 23" in the descending corridor).[9]

What was this meticulous interest in the angle of 26°, and was it a coincidence that it amounted to half of the angle of inclination of the pyramid's sides—52°.[10]

The reader may recall the significance of this angle. It was a key ingredient of the sophisticated and advanced formula by which the design of the Great Pyramid had been made to correspond precisely to the dynamics of spherical geometry. Thus the original height of the monument (481.3949 feet), and the perimeter of its base (3023.16 feet), stood in the same ratio to each other as did the radius of a sphere to its circumference. This ratio was 2pi (2 x 3.14) and to express it the builders had been obliged to specify the tricky and idiosyncratic angle of 52° for the pyramid's sides (since any greater or lesser slope would have meant a different height-to-perimeter ratio).

In Chapter Twenty-three we saw that the so-called Pyramid of the Sun at Teotihuacan in Mexico also expressed a knowledge and deliberate use of the transcendental number pi; in its case the height (233.5 feet) stood in a relationship of 4pi to the perimeter of its base (2932.76 feet).[11]

The crux, therefore, was that the most remarkable monument of Ancient Egypt and the most remarkable monument of Ancient Mexico both incorporated pi relationships long before and far away from the official 'discovery' of this transcendental number by the Greeks.[12] Moreover, the evidence invited the conclusion that something was being signalled by the use of pi—almost certainly the same thing in both cases.

Not for the first time, and not for the last, I was overwhelmed by a sense of contact with an ancient intelligence, not necessarily Egyptian or Mexican, which had found a way to reach out across the ages and draw people towards it like a beacon. Some might look for treasure; others, captivated by the deceptively simple manner in which the builders had used pi to demonstrate their mastery of the secrets of transcendental numbers, might be inspired to search for further mathematical epiphanies.

Bent almost double, my back brushing against the polished limestone ceiling, it was with such thoughts in my mind that I began to scramble up the 26° slope of the ascending corridor, which seemed to penetrate the vast bulk of the six million ton building like a trigonometrical device. After I had banged my head on its ceiling a couple of times, however, I began to wonder why the ingenious people who'd designed it hadn't made it two or three feet higher. If they could erect a monument like this in the first place (which they obviously could) and equip it with corridors, surely it would not have been beyond their capabilities to make those corridors roomy enough to stand up in? Once again I was tempted to conclude that it was the result of a deliberate decision by the pyramid builders: they had made the ascending corridor this way because they had wanted it this way (rather than because such a design had been forced upon them.)

Was there motive in the apparent madness of these archaic mind games?

Unknown dark distance

At the top of the ascending corridor I emerged into yet another inexplicable feature of the pyramid, 'the most celebrated architectural work to have survived from the Old Kingdom'[13]—the Grand Gallery. Soaring upwards at the continuing majestic angle of 26°, and almost entirely vanishing into the airy gloom above, its spacious corbelled vault made a stunning impression.

It was not my intention to climb the Grand Gallery yet. Branching off due south at its base was a long horizontal passageway, 3 feet 9 inches high and 127 feet in length, that led to the Queen's Chamber.[14] I wanted to revisit this room, which I had admired for its stark beauty since becoming acquainted with the Great Pyramid several years previously. Today, however, to my considerable irritation, the passageway was barred within a few feet of its entrance.

King's Chamber
Grand Gallery
Queen's Chamber

The Grand Gallery and the King's and Queen's Chambers with their northern and southern shafts.

The reason, though I was unaware of it at the time, was that a German robotics engineer named Rudolf Gantenbrink was at work within, slowly and painstakingly manoeuvring a $250,000 robot up the narrow southern shaft of the Queen's Chamber. Hired by the Egyptian Antiquities Organization to improve the ventilation of the Great Pyramid, he had already used his high-tech equipment to clear debris from the King's Chamber's narrow 'southern shaft' (believed by Egyptologists to have been designed as a ventilation shaft in the first place) and had installed an electric fan at its mouth. At the beginning of March 1993 he transferred his attentions to the Queen's Chamber, deploying Upuaut, a miniaturized remote-controlled robot camera to explore its southern shaft. On 22 March, some 200 feet along the steeply sloping shaft (which rose at an angle of 39.5° and was only about 8 inches high x 9 inches wide),[15] the floor and walls suddenly became very smooth as Upuaut crawled into a section made of fine Tura limestone, the type normally used for lining sacred areas such as chapels or tombs. That, in itself, was intriguing enough, but at the end of this corridor, apparently leading to a sealed chamber deep within the pyramid's masonry, was a solid limestone door complete with metal fittings ...

It had long been known that neither this southern shaft nor its counterpart in the Chamber's northern wall had any exit on the outside of the Great Pyramid. In addition, and equally inexplicably, neither had originally been fully cut through. For some reason the builders had left the last five inches of stone intact in the last block over the mouth of each of the shafts, thus rendering them invisible and inaccessible to any casual intruder.

Why? To make sure they would never be found? Or to make sure that they would be found, some day, under the right circumstances?

After all, there had from the beginning been two conspicuous shafts in the King's Chamber, penetrating the north and south walls. It should not have been beyond the mental powers of the pyramid builders to predict that sooner or later some inquiring person would be tempted to look for shafts in the Queen's Chamber as well. In the event nobody did look for more than a thousand years after Caliph Ma'mun had opened the monument to the world in AD 820. Then in 1872 an English engineer named Waynman Dixon, a Freemason who 'had been led to suspect the existence of the shafts by their presence in the King's Chamber above',[16] went tapping around the Queen's Chamber's walls and located them. He opened the southern shaft first, setting his 'carpenter and man-of-all-work, Bill Grundy, to jump a hole with a hammer and steel chisel at that place. So to work the faithful fellow went, and with a will which soon began to make a way into the soft stone [limestone] at this point, when lo! after a comparatively very few strokes, flop went the chisel right through into something or other.'[17]

The 'something or other' Bill Grundy's chisel had reached turned out to be 'a rectangular, horizontal, tubular channel, about 9 inches by 8 inches in transverse breadth and height, going back 7 feet into the wall, and then rising at an angle into an unknown, dark distance ...'[18]

It was up that angle, and into that 'unknown dark distance', 121 years later, that Rudolf Gantenbrink sent his robot—the technology of our species having finally caught up with our powerful instincts to pry. Those instincts were clearly no weaker in 1872 than in 1993; among the many interesting things the remote-controlled camera succeeded in filming in the Queen's Chamber shafts was the far end of a long, sectioned metal rod of nineteenth century design which Waynman Dixon and the faithful Bill Grundy had secretly stuffed up the intriguing channel.[19] Predictably, they had assumed that if the pyramid builders had gone to the trouble of constructing and then concealing the shafts, then they must have hidden something worth looking for inside them.

The notion that there might have been an intention from the outset to stimulate such investigations would seem quite implausible if the final upshot of the discovery and exploration of the shafts had been a dead-end. Instead, as we have seen, a door was found—a sliding, portcullis door with curious metal fittings and an enticing gap at its base beneath which the laser-spot projected by Gantenbrink's robot was seen to disappear entirely ...

Once again there seemed to be a clear invitation to proceed further, the latest in a long line of invitations which had encouraged Caliph Ma'mun and his diggers to break into the central passageways and chambers of the monument, which had waited for Waynman Dixon to test the hypothesis that the walls of the Queen's Chamber might contain concealed shafts, and which had then waited again until arousing the curiosity of Rudolf Gantenbrink, whose high-tech robot revealed the existence of the hidden door and brought within reach whatever secrets—or disappointments, or further invitations—might lie behind it.

The Queen's Chamber

We shall hear more of Rudolf Gantenbrink and Upuaut in later chapters. 16 March 1993, however, knowing nothing of this, I was frustrated to find the Queen's Chamber closed, and glared resentfully through the metal grille that barred its entrance corridor.

I remembered that the height of that corridor, 3 feet 9 inches, was not constant. Approximately 110 feet due south from where I stood, and only about 15 feet from the entrance to the Chamber, a sudden downward step in the floor increased the standing-room to 5 feet 8 inches.[20] Nobody had come up with a convincing explanation for this peculiar feature.

The Queen's Chamber itself—apparently empty since the day it was built—measured 17 feet 2 inches from north to south and 18 feet 10 inches from east to west. It was equipped with an elegant gabled ceiling, 20 feet 5 inches in height, which lay exactly along the east-west axis of the pyramid.[21] Its floor, however, was the opposite of elegant and looked unfinished. There was a constant salty emanation through its pale, rough-hewn limestone walls, giving rise to much fruitless speculation.

In the north and south walls, still bearing the incised legend OPENED 1872, were the rectangular apertures discovered by Waynman Dixon which led into the dark distance of the mysterious shafts. The western wall was quite bare. Offset a little over two feet to the south of its centre line, the eastern wall was dominated by a niche in the form of a corbel vault 15 feet 4 inches high and 5 feet 2 inches wide at the base. Originally 3 feet 5 inches deep, a further cavity had been cut in the back of this niche in medieval times by Arab treasure-seekers looking for hidden chambers.[22] They had found nothing.

Egyptologists had also been unable to come to any persuasive conclusions about the original function of the niche, or, for that matter, of the Queen's Chamber as a whole.

All was confusion. All was paradox. All was mystery.

Instrument

The Grand Gallery had its mysteries too. Indeed it was among the most mysterious of all the internal features of the Great Pyramid. Measuring 6 feet 9 inches wide at the floor, its walls rose vertically to a height of 7 feet 6 inches; above that level seven further courses of masonry (each one projecting inwards some 3 inches beyond the course immediately below it) carried the vault to its full height of 28 feet and its culminating width of 3 feet 5 inches.[23]

Remember that structurally the Gallery was required to support, for ever, the multi-million ton weight of the upper three-quarters of the largest and heaviest stone monument ever built on planet earth. Was it not quite remarkable that a group of supposed ‘technological primitives’ had not only envisaged and designed such a feature but had completed it successfully, more than 4500 years before our time?

Even if they had made the Gallery only 20 feet long, and had sought to erect it on a level plane, the task would have been difficult enough—indeed extraordinarily difficult. But they had opted to erect this astonishing corbel vault at a slope of 26°, and to extend its length to a staggering 153 feet.[24] Moreover, they had made it with perfectly dressed limestone megaliths throughout—huge, smoothly polished blocks carved into sloping parallelograms and laid together so closely and with such rigorous precision that the joints were almost invisible to the naked eye.

The pyramid builders had also included some interesting symmetries in their work. For example, the culminating width of the Gallery at its apex was 3 feet 5 inches while its width at the floor was 6 feet 9 inches. At the exact centre of the floor, running the entire length of the Gallery—and sandwiched between flat-topped masonry ramps each 1 foot 8 inches wide—there was a sunken channel 2 feet deep and 3 feet 5 inches wide. What could have been the purpose of this slot? And why had it been necessary for it to mirror so precisely the width and form of the ceiling, which also looked like a ‘slot’ sandwiched between the two upper courses of masonry?

I knew that I was not the first person to have stood at the foot of the Grand Gallery and to have been overtaken by the disorienting sense of being ‘in the inside of some enormous instrument of some sort.’[25] Who was to say that such intuitions were completely wrong? Or, for that matter, that they were right? No record as to function remained, other than in mystical and symbolic references in certain ancient Egyptian liturgical texts. These appeared to indicate that the pyramids had been seen as devices designed to turn dead men into immortal beings: to ‘throw open the doors of the firmament and make a road’, so that the deceased pharaoh might ‘ascend into the company of the gods’.[26]

[25] Traveller’s Key to Ancient Egypt, p. 115.

I had no difficulty accepting that such a belief system might have been at work here, and obviously it could have provided a motive for the whole enterprise. Nevertheless, I was still puzzled why more than six million tons of physical apparatus, intricately interlaced with channels and tubes, corridors and chambers, had been deemed necessary to achieve a mystical, spiritual and symbolic objective.

Being inside the Grand Gallery did feel like being inside an enormous instrument. It had an undeniable aesthetic impact upon me (admittedly a heavy and domineering one), but it was also completely devoid of decorative features and of anything (figures of deities, reliefs of liturgical texts, and so on) which might be suggestive of worship or religion. The primary impression it conveyed was one of strict functionalism and purposefulness—as though it had been built to do a job. At the same time I was aware of its focused solemnity of style and gravity of manner, which seemed to demand nothing less than serious and complete attention.

By now I had climbed steadily through about half the length of the Gallery. Ahead of me, and behind, shadows and light played tricks amid the looming stone walls. Pausing, I turned my head, looking upwards through the gloom towards the vaulted ceiling which supported the crushing weight of the Great Pyramid of Egypt.

It suddenly hit me how dauntingly and disturbingly old it was, and how completely my life at this moment depended on the skills of the ancient builders. The hefty blocks that spanned the distant ceiling were examples of those skills—every one of them laid at a slightly steeper gradient than that of the Gallery. As the great archaeologist and surveyor Flinders Petrie had observed, this had been done > in order that the lower edge of each stone should hitch like a pawl into a ratchet cut into the top of the walls; hence no stone can press on the one below it, so as to cause a cumulative pressure all down the roof; and each stone is separately upheld by the side walls which it lies across.[27]

And this was the work of a people whose civilization had only recently emerged from neolithic hunter-gathering?

I began to walk up the Gallery again, using the 2-foot-deep central flooring slot. A modern wooden covering fitted with helpful slats and side railings made the ascent relatively easy. In antiquity, however, the floor had been smoothly polished limestone, which, at a gradient of 26°, must have been almost impossible to climb.

How had it been done? Had it been done at all?

Looming ahead at the end of the Grand Gallery was the dark opening to the King’s Chamber beckoning each and every inquiring pilgrim into the heart of the enigma.

Interactive Three-Dimensional Game

Reaching the top of the Grand Gallery, I clambered over a chunky granite step about three feet high. I remembered that it lay, like the roof of the Queen's Chamber, exactly along the east-west axis of the Great Pyramid, And therefore marked the point of transition between the northern and southern halves of the monument.[1] Somewhat like an altar in appearance, the step also provided a solid horizontal platform immediately in front of the low square tunnel that served as the entrance to the King's Chamber.

Pausing for a moment, I looked back down the Gallery, taking in once again its lack of decoration, its lack of religious iconography, and its absolute lack of any of the recognizable symbolism normally associated with the archaic belief system of the Ancient Egyptians. All that registered upon the eye, along the entire 153-foot length of this magnificent geometrical cavity, was its disinterested regularity and its stark machine-like simplicity.

Looking up, I could just make out the opening of a dark aperture, chiselled into the top of the eastern wall above my head. Nobody knew when or by whom this foreboding hole had been cut, or how deep it had originally penetrated. It led to the first of the five relieving chambers above the King's Chamber and had been extended in 1837 when Howard Vyse had used it to break through to the remaining four. Looking down again, I could just make out the point at the bottom of the Gallery's western wall where the near-vertical well-shaft began its precipitous 160 foot descent through the core of the pyramid to join the descending corridor far below ground-level.

Why would such a complicated apparatus of pipes and passageways have been required? At first sight it didn't make sense. But then nothing about the Great Pyramid did make much sense, unless you were prepared to devote a great deal of attention to it. In unpredictable ways, when you did that, it would from time to time reward you.

If you were sufficiently numerate, for example, as we have seen, it would respond to your basic inquiries into its height and base perimeter by 'printing out' the value of pi. And if you were prepared to investigate further, as we shall see, it would download other useful mathematical tidbits, each a little more complex and abstruse that its predecessor.

There was a programmed feel about this whole process, as though it had been carefully prearranged. Not for the first time, I found myself willing to consider the possibility that the pyramid might have been designed as a gigantic challenge or learning machine—or, better still, as an interactive three-dimensional puzzle set down in the desert for humanity to solve.

Antechamber

Just over 3 feet 6 inches high, the entry passage to the lung's Chamber required all humans of normal stature to stoop. About four feet farther on, however, I reached the 'Antechamber', where the roof level rose suddenly to 12 feet above the floor. The east and west walls of the Antechamber were composed of red granite, into which were cut four opposing pairs of wide parallel slots, assumed by Egyptologists to have held thick portcullis slabs.[2] Three of these pairs of slots extended all the way to the floor, and were empty. The fourth (the northernmost) had been cut down only as far as the roof level of the entry passage (that is, 3 feet 6 inches above floor level) and still contained a hulking sheet of granite, perhaps nine inches thick and six feet high. There was a horizontal space of only 21 inches between this suspended stone portcullis and the northern end of the entry passage from which I had just emerged. There was also a gap of a little over 4 feet deep between the top of the portcullis and the ceiling. Whatever function it was designed to serve it was hard to agree with the Egyptologists that this peculiar structure could have been intended to deny access to tomb robbers.

Genuinely puzzled, I ducked under it and then stood up again in the southern portion of the Antechamber, which was some 10 feet long and maintained the same roof height of 12 feet. Though much worn, the grooves for the three further 'portcullis' slabs were still visible in the eastern and western walls. There was no sign of the slabs themselves and, indeed, it was difficult to see how such cumbersome pieces of stone could have been installed in so severely constricted a working space.

I remembered that Flinders Petrie, who had systematically surveyed the entire Giza necropolis in the late nineteenth century, had commented on a similar puzzle in the Second Pyramid: 'The granite portcullis in the lower passage shows great skill in moving masses, as it would need 40 or 60 men to lift it; yet it has been moved, and raised into place, in a narrow passage, where only a few men could possibly reach it.'[3] Exactly the same observations applied to the portcullis slabs of the Great Pyramid. If they were portcullis slabs—gateways capable of being raised and lowered.

The problem was that the physics of raising and lowering them required they be shorter than the full height of the Antechamber, so that they could be drawn into the roof space to allow the entry and exit of legitimate individuals prior to the closure of the tomb. This meant, of course, that when the bottom edges of the slabs were lowered to the floor to block the Antechamber at that level, an equal and opposite space would have opened up between the top edges of the slabs and the ceiling, through which any enterprising tomb-robber would certainly have been able to climb.

[3] The Pyramids and Temples of Gizeh, p. 36.

The Antechamber clearly qualified as another of the pyramid's many thought-provoking paradoxes, in which complexity of structure was combined with apparent pointlessness of function.

An exit tunnel, the same height and width as the entrance tunnel and lined with solid red granite, led off from the Antechamber's southern wall (also made of granite but incorporating a 12-inch thick limestone layer at its very top). After about a further 9 feet the tunnel debouched into the King's Chamber, a massive sombre red room made entirely of granite, which radiated an atmosphere of prodigious energy and power.

Stone enigmas

I moved into the centre of the King's Chamber, the lung axis of which was perfectly oriented east to west while the short axis was equally perfectly oriented north to south. The room was exactly 19 feet 1 inch in height and formed a precise two-by-one rectangle measuring 34 feet 4 inches long by 17 feet 2 inches wide. With a floor consisting of 15 massive granite paving stones, and walls composed of 100 gigantic granite blocks, each weighing 70 tons or more and laid in five courses, and with a ceiling spanned by nine further granite blocks each weighing approximately 50 tons,[4] the effect was of intense and overwhelming compression.

At the Chamber's western end was the object which, if the Egyptologists were to be believed, the entire Great Pyramid, had been built to house. That object, carved out of one piece of dark chocolate-coloured granite containing peculiarly hard granules of feldspar, quartz and mica, was the lidless coffer presumed to have been the sarcophagus of Khufu.[5] Its interior measurements were 6 feet 6.6 inches in length, 2 feet 10.42 inches in depth, and 2 feet 2.81 inches in width. Its exterior measurements were 7 feet 5.62 inches in length, 3 feet 5.31 inches in depth, and 3 feet 2.5 inches in width[6] an inch too wide, incidentally, for it to have been carried up through the lower (and now plugged) entrance to the ascending corridor.[7]

Some routine mathematical games were built into the dimensions of the sarcophagus. For example, it had an internal volume of 1166.4 litres and an external volume of exactly twice that, 2332.8 litres.[8] Such a precise coincidence could not have been arrived at accidentally: the walls of the coffer had been cut to machine-age tolerances by craftsmen of enormous skill and experience. It seemed, moreover, as Flinders Petrie admitted with some puzzlement after completing his painstaking survey of the Great Pyramid, that these craftsmen had access to tools 'such as we ourselves have only now reinvented ...'[9]

Petrie examined the sarcophagus particularly closely and reported that it must have been cut out of its surrounding granite block with straight saws '8 feet or more in length'. Since the granite was extremely hard, he could only assume that these saws must have had bronze blades (the hardest metal then supposedly available) inset with 'cutting points' made of even harder jewels: 'The character of the work would certainly seem to point to diamond as being the cutting jewel; and only the considerations of its rarity in general, and its absence from Egypt, interfere with this conclusion ...'[10]

An even bigger mystery surrounded the hollowing out of the sarcophagus, obviously a far more difficult enterprise than separating it from a block of bedrock. Here Petrie concluded that the Egyptians must have:

> adapted their sawing principle into a circular instead of a rectilinear form, curving the blade round into a tube, which drilled out a circular groove by its rotation; thus by breaking away the cores left in such grooves, they were able to hollow out large holes with a minimum of labour. These tubular drills varied from 1/4 inch to 5 inches diameter, and from 1/30 to 1/5 inch thick ...[11]

Of course, as Petrie admitted, no actual jewelled drills or saws had ever been found by Egyptologists.[12] The visible evidence of the kinds of drilling and sawing that had been done, however, compelled him to infer that such instruments must have existed. He became especially interested in this and extended his study to include not only the King's Chamber sarcophagus but many other granite artefacts and granite 'drill cores' which he collected at Giza. The deeper his research, however, the more puzzling the stone-cutting technology of the Ancient Egyptians became:

> The amount of pressure, shown by the rapidity with which the drills and saws pierced through the hard stones, is very surprising; probably a load of at least a ton or two was placed on the 4-inch drills cutting in granite. On the granite core No 7 the spiral of the cut sinks 1 inch in the circumference of 6 inches, a rate of ploughing out which is astonishing ... These rapid spiral grooves cannot be ascribed to anything but the descent of the drill into the granite under enormous pressure ...[13]

Wasn't it peculiar that at the supposed dawn of human civilization, more than 4500 years ago, the Ancient Egyptians had acquired what sounded like industrial-age drills packing a ton or more of punch and capable of slicing through hard stones like hot knives through butter?

Petrie could come up with no explanation for this conundrum. Nor was he able to explain the kind of instrument used to cut hieroglyphs into a number of diorite bowls with Fourth Dynasty inscriptions which he found at Giza: 'The hieroglyphs are incised with a very free-cutting point; they are not scraped or ground out, but are ploughed through the diorite, with rough edges to the line ...'[14]

This bothered the logical Petrie because he knew that diorite was one of the hardest stones on earth, far harder even than iron.[15] Yet here it was in Ancient Egypt being cut with incredible power and precision by some as yet unidentified graving tool:

> As the lines are only 1/150 inch wide it is evident that the cutting point must have been much harder than quartz; and tough enough not to splinter when so fine an edge was being employed, probably only 1/200 inch wide. Parallel lines are graved only 1/30 inch apart from centre to centre.[16]

In other words, he was envisaging an instrument with a needle-sharp point of exceptional, unprecedented hardness capable of penetrating and furrowing diorite with ease, and capable also of withstanding the enormous pressures required throughout the operation. What sort of instrument was that? By what means would the pressure have been applied? How could sufficient accuracy have been maintained to scour parallel lines at intervals of just 1/30-inch?

At least it was possible to conjure a mental picture of the circular drills with jewelled teeth which Petrie supposed must have been used to hollow out the lung's Chamber sarcophagus. I found, however, that it was not so easy to do the same for the unknown instrument capable of incising hieroglyphs into diorite at 2500 BC, at any rate not without assuming the existence of a far higher level of technology than Egyptologists were prepared to consider.

Nor was it just a few hieroglyphs or a few diorite bowls. During my travels in Egypt I had examined many stone vessels—dating back in some cases to pre-dynastic times—that had been mysteriously hollowed out of a range of materials such as diorite, basalt, quartz crystal and metamorphic schist.[17]

For example, more than 30,000 such vessels had been found in the chambers beneath the Third Dynasty Step Pyramid of Zoser at Saqqara.[18] That meant that they were at least as old as Zoser himself (i.e. around 2650 BC[19]). Theoretically, they could have been even older than that, because identical vessels had been found in pre-dynastic strata dated to 4000 BC and earlier,[20] and because the practice of handing down treasured heirlooms from generation to generation had been deeply ingrained in Egypt since time immemorial.

Whether they were made in 2500 BC or in 4000 BC or even earlier, the stone vessels from the Step Pyramid were remarkable for their workmanship, which once again seemed to have been accomplished by some as yet unimagined (and, indeed, almost unimaginable) tool.

Why unimaginable? Because many of the vessels were tall vases with long, thin, elegant necks and widely flared interiors, often incorporating fully hollowed-out shoulders. No instrument yet invented was capable of carving vases into shapes like these, because such an instrument would have had to have been narrow enough to have passed through the necks and strong enough (and of the right shape) to have scoured out the shoulders and the rounded interiors. And how could sufficient upward and outward pressure have been generated and applied within the vases to achieve these effects?

The tall vases were by no means the only enigmatic vessels unearthed from the Pyramid of Zoser, and from a number of other archaic sites. There were monolithic urns with delicate ornamental handles left attached to their exteriors by the carvers. There were bowls, again with extremely narrow necks like the vases, and with widely flared, pot-bellied interiors. There were also open bowls, and almost microscopic vials, and occasional strange wheel-shaped objects cut out of metamorphic schist with inwardly curled edges planed down so fine that they were almost translucent.[21] In all cases what was really perplexing was the precision with which the interiors and exteriors of these vessels had been made to correspond—curve matching curve—over absolutely smooth, polished surfaces with no tool marks visible.

There was no technology known to have been available to the Ancient Egyptians capable of achieving such results. Nor, for that matter, would any stone-carver today be able to match them, even if he were working with the best tungsten-carbide tools. The implication, therefore, is that an unknown or secret technology had been put to use in Ancient Egypt.

Ceremony of the sarcophagus

Standing in the King's Chamber, facing west—the direction of death amongst both the Ancient Egyptians and the Maya—I rested my hands lightly on the gnarled granite edge of the sarcophagus which Egyptologists insist had been built to house the body of Khufu. I gazed into its murky depths where the dim electric lighting of the chamber seemed hardly to penetrate and saw specks of dust swirling in a golden cloud.

It was just a trick of light and shadow, of course, but the King's Chamber was full of such illusions. I remembered that Napoleon Bonaparte had paused to spend a night alone here during his conquest of Egypt in the late eighteenth century. The next morning he had emerged pale and shaken, having experienced something which had profoundly disturbed him but about which he never afterwards spoke.[22]

Had he tried to sleep in the sarcophagus?

Acting on impulse, I climbed into the granite coffer and lay down, face upwards, my feet pointed towards the south and my head to the north.

Napoleon was a little guy, so he must have fitted comfortably. There was plenty of room for me too. But had Khufu been here as well?

I relaxed and tried not to worry about the possibility of one of the pyramid guards coming in and finding me in this embarrassing and probably illegal position. Hoping that I would remain undisturbed for a few minutes, I folded my hands across my chest and gave voice to a sustained low-pitched tone—something I had tried out several times before at other points in the King's Chamber. On those occasions, in the centre of the floor, I had noticed that the walls and ceiling seemed to collect the sound, to gather and to amplify it and project it back at me so that I could sense the returning vibrations through my feet and scalp and skin.

Now in the sarcophagus I was aware of very much the same effect, although seemingly amplified and concentrated many times over. It was like being in the sound-box of some giant, resonant musical instrument designed to emit for ever just one reverberating note. The sound was intense and quite disturbing. I imagined it rising out of the coffer and bouncing off the red granite walls and ceiling of the King's Chamber, shooting up through the northern and southern 'ventilation' shafts and spreading across the Giza plateau like a sonic mushroom cloud.

With this ambitious vision in my mind, and with the sound of my low-pitched note echoing in my ears and causing the sarcophagus to vibrate around me, I closed my eyes. When I opened them a few minutes later it was to behold a distressing sight: six Japanese tourists of mixed ages and sexes had congregated around the sarcophagus—two of them standing to the east, two to the west and one each to the north and south.

They all looked ... amazed. And I was amazed to see them. Because of recent attacks by armed Islamic extremists there were now almost no tourists at Giza and I had expected to have the King's Chamber to myself.

What does one do in a situation like this?

[22] Reported in P. W. Roberts, River in the Desert: Modern Travels in Ancient Egypt, Random House, New York and Toronto, 1993, p. 115.

Gathering as much dignity as I could muster, I stood upright, smiling and dusting myself off. The Japanese stepped back and I climbed out of the sarcophagus. Cultivating a businesslike manner, as though I did things like this all the time, I strolled to the point two-thirds of the way along the northern wall of the King's Chamber where the entrance to what Egyptologists refer to as the 'northern ventilation shaft' is located, and began to examine it minutely.

Some 8 inches wide by 9 inches high, it was, I knew, more than 200 feet in length and emerged into open air at the pyramid's 103rd course of masonry. Presumably by design rather than by accident, it pointed to the circumpolar regions of the northern heavens at an angle of 32° 30'. This, in the Pyramid Age around 2500 BC, would have meant that it was directed on the upper culmination of Alpha Draconis, a prominent star in the constellation of Draco.[23]

Much to my relief the Japanese rapidly completed their tour of the King's Chamber and left, stooping, without a backward glance. As soon as they had gone I crossed over to the other side of the room to take a look at the southern shaft. Since I had last been here some months before, its appearance had changed horribly. Its mouth now contained a massive electrical air-conditioning unit installed by Rudolf Gantenbrink, who even now was turning his attentions to the neglected shafts of the Queen's Chamber.

Since Egyptologists were satisfied that the King's Chamber shafts had been built for ventilation purposes, they saw nothing untoward in using modern technology to improve the efficiency of this task. Yet wouldn't horizontal shafts have been more effective than sloping ones if their primary purpose had been ventilation, and easier to build?[24] It was therefore unlikely to be an accident that the southern shaft of the King's Chamber targeted the southern heavens at 45°. During the Pyramid Age this was the location for the meridian transit of Zeta Orionis, the lowest of the three stars of Orion's Belt[25]—an alignment, I was to discover in due course, that would turn out to be of the utmost significance for future pyramid research.

The game-master

Now that I had the Chamber to myself again, I walked over to the western wall, on the far side of the sarcophagus, and turned to face east.

The huge room had an endless capacity to generate indications of mathematical game-playing. For example, its height (19 feet 1 inch) was exactly half of the length of its floor diagonal (38 feet 2 inches).[26] Moreover, since the King's Chamber formed a perfect 1 x 2 rectangle, was it conceivable that the pyramid builders were unaware that they had also made it express and exemplify the 'golden section'?

Known as phi, the golden section was another irrational number like pi that could not be worked out arithmetically. Its value was the square root of 5 plus 1 divided by 2, equivalent to 1.61803.[27] This proved to be the 'limiting value of the ratio between successive numbers in the Fibonacci series—the series of numbers beginning 0, 1, 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 13—in which each term is the sum of the two previous terms.'[28]

Phi could also be obtained schematically by dividing a line A-B at a point C in such a way that the whole line A-B was longer than the first part, A-C, in the same proportion as the first part, A-C, was longer than the remainder, C-B.[29] This proportion, which had been proven particularly harmonious and agreeable to the eye, had supposedly been first discovered by the Pythagorean Greeks, who incorporated it into the Parthenon at Athens. There is absolutely no doubt, however, that phi illustrated and obtained at least 2000 years previously in the King's Chamber of the Great Pyramid at Giza.

At the very beginning of its Dynastic history, Egypt inherited a system of measures from unknown predecessors. Expressed in these ancient measures, the floor dimensions of the King's Chamber (34 ft. 4" x 17 ft. 2") work out at exactly 20 x 10 royal cubits', while the height of the side walls to the ceiling is exactly 11.18 royal cubits. The semi-diagonal of the floor (A-B) is also exactly 11.18 royal cubits and can be 'swung up' to C to confirm the height of the chamber. Phi is defined mathematically as the square root of 5 + 1 + 2, i.e. 1.618. Is it a coincidence that the distance C-D (i.e. the wall height of the King's Chamber plus half the width of its floor) equals 16.18 royal cubits, thus incorporating the essential digits of phi?

To understand how it is necessary to envisage the rectangular floor of the chamber as being divided into two imaginary squares of equal size, with the side length of each square being given a value of 1. If either of these two squares were then split in half, thus forming two new rectangles, and if the diagonal of the rectangle nearest to the centreline of the King's Chamber were swung down to the base, the point where its tip touched the base would be phi, or 1.618, in relation to the side length (i.e., 1) of the original square.[30] (An alternative way of obtaining phi, also built into the King's Chamber's dimensions, is illustrated on the previous page.)

The Egyptologists considered all this was pure chance. Yet the pyramid builders had done nothing by chance. Whoever they had been, I found it hard to imagine more systematic and mathematically minded people.

[30] Ibid. See also Traveller's Key to Ancient Egypt, pp. 117-19.

I'd had quite enough of their mathematical games for one day. As I left the King's Chamber, however, I could not forget that it was located in line with the 50th course of the Great Pyramid's masonry at a height of almost 150 feet above the ground.[31] This meant, as Flinders Petrie pointed out with some astonishment, that the builders had managed to place it 'at the level where the vertical section of the Pyramid was halved, where the area of the horizontal section was half that of the base, where the diagonal from corner to corner was equal to the length of the base, and where the width of the face was equal to half the diagonal of the base'.[32]

Confidently and efficiently fooling around with more than six million tons of stone, creating galleries and chambers and shafts and corridors more or less at will, achieving near-perfect symmetry, near-perfect right angles, and near-perfect alignments to the cardinal points, the mysterious builders of the Great Pyramid had found the time to play a great many other tricks as well with the dimensions of the vast monument.

Why did their minds work this way? What had they been trying to say or do? And why, so many thousands of years after it was built, did the monument still exert a magnetic influence upon so many people, from so many different walks of life, who came into contact with it?

There was a Sphinx in the neighbourhood, so I decided that I would put these riddles to It ...

Chapter 39

Place of the Beginning

Giza, Egypt, 16 March 1993, 3:30 p.m.
It was mid afternoon by the time I left the Great Pyramid. Retracing the route that Santha and I had followed the night before when we had climbed the monument, I walked eastwards along the northern face, southwards along the flank of the eastern face, clambered over mounds of rubble and ancient tombs that clustered closely in this part of the necropolis, and came out on to the sand-covered limestone bedrock of the Giza plateau, which sloped down towards the south and east.

At the bottom of this long gentle slope, about half a kilometre from the south-eastern corner of the Great Pyramid, the Sphinx crouched in his rock-hewn pit. Sixty-six feet high and more than 240 feet long, with a head measuring 13 feet 8 inches wide,[1] he was, by a considerable margin, the largest single piece of sculpture in the world—and the most renowned:

> A shape with lion body and the head of a man
> A gaze blank and pitiless as the sun.[2]

Approaching the monument from the north-west I crossed the ancient causeway that connected the Second Pyramid with the so-called Valley Temple of Khafre, a most unusual structure located just 50 feet south of the Sphinx itself on the eastern edge of the Giza necropolis.

This Temple had long been believed to be far older than the time of Khafre. Indeed throughout much of the nineteenth century the consensus among scholars was that it had been built in remote prehistory, and had nothing to do with the architecture of dynastic Egypt.[3] What changed all that was the discovery, buried within the Temple precincts, of a number of inscribed statues of Khafre. Most were pretty badly smashed, but one, found upside down in a deep pit in an antechamber, was almost intact. Life-sized, and exquisitely carved out of black, jewel-hard diorite, it showed the Fourth Dynasty pharaoh seated on his throne and gazing with serene indifference towards infinity.

At this point the razor-sharp reasoning of Egyptology was brought to bear, and a solution of almost awe-inspiring brilliance was worked out: statues of Khafre had been found in the Valley Temple therefore the Valley Temple had been built by Khafre. The normally sensible Flinders

Petrie summed up: 'The fact that the only dateable remains found in the Temple were statues of Khafre shows that it is of his period; since the idea of his appropriating an earlier building is very unlikely.'[4]

But why was the idea so unlikely?

Throughout the history of Dynastic Egypt many pharaohs appropriated the buildings of their predecessors, sometimes deliberately striking out the cartouches of the original builders and replacing them with their own.[5] There was no good reason to assume that Khafre would have been deterred from linking himself to the Valley Temple, particularly if it had not been associated in his mind with any previous historical ruler but with the great 'gods' said by the Ancient Egyptians to have brought civilization to the Nile Valley in the distant and mythical epoch they spoke of as the First Time.[6] In such a place of archaic and mysterious power, which he does not appear to have interfered with in any other way, Khafre might have thought that the setting up of beautiful and lifelike statues of himself could bring eternal benefits. And if, among the gods, the Valley Temple had been associated with Osiris (whom it was every pharaoh's objective to join in the afterlife),[7] Khafre's use of statues to forge a strong symbolic link would be even more understandable.

Temple of the giants

After crossing the causeway, the route I had chosen to reach the Valley Temple took me through the rubble of a 'mastaba' field, where lesser notables of the Fourth Dynasty had been buried in subterranean tombs under bench-shaped platforms of stone (mastaba is a modern Arabic word meaning bench, hence the name given to these tombs). I walked along the southern wall of the Temple itself, recalling that this ancient building was almost as perfectly oriented north to south as was the Great Pyramid (with an error of just 12 arc minutes).[8]

The Temple was square in plan, 147 feet along each side. It was built in to the slope of the plateau, which was higher in the west than in the east. In consequence, while its western wall stood only a little over 20 feet tall, its eastern wall exceeded 40 feet.[9]

Viewed from the south, the impression was of a wedge-shaped structure, squat and powerful, resting firmly on bedrock. A closer examination revealed that it incorporated several characteristics quite alien and inexplicable to the modern eye, which that must have seemed almost as alien and inexplicable to the Ancient Egyptians. For a start, there was the stark absence, both inside and out, of inscriptions and other identifying marks. In this respect, as the reader will appreciate, the Valley Temple could be compared with a few of the other anonymous and frankly undatable monuments on the Giza plateau, including the great pyramids (and also with a mysterious structure at Abydos known as the Osireion, which we consider in detail in a later chapter) but otherwise bore no resemblance to the typical and well-known products of Ancient Egyptian art and architecture—all copiously decorated, embellished and inscribed.[10]

[9] Measurements from The Pyramids and Temples of Egypt, p. 48, and The Pyramids of Egypt, p. 108.

Another important and unusual feature of the Valley Temple was that its core structure was built entirely, entirely, of gigantic limestone megaliths. The majority of these measured about 18 feet long x 10 feet wide x 8 feet high and some were as large as 30 feet long x 12 feet wide x 10 feet high.[11] Routinely exceeding 200 tons in weight, each was heavier than a modern diesel locomotive—and there were hundreds of blocks.[12]

Was this in any way mysterious?

Egyptologists did not seem to think so; indeed few of them had bothered to comment, except in the most superficial manner—either on the staggering size of these blocks or the mind-bending logistics of how they might have been put in place. As we have seen, monoliths of up to 70 tons, each about as heavy as 100 family-sized cars, had been lifted to the level of the King's Chamber in the Great Pyramid—again without provoking much comment from the Egyptological fraternity—so the lack of curiosity about the Valley Temple was perhaps no surprise. Nevertheless, the block size was truly extraordinary, seeming to belong not just to another epoch but to another ethic altogether—one that reflected incomprehensible aesthetic and structural concerns and suggested a scale of priorities utterly different from our own. Why, for example, insist on using these cumbersome 200-ton monoliths when you could simply slice each of them up into 10 or 20 or 40 or 80 smaller and more manoeuvrable blocks? Why make things so difficult for yourself when you could achieve much the same visual effect with much less effort?

And how had the builders of the Valley Temple lifted these colossal megaliths to heights of more than 40 feet?

[10] In addition to the three Giza pyramids, the Mortuary Temples of Khafre and Menkaure can be compared with the Valley Temple in terms of their absence of adornment and use of megaliths weighing 200 tons or more.

At present there are only two land-based cranes in the world that could lift weights of this magnitude. At the very frontiers of construction technology, these are both vast, industrialized machines, with booms reaching more than 220 feet into the air, which require on-board counterweights of 160 tons to prevent them from tipping over. The preparation-time for a single lift is around six weeks and calls for the skills of specialized teams of up to 20 men.[13]

In other words, modern builders with all the advantages of high-tech engineering at their disposal, can barely hoist weights of 200 tons. Was it not, therefore, somewhat surprising that the builders at Giza had hoisted such weights on an almost routine basis?

Moving closer to the Temple's looming southern wall I observed something else about the huge limestone blocks: not only were they ridiculously large but, as though to complicate still further an almost impossible task, they had been cut and fitted into multi-angled jigsaw-puzzle patterns similar to those employed in the cyclopean stone structures at Sacsayhuaman and Machu Picchu in Peru (see Part II).

Another point I noticed was that the Temple walls appeared to have been constructed in two stages. The first stage, most of which was intact (though deeply eroded), consisted of the strong and heavy core of 200-ton limestone blocks. On to both sides of these had been grafted a façade of dressed granite which (as we shall see) was largely intact in the interior of the building but had mainly fallen away on the outside. A closer look at some of the remaining exterior facing blocks where they had become detached from the core revealed a curious fact. When they had been placed here in antiquity the backs of these blocks had been cut to fit into and around the deep coves and scallops of existing weathering patterns on the limestone core. The presence of those patterns seemed to imply that the core blocks must have stood here, exposed to the elements, for an immense span of time before they had been faced with granite.

Valley Temple

The Great Sphinx

The Sphinx and the Sphinx Temple with the Valley Temple of Khafre.

Lord of Rostau

I now moved around to the entrance of the Valley Temple, located near the northern end of the 43-foot high eastern wall. Here I saw that the granite facing was still in perfect condition, consisting of huge slabs weighing between 70 and 80 tons apiece which protected the underlying limestone core blocks like a suit of armour. Incorporating a tall, narrow, roofless corridor, this dark and imposing portal ran east to west at first, then made a right-angle turn to the south, leading me into a spacious antechamber. It was here that the life-size diorite statue of Khafre had been found, upside down and apparently ritually buried, at the bottom of a deep pit.

Lining the entire interior of the antechamber was a majestic jigsaw puzzle of smoothly polished granite facing blocks (which continued through the whole building). Exactly like the blocks on some of the bigger and more bizarre pre-Inca monuments in Peru, these incorporated multiple, finely chiselled angles in the joints and presented a complex overall pattern. Of particular note was the way certain blocks wrapped around corners and were received by re-entering angles cut into other blocks.

From the antechamber I passed through an elegant corridor which led west into a spacious T-shaped hall. I found myself standing at the head of the T looking further westwards along an imposing avenue of monolithic columns. Reaching almost 15 feet in height and measuring 41 inches on each side, all these columns supported granite beams, which were again 41 inches square. A row of six further columns, also supporting beams, ran along the north-south axis of the T; the overall effect was of massive but refined simplicity.

What was this building for? According to the Egyptologists who attributed it to Khafre its purpose was obvious. It had been designed, they said, as a venue for certain of the purification and rebirth rituals required for the funeral of the pharaoh. The Ancient Egyptians themselves, however, had left no inscriptions confirming this. On the contrary, the only written evidence that has come down to us indicated that the Valley Temple could not (originally at any rate) have had anything to do with Khafre, for the simple reason that it was built before his reign. This written evidence is the Inventory Stela, (referred to in Chapter Thirty-five), which also indicated a much greater age for the Great Pyramid and the Sphinx.

What the Inventory Stela had to say about the Valley Temple was that it had been standing during the reign of Khafre's predecessor Khufu, when it had been regarded not as a recent but as a remotely ancient building. Moreover, it was clear from the context that it was not thought to have been the work of any earlier pharaoh. Instead, it was believed to have come down from the 'First Time' and to have been built by the 'gods' who had settled in the Nile Valley in that remote epoch. It was referred to quite explicitly as the 'House of Osiris, Lord of Rostau[14] (Rostau being an archaic name for the Giza necropolis).[15]

As we shall see in Part VII, Osiris was in many respects the Egyptian counterpart of Viracocha and Quetzalcoatl, the civilizing deities of the Andes and of Central America. With them he shared not only a common mission but a vast heritage of common symbolism. It seemed appropriate, therefore, that the 'House' (or sanctuary, or temple) of such a wise teacher and lawgiver should have been established at Giza within sight of the Great Pyramid and in the immediate vicinity of the Great Sphinx.

Vastly, remotely, fabulously ancient

Following the directions given in the Inventory Stela—which stated that the Sphinx lay 'on the north-west of the House of Osiris'[16]—I made my way to the north end of the western wall that enclosed the Valley Temple's T-shaped hall. I passed through a monolithic doorway and entered a long, sloping, alabaster floored corridor (also oriented north-west) which eventually opened out on to the lower end of the causeway that led up to the Second Pyramid.

[16] Ancient Records of Egypt, volume I, p. 85.

From the edge of the causeway I had an unimpeded view of the Sphinx immediately to my north. As long as a city block, as high as a six-storey building it was perfectly oriented due east and thus faced the rising sun on the two equinoctial days of the year. Man-headed, lion-bodied, crouched as though ready at last to move its slow thighs after millennia of stony sleep, it had been carved in one piece out of a single ridge of limestone on a site that must have been meticulously preselected. The exceptional characteristic of this site, as well as overlooking the Valley of the Nile, was that its geological make-up incorporated a knoll of hard rock jutting at least 30 feet above the general level of the limestone ridge. From this knoll the head and neck of the Sphinx had been carved, while beneath it the vast rectangle of limestone that would be shaped into the body had been isolated from the surrounding bedrock. The builders had done this by excavating an 18-foot wide, 25-foot deep trench all around it, creating a free-standing monolith.

The first and lasting impression of the Sphinx, and of its enclosure, is that it is very, very old—not a mere handful of thousands of years, like the Fourth Dynasty of Egyptian pharaohs, but vastly, remotely, fabulously old. This was how the Ancient Egyptians in all periods of their history regarded the monument, which they believed guarded the ‘Splendid Place of The Beginning of all Time’ and which they revered as the focus of ‘a great magical power extending over the whole region’.[17]

This, as we have already seen, is the general message of the Inventory Stela. More specifically, it is also the message of the ‘Sphinx Stela’ erected here in around 1400 BC by Thutmosis IV, an Eighteenth Dynasty pharaoh. Still standing between the paws of the Sphinx, this granite tablet records that prior to Thutmosis’s rule the monument had been covered up to its neck in sand. Thutmosis liberated it by clearing all the sand, and erected the stela to commemorate his work.[18]

There have been no significant changes in the climate of the Giza plateau over the last 5000 years.[19] It therefore follows that throughout this entire period the Sphinx enclosure must have been as susceptible to sand encroachment as when Thutmosis cleared it—and, indeed, as it still is today. Recent history proves that the enclosure can fill up rapidly if left unattended. In 1818 Captain Caviglia had it cleared of sand for the purposes of his excavations, and in 1886, when Gaston Maspero came to re-excavate the site, he was obliged to have it cleared of sand once again. Thirty-nine years later, in 1925, the sands had returned in full force and the Sphinx was buried to its neck when the Egyptian Service des

Antiquités undertook its clearance and restoration once more.[20]

Does this not suggest that the climate could have been very different when the Sphinx enclosure was carved out? What would have been the sense of creating this immense statue if its destiny were merely to be engulfed by the shifting sands of the eastern Sahara? However, since the Sahara is a young desert, and since the Giza area in particular was wet and relatively fertile 11,000-15,000 years ago, is it not worth considering another scenario altogether? Is it not possible that the Sphinx enclosure was carved out during those distant green millennia when topsoil was still anchored to the surface of the plateau by the roots of grasses and shrubs and when what is now a desert of wind-blown sand more closely resembled the rolling savannahs of modern Kenya and Tanzania?

Under such congenial climatic conditions, the creation of a semi-subterranean monument like the Sphinx would not have outraged common sense. The builders would have had no reason to anticipate the slow desiccation and desertification of the plateau that would ultimately follow.

Yet, is it feasible to imagine that the Sphinx could have been built when Giza was still green—long, long ago?

As we shall see, such ideas are anathema to modern Egyptologists, who are nevertheless obliged to admit (to quote Dr Mark Lehner, director of the Giza Mapping Project) that ‘there is no direct way to date the Sphinx itself, because the Sphinx is carved right out of natural rock.’[21] In the absence of more objective tests, Lehner went on to point out, archaeologists had ‘to date things by context’. And the context of the Sphinx, that is, the Giza necropolis—a well-known Fourth Dynasty site—made it obvious that the Sphinx belonged to the Fourth Dynasty as well.[22]

Such reasoning was not regarded as axiomatic by Lehner’s distinguished predecessors in the nineteenth century, who were at one time convinced that the Sphinx long predated the Fourth Dynasty.

Whose Sphinx is it anyway?

In his Passing of Empires, published in 1900, the distinguished French Egyptologist Gaston Maspero, who made a special study of the content of the Sphinx Stela erected by Thutmosis IV, wrote:

> The stela of the Sphinx bears, on line 13, the cartouche of Khafre in the middle of a gap ... There, I believe, is an indication of [a renovation and clearance] of the Sphinx carried out under this prince, and consequently the more or less certain proof that the Sphinx was already covered with sand during the time of Khufu and > his predecessors ...[23]

The equally distinguished Auguste Mariette agreed—naturally enough since he had been the finder of the Inventory Stela (which, as we have seen, asserted matter-of-factly that the Sphinx was standing on the Giza plateau long before the time of Khufu).[24] Also generally concurring were Brugsch (Egypt under the Pharaohs, London, 1891), Petrie, Sayce and many other eminent scholars of the period.[25] Travel writers such as John Ward affirmed that 'the Great Sphinx must be numberless years older even than the Pyramids'. And as late as 1904 Wallis Budge, the respected keeper of Egyptian Antiquities at the British Museum, had no hesitation in making this unequivocal assertion:

> The oldest and finest human-headed lion statue is the famous 'Sphinx' at Giza. This marvellous object was in existence in the days of Khafre, the builder of the Second Pyramid, and was, most probably, very old even at that early period ... The Sphinx was thought to be connected in some way with foreigners or with a foreign religion which dated from predynastic times.[26]

Between the beginning and the end of the twentieth century, however, Egyptologists' views about the antiquity of the Sphinx changed dramatically. Today there is not a single orthodox Egyptologist who would even discuss, let alone consider seriously, the wild and irresponsible suggestion, once a commonplace, that the Sphinx might have been built thousands of years before Khafre's reign.

According to Dr Zahi Hawass, for example, director of Giza and Saqqara for the Egyptian Antiquities Organization, many such theories have been put forward but have 'gone with the wind' because 'we Egyptologists have solid evidence to state that the Sphinx is dated to the time of Khafre.'[27]

Likewise, Carol Redmont, an archaeologist at the University of California's Berkeley campus, was incredulous when it was suggested to her that the Sphinx might be thousands of years older than Khafre: 'There's just no way that could be true. The people of that region would not have had the technology, the governing institutions or even the will to build such a structure thousands of years before Khafre's reign.'[28]

When I first started to research this issue, I had assumed, as Hawass appeared to claim, that some incontrovertible new evidence must have been found which had settled the identity of the monument's builder. This was not the case. Indeed there are only three 'contextual' reasons why the construction of the anonymous, uninscribed and enigmatic

Sphinx is now so confidently attributed to Khafre:

1 Because of the cartouche of Khafre on line 13 of the Sphinx Stela erected by Thutmosis IV: Maspero gave a perfectly reasonable explanation for the presence of this cartouche: Thutmosis had been a restorer of the Sphinx and had paid due tribute to an earlier restoration of the monument—one undertaken during the Fourth Dynasty by Khafre. This explanation, which bears the obvious implication that the Sphinx must already have been old in Khafre's time, is rejected by modern Egyptologists. With their usual telepathic like-mindedness they now agree that Thutmosis put the cartouche on to the stela to recognize that Khafra had been the original builder (and not a mere restorer).

   Since there had only ever been this single cartouche—and since the texts on either side of it were missing when the stela was excavated, is it not a little premature to come to such hard-and-fast conclusions? What sort of 'science' is it that allows the mere presence of the cartouche of a Fourth Dynasty pharaoh (on a stele erected by an Eighteenth Dynasty pharaoh) to determine the entire identification of an otherwise anonymous monument? Besides, even that cartouche has now flaked off and cannot be examined ...

2 Because the Valley Temple next door is also attributed to Khafre: That attribution (based on statues which may well have been intrusive) is shaky to say the least. It has nevertheless received the wholehearted endorsement of the Egyptologists, who in the process decided to attribute the Sphinx to Khafre too (since the Sphinx and the Valley Temple are so obviously connected).

3 Because the face of the Sphinx is thought to resemble the intact statue of Khafre found in the pit in the Valley Temple: This, of course, is a matter of opinion. I have never seen the slightest resemblance between the two faces. Nor for that matter had forensic artists from the New York Police Department who had recently been brought in to do an Identikit comparison between the Sphinx and the statue[29] (as we shall see in Part VII).

All in all, therefore, as I stood overlooking the Sphinx in the late afternoon of 16 March 1993, I considered that the jury was still very much out on the correct attribution of this monument—either to Khafre on the one hand or to the architects of an as yet unidentified high civilization of prehistoric antiquity on the other.[30] No matter what the current flavour of the month (or century) happened to be with the Egyptologists, the fact was that both scenarios were plausible. What was needed, therefore, was some completely hard and unambiguous evidence which would settle the matter one way or the other.

[30] At least one orthodox Egyptologist, Selim Hassan, has admitted that the jury is still out on this issue. After twenty years of excavations at Giza he wrote, 'Except for the mutilated line on the Granite Stela of Thutmosis IV, which proves nothing, there is not one single ancient inscription which connects the Sphinx with Khafre. So, sound as it may appear, we must treat this evidence as circumstantial until such a time as a lucky turn of the spade will reveal to the world definite reference to the erection of this statue.' Egypt 2

Are There Any Secrets Left in Egypt?

During the early evening of 26 November 1922 the British archaeologist Howard Carter, together with his sponsor Lord Carnarvon, entered the tomb of a youthful pharaoh of the Eighteenth Dynasty who had ruled Egypt from 1352-43 BC. The name of that pharaoh, which has since resounded around the world, was Tutankhamun.

Two nights later, on 28 November, the tomb's 'Treasury' was breached. It was filled with a huge golden shrine and gave access to another chamber beyond. Rather unusually, this chamber, although heaped with a dazzling array of precious and beautiful artefacts, had no door: its entrance was watched over by an extraordinarily lifelike effigy of the jackal-headed mortuary god Anubis. With ears erect, the god crouched doglike, forepaws stretched out, on the lid of a gilded wooden casket perhaps four feet long, three feet high and two feet wide.

The Egyptian Museum, Cairo, December 1993

Still perched astride his casket, but now locked away in a dusty glass display case, Anubis held my attention for a long, quiet moment. His effigy had been carved out of stuccoed wood, entirely covered with black resin, then painstakingly inlaid with gold, alabaster, calcite, obsidian and silver—materials used to particular effect in the eyes, which glittered watchfully with an unsettling sense of fierce and focused intelligence. At the same time his finely etched ribs and lithe musculature gave off an aura of understated strength, energy and grace.

Captured by the force field of this occult and powerful presence, I was vividly reminded of the universal myths of precession I had been studying during the past year. Canine figures moved back and forth among these myths in a manner which at times had seemed almost plotted in the literary sense. I had begun to wonder whether the symbolism of dogs, wolves, jackals, and so on, might have been deliberately employed by the long-dead myth-makers to guide initiates through a maze of clues to secret reservoirs of lost scientific knowledge.

Among these reservoirs, I suspected, was the myth of Osiris. Much more than a myth, it had been dramatized and performed each year in Ancient Egypt in the form of a mystery play—a 'plotted' literary artefact, passed down as a treasured tradition since prehistoric times.[1] This tradition, as we saw in Part V, contained values for the rate of precessional motion that were so accurate and so consistent it was extremely difficult to attribute them to chance. Nor did it seem likely to be an accident that the jackal god had been assigned a role centre-stage in the drama, serving as the spirit guide of Osiris on his journey through the underworld.[2] It was tempting, too, to wonder whether there was any significance in the fact that in ancient times Anubis had been referred to by Egyptian priests as the 'guardian of the secret and sacred writings'.[3]) Under the grooved edge of the gilded casket on which his effigy now crouched was found an inscription: 'initiated into the secrets'.[4] Alternative translations of the same hieroglyphic text rendered it variously as 'he who is upon the secrets', and as 'guardian of the secrets'.[5]

But were there any secrets left in Egypt?

After more than a century of intensive archaeological investigations, could the sands of this antique land yield any further surprises?

Bauval's Stars and West's Stones

In 1993 there was an astonishing new discovery which suggested that there was much still to learn about Ancient Egypt. The discoverer, moreover, was not some astigmatic archaeologist sieving his way through the dust of ages but an outsider to the field: Robert Bauval, a Belgian construction engineer with a flair for astronomy who observed a correlation in the sky that the experts had missed in their fixation with the ground at their feet.

What Bauval saw was this: as the three belt stars of the Orion constellation crossed the merdian at Giza they lay in a not quite straight line high in the southern heavens. The lower two stars, Al Nitak and Al Nilam, formed a perfect diagonal but the third star, Mintaka, appeared to be offset to the observer's left, that is, towards the east.

The three pyramids of Giza plotted against the three belt stars of the Orion constellation.

Curiously enough (as we saw in Chapter Thirty-six), this was exactly the site-plan of the three enigmatic pyramids of the Giza plateau. Bauval realized that an aerial view of the Giza necropolis would show the Great Pyramid of Khufu occupying the position of Al Nitak, and the Second Pyramid of Khafre occupying the position of Al Nilam, while the Third Pyramid of Menkaure was offset to the east of the diagonal formed by the other two—thus completing what seemed at first to be a vast diagram of the stars.

Was this indeed what the Giza pyramids represented? I knew that Bauval’s later work, which had been wholeheartedly endorsed by mathematicians and astronomers, had borne out his inspired hunch. His evidence (reviewed fully in Chapter Forty-nine) showed that the three pyramids were an unbelievably precise terrestrial map of the three stars of Orion's belt, accurately reflecting the angles between each of them and even (by means of their respective sizes) providing some indication of their individual magnitudes.[6] Moreover, this map extended outwards to the north and south to encompass several other structures on the Giza plateau—once again with faultless precision.[7] However, the real surprise revealed by Bauval's astronomical calculations was this: despite the fact that some aspects of the Great Pyramid did relate astronomically to the Pyramid Age, the Giza monuments as a whole were so arranged as to provide a picture of the skies (which alter their appearance down the ages as a result of precession of the equinoxes) not as they had looked in the Fourth Dynasty around 2500 BC, but as they had looked—and only as they had looked—around the year 10,450 BC.[8]

I had come to Egypt to go over the Giza site with Robert Bauval and to question him about his star-correlation theory. In addition I wanted to canvass his views on what sort of human society, if any, could have had the technological know-how, such a very long while ago, to measure accurately the altitudes of the stars and to devise a plan as mathematical and ambitious as that of the Giza necropolis.

I had also come to meet another researcher who had challenged the orthodox chronology of Ancient Egypt with a well-founded claim to have found hard evidence of a high civilization in the Nile Valley in 10,000 BC or earlier. Like Bauval's astronomical data, the evidence had always been available but had failed to attract the attention of established Egyptologists. The man responsible for bringing it before the public now was the American scholar, John Anthony West, who argued that the specialists had missed it—not because they had failed to find it, but because they had found it and had failed to interpret it properly.[9]

West's evidence focused on certain key structures, notably the Great Sphinx and the Valley Temple at Giza and, much farther south, the mysterious Osireion at Abydos. He argued that these desert monuments showed many scientifically unmistakable signs of having been weathered by water, an erosive agent they could only have been exposed to in sufficient quantities during the damp 'pluvial' period that accompanied the end of the last Ice Age around the eleventh millennium BC.[10] The implication of this peculiar and extremely distinctive pattern of 'precipitation induced' weathering, was that the Osireion, the Sphinx, and other associated structures were built before 10,000 BC.[11]

A British investigative journalist summed up the effect:

> West is really an academic's worst nightmare, because here comes somebody way out of left-field with a thoroughly well thought out, well presented, coherently described theory, full of data they can't refute, and it pulls the rug out from beneath their feet. So how do they deal with it? They ignore it. They hope it'll go away ... and it won't go away.[12]

The reason the new theory would not, under any circumstances, go away, despite its rejection by droves of 'competent Egyptologists', was that it had won widespread support from another scientific branch of scholarship—geology. Dr Robert Schoch, a professor of Geology at Boston University, had played a prominent role in validating West's estimates concerning the true age of the Sphinx, and his views had been endorsed by almost 300 of his peers at the 1992 annual convention of the Geological Society of America.[13]

Since then, most often out of the public eye, an acrimonious dispute had begun to smoulder between the geologists and the Egyptologists.[14] And though very few people other than John West were prepared to say as much, what was at stake in this dispute was a complete upheaval in accepted views about the evolution of human civilization.

According to West:

> We are told that the evolution of human civilization is a linear process—that it goes from stupid cavemen to smart old us with our hydrogen bombs and striped toothpaste. But the proof that the Sphinx is many, many thousands of years older than the archaeologists think it is, that it preceded by many thousands of years even dynastic Egypt, means that there must have been, at some distant point in history, a high and sophisticated civilization—just as all the legends affirm.[15]

My own travels and research during the preceding four years had opened my eyes to the electrifying possibility that those legends could be true, and this was why I had come back to Egypt to meet West and Bauval. I was struck by the way in which their hitherto disparate lines of enquiry[16] had converged so convincingly on what appeared to be the astronomical and geological fingerprints of a lost civilization, one that might or might not have originated in the Nile Valley but that seemed to have had a presence here as far back as the eleventh millennium BC.

The way of the jackal

Anubis, guardian of the secrets, god of the funerary chamber, jackal-headed opener of the ways of the dead, guide and companion of Osiris ...

It was around five o'clock in the afternoon, closing-time at the Cairo Museum, when Santha pronounced herself satisfied with her photographs of the sinister black effigy. Down below us guards were whistling and clapping their hands as they sought to herd the last few sightseers out of the halls, but up on the second floor of the hundred-year-old building, where ancient Anubis crouched in his millennial watchfulness, all was quiet, all was still.

We left the sombre museum and walked down into the sunlight still bathing Cairo's bustling Tahrir Square.

Anubis, I reflected, had shared his duties as spirit guide and guardian of the secret writings with another god whose type and symbol had also been the jackal and whose name, Upuaut, literally meant Opener of the Ways.[17] Both these canine deities had been linked since time immemorial with the ancient town of Abydos in upper Egypt, the original god of which, Khenti-Amentiu (the strangely named 'Foremost of the Westerners') had also been represented as a member of the dog family, usually lying recumbent on a black standard.[18]

Was there any significance in the repeated recurrence at Abydos of all this mythical and symbolic doggishness, with its promise of high secrets waiting to unfold? It seemed worthwhile trying to find out since the extensive ruins there included the structure known as the Osireion, which West's geological research had indicated might be far older than the archaeologists thought. Besides, I had already arranged to meet West in a few days in the upper Egyptian town of Luxor, less than 200 kilometres south of Abydos. Rather than flying directly to Luxor from Cairo, as I had originally planned, I now realized that it would be perfectly feasible to go by road and to visit Abydos and a number of other sites along the way.

Our driver, Mohamed Walili, was waiting for us in an underground car-park just off Tahrir Square. A large genial, elderly man, he owned a battered white Peugeot taxi normally to be found standing in the rank outside the Mena House hotel at Giza. Over the last few years, on our frequent research trips to Cairo, we had struck up a friendship with him and he now worked with us whenever we were in Egypt. We haggled for some time about the appropriate daily rate for the long return journey to Abydos and Luxor. Many matters had to be taken into account, including the fact that some of the areas we would be passing through had recently been targets of terrorist attacks by Islamic militants. Eventually we agreed on a price and arranged to set off early the following morning.

City of the Sun, Chamber of the Jackal

Mohamed picked us up at our hotel in Heliopolis at 6 a. m. when it was still half dark.

We drank small cups of thick black coffee at a roadside stall and then drove west, along dusty streets still almost deserted, towards the River Nile. I had asked Mohamed to take us through Maydan al-Massallah Square, which was dominated by one of the world's oldest intact Egyptian obelisks.[1] Weighing an estimated 350 tons, this was a pink granite monolith, 107 feet high, erected by Pharaoh Senuseret I (1971-1928 BC). It had originally been one of a pair at the gateway of the great Heliopolitan Temple of the Sun. In the 4000 years since then the temple itself had entirely vanished, as had the second obelisk. Indeed, almost all of ancient Heliopolis had now been obliterated, cannibalized for its handsome dressed stones and ready-made building materials by countless generations of the citizens of Cairo.[2]

Heliopolis (City of the Sun) was referred to in the Bible as On but was originally known in the Egyptian language as Innu, or Innu Mehret—meaning 'the pillar' or 'the northern pillar'.[3] It was a district of immense sanctity, associated with a strange group of nine solar and stellar deities, and was old beyond reckoning when Senuseret chose it as the site for his obelisk. Indeed, together with Giza (and the distant southern city of Abydos) Innu/Heliopolis was believed to have been part of the first land that emerged from the primeval waters at the moment of creation, the land of the 'First Time', where the gods had commenced their rule on earth.[4]

Heliopolitan theology rested on a creation-myth distinguished by a number of unique and curious features. It taught that in the beginning the universe had been filled with a dark, watery nothingness, called the Nun. Out of this inert cosmic ocean (described as 'shapeless, black with the blackness of the blackest night') rose a mound of dry land on which Ra, the Sun God, materialized in his self-created form as Atum (sometimes depicted as an old bearded man leaning on a staff):[5]

> The sky had not been created, the earth had not been created, the children of the earth and the reptiles had not been fashioned in that place ... I, Atum, was one by myself ... There existed no other who worked with me ...[6]

Conscious of being alone, this blessed and immortal being contrived to create two divine offspring, Shu, god of the air and dryness, and Tefnut the goddess of moisture: 'I thrust my phallus into my closed hand. I made my seed to enter my hand. I poured it into my own mouth. I evacuated under the form of Shu, I passed water under the form of Tefnut.'[7]

Despite such apparently inauspicious beginnings, Shu and Tefnut (who were always described as 'Twins' and frequently depicted as lions) grew to maturity, copulated and produced offspring of their own: Geb the god of the earth and Nut, the goddess of the sky. These two also mated, creating Osiris and Isis, Set and Nepthys, and so completed the Ennead, the full company of the Nine Gods of Heliopolis. Of the nine, Ra, Shu, Geb and Osiris were said to have ruled in Egypt as kings, followed by Horus, and lastly—for 3226 years—by the Ibis-headed wisdom god Thoth.[8]

Who were these people—or creatures, or beings, or gods? Were they figments of the priestly imagination, or symbols, or ciphers? Were the stories told about them vivid myth memories of real events which had taken place thousands of years previously? Or were they, perhaps, part of a coded message from the ancients that had been transmitting itself over and over again down the epochs—a message only now beginning to be unravelled and understood?

Such notions seemed fanciful. Nevertheless I could hardly forget that out of this very same Heliopolitan tradition the great myth of Isis and Osiris had flowed, covertly transmitting an accurate calculus for the rate of precessional motion. Moreover the priests of Innu, whose responsibility it had been to guard and nurture such traditions, had been renowned throughout Egypt for their high wisdom and their proficiency in prophecy, astronomy, mathematics, architecture and the magic arts. They were also famous for their possession of a powerful and sacred object known as the Benben.[9]

The Egyptians called Heliopolis Innu, the pillar, because tradition had it that the Benben had been kept here in remote pre-dynastic times, when it had balanced on top of a pillar of rough-hewn stone.

The Benben was believed to have fallen from the skies. Unfortunately, it had been lost so long before that its appearance was no longer remembered by the time Senuseret took the throne in 1971 BC. In that period (the Twelfth Dynasty) all that was clearly recalled was that the Benben had been pyramidal in form, thus providing (together with the pillar on which it stood) a prototype for the shape of all future obelisks. The name Benben was likewise applied to the pyramidion, or apex stone, usually placed on top of pyramids.[10] In a symbolic sense, it was also associated closely and directly with Ra-Atum, of whom the ancient texts said, 'You became high on the height; you rose up as the Benben stone in the Mansion of the Phoenix ...'[11]

Mansion of the Phoenix described the original temple at Heliopolis where the Benben had been housed. It reflected the fact that the mysterious object had also served as an enduring symbol for the mythical Phoenix, the divine Bennu bird whose appearances and disappearances were believed to be linked to violent cosmic cycles and to the destruction and rebirth of world ages.[12]

Connections and similarities

Driving through the suburbs of Heliopolis at around 6:30 in the morning I closed my eyes and tried to summon up a picture of the landscape as it might have looked in the mythical First Time after the Island of Creation[13]—the primordial mound of Ra-Atum—had risen out of the flood waters of the Nun. It was tempting to see a connection between this imagery and the Andean traditions that spoke of the emergence of the civilizer god Viracocha from the waters of Lake Titicaca after an earth-destroying flood. Moreover there was the figure of Osiris to consider—a conspicuously bearded figure, like Viracocha, and like Quetzalcoatl as well—remembered for having abolished cannibalism among the Egyptians, for having taught them agriculture and animal husbandry, and for introducing them to such arts as writing, architecture, and music.[14]

The similarities between the Old and New World traditions were hard to miss but even harder to interpret. It was possible they were just a series of beguiling coincidences. On the other hand, it was possible that they might reveal the fingerprints of an ancient and unidentified global civilization—fingerprints that were essentially the same whether they appeared in the myths of Central America, or of the high Andes, or of Egypt. The priests of Heliopolis, after all, had taught of the creation, but who had taught them? Had they sprung out of nowhere, or was it more likely that their doctrine, with all its complex symbolism, was the product of a long refinement of religious ideas?

If so, when and where had these ideas developed?

I looked up to discover that we had left Heliopolis behind and were winding our way through the noisy and crowded streets of down-town Cairo. We crossed over to the west bank of the Nile by way of the 6 October Bridge and soon afterwards entered Giza. Fifteen minutes later, passing the massive bulk of the Great Pyramid on our right, we turned south on the road to upper Egypt, a road which followed the meridional course of the world's longest river through a landscape of palms and green fields fringed by the encroaching red wastes of pitiless deserts.

The ideas of the Heliopolitan priesthood had influenced every aspect of secular and religious life in Ancient Egypt, but had those ideas developed locally, or had they been introduced to the Nile Valley from elsewhere? The traditions of the Egyptians provided an unambiguous answer to questions such as these. All the wisdom of Heliopolis was a legacy, they said, and this legacy had been passed to humankind by the gods.

Gift of the Gods?

About ten miles south of the Great Pyramid we pulled off the main road to visit the necropolis of Saqqara. Rearing up on the desert's edge, the site was dominated by a six-tier ziggurat, the step-pyramid of the Third Dynasty Pharaoh Zoser. This imposing monument, almost 200 feet tall, was dated to approximately 2650 BC. It stood within its own compound, surrounded by an elegant enclosure wall, and was reckoned by archaeologists to be the earliest massive construction of stone ever attempted by humanity.[15] Tradition had it that its architect was the legendary Imhotep, 'Great of Magic', a high priest of Heliopolis, whose other titles were Sage, Sorcerer, Astronomer and Doctor.[16]

Saqqara.

We shall have more to say about the step-pyramid and its builder in a later chapter, but on this occasion I had not come to Saqqara to see it. My sole objective was to spend a few moments in the burial chamber of the nearby pyramid of Unas, a Fifth Dynasty pharaoh who had reigned from 2356 to 2323 BC.[17] The walls of this chamber, which I had visited several times before, were inscribed from floor to ceiling with the most ancient of the Pyramid Texts, an extravaganza of hieroglyphic inscriptions giving voice to a range of remarkable ideas—in acute contrast to the mute and unadorned interiors of the Fourth Dynasty pyramids at Giza.

A phenomenon exclusively of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasties (2465-2152 BC), the Pyramid Texts were sacred writings, parts of which were thought to have been composed by the Heliopolitan priesthood in the late third millennium BC, and parts of which had been received and handed down by them from pre-dynastic times.[18] It was the latter parts of these Texts, dating to a remote and impenetrable antiquity, which had particularly aroused my curiosity when I had begun to research them a few months previously. I had also been amused—and a little intrigued—by the strange way that nineteenth century French archaeologists appeared almost to have been directed to the hidden chamber of the Pyramid Texts by a mythological 'opener of the ways.' According to reasonably well-documented reports, an Egyptian foreman of the excavations at Saqqara had been up and about at dawn one morning and had found himself by the side of a ruined pyramid looking into the bright amber eyes of a lone desert jackal:

> It was as if the animal were taunting his human observer ... and inviting the puzzled man to chase him. Slowly the jackal sauntered towards the north face of > the pyramid, stopping for a moment before disappearing into a hole. The bemused Arab decided to follow his lead. After slipping through the narrow hole, he found himself crawling into the dark bowels of the pyramid. Soon he emerged into a chamber and, lifting his light, saw that the walls were covered from top to bottom with hieroglyphic inscriptions. These were carved with exquisite craftsmanship into the solid limestone and painted over with turquoise and gold.'[19]

Today the hieroglyph-lined chamber beneath the ruined pyramid of Unas is still reached through the north face by the long descending passage the French archaeological team excavated soon after the foreman's astonishing discovery. The chamber consists of two rectangular rooms separated by a partition wall, into which is let a low doorway. Both rooms are covered by a gabled ceiling painted with myriads of stars. Emerging stooped from the cramped passage, Santha and I entered the first of the two rooms and passed through the connecting doorway into the second. This was the tomb chamber proper, with the massive black granite sarcophagus of Unas at its western end and the strange utterances of the Pyramid Texts proclaiming themselves from every wall.

Speaking to us directly (rather than through riddles and mathematical legerdemain like the unadorned walls of the Great Pyramid), what were the hieroglyphs saying? I knew that the answer depended to some extent on which translation you were using, largely because the language of the Pyramid Texts contained so many archaic forms and so many unfamiliar mythological allusions that scholars were obliged to fill in the gaps in their knowledge with guesswork.[20] Nevertheless it was generally agreed that the late R. O. Faulkner, a professor of the Ancient Egyptian Language at University College London, had produced the most authoritative version.[21]

Faulkner, whose translation I had studied line by line, described the Texts as constituting 'the oldest corpus of Egyptian religious and funerary literature now extant' and added, 'they are the least corrupt of all such collections and are of fundamental importance to the student of Egyptian religion ...'[22] The reason why the Texts were so important (as many scholars agreed), was that they were the last completely open channel connecting the relatively short period of the past that humanity remembers to the far longer period that has been forgotten: 'They vaguely disclose to us a vanished world of thought and speech, the last of the unnumbered aeons through which prehistoric man has passed, till finally he ... enters the historic age.'[23]

It was hard to disagree with sentiments like these: the Texts did disclose a vanished world. But what intrigued me most about this world was the possibility that it might have been inhabited not only by primitive savages (as one would have expected in remote prehistory) but, paradoxically, by men and women whose minds had been enlightened by a scientific understanding of the cosmos. The overall picture was equivocal: there were genuinely primitive elements locked into the Pyramid Texts alongside the loftier sequences of ideas. Nevertheless, every time I immersed myself in what Egyptologists call 'these ancient spells', I was impressed by the strange glimpses they seemed to afford of a high intelligence at work, darting from behind layers of incomprehension, reporting on experiences that 'prehistoric man' should never have had and expressing notions he should never have been able to formulate. In short, the effect the Texts achieved through the medium of hieroglyphs was akin to the effect the Great Pyramid achieved through the medium of architecture. In both cases the dominant impression was of anachronism—of advanced technological processes used or described at a period in human history when there was supposed to have been no technology at all ...

Anachronisms and Enigmas

I looked around the grey-walled chamber of Unas, up and down the long registers of hieroglyphs in which the Pyramid Texts were inscribed. They were written in a dead language. Nevertheless, the constant affirmation, repeated over and over again in these ancient compositions, was that of life—eternal life—which was to be achieved through the pharaoh's rebirth as a star in the constellation of Orion. As the reader will recall from Chapter Nineteen, (where we compared Egyptian beliefs with those of Ancient Mexico), there were several utterances which voiced this aspiration explicitly:

> Oh King, you are this Great Star, the Companion of Orion, who traverses the sky with Orion ... you ascend from the east of the sky being renewed in your due season, and rejuvenated in your due time ...'[1]

Though undeniably beautiful there was nothing inherently extraordinary about these sentiments, and it was by no means impossible to attribute them to a people assessed by the French archaeologist Gaston Maspero as having 'always remained half savage'.[2] Furthermore, since Maspero had been the first Egyptologist to enter the pyramid of Unas,[3] and was considered a great authority on the Texts, it was hardly surprising that his opinions should have shaped all academic responses to this literature since he began to publish translations from it in the 1880s.[4] Maspero (with a little help from a jackal) had brought the Pyramid Texts to the world. Thereafter, the dominance of his particular prejudices about the past had functioned as a filter on knowledge, inhibiting variant interpretations of the more opaque or puzzling utterances. This seemed to me to be unfortunate to say the least. What it meant was that, despite the technical and scientific puzzles raised by monuments like the Great Pyramid at Giza, scholars had ignored the implications of some striking passages in the Texts.

These passages sounded suspiciously like attempts to express complex technical and scientific imagery in an entirely inappropriate idiom. Maybe it was coincidence, but the result resembled the outcome that we might expect today if we were to try to translate Einstein's Theory of Relativity into Chaucerian English or to describe a supersonic aircraft in vocabulary derived from Middle High German.

Broken images of a lost technology?

Take for example some of the peculiar equipment and accessories designated for the pharaoh's use as he journeyed to his eternal resting place among the stars:

> The gods who are in the sky are brought to you, the gods who are on earth assemble for you, they place their hands under you, they make a ladder for you that you may ascend on it into the sky, the doors of the sky are thrown open to you, the doors of the starry firmament are thrown open for you.[5]

The ascending pharaoh was identified with, and frequently referred to, as 'an Osiris'. Osiris himself, as we have seen, was frequently linked to and associated with the constellation of Orion. Osiris-Orion was said to have been the first to have climbed the great ladder the gods had made. And several utterances left no doubt that this ladder had not extended upwards from earth to heaven but downwards from heaven to earth. It was described as a rope-ladder[6] and the belief was that it had hung from an 'iron plate' suspended in the sky.[7]

Were we dealing here, I wondered, simply with the bizarre imaginings of half-savage priests? Or might there be some other explanation for allusions such as these?

In Utterance 261, 'The King is a flame, moving before the wind to the end of the sky and to the end of the earth ... the King travels the air and traverses the earth ... there is brought to him a way of ascent to the sky ...'[8]

Switching to dialogue, Utterance 310 proclaimed,

'O you whose vision is in his face and whose vision is in the back of his head, bring this to me!'

'What ferry-boat shall be brought to you?'

'Bring me: "It-flies-and-alights".'[9]

Utterance 332, supposedly spoken by the King himself, confided, 'I am this one who has escaped from the coiled serpent, I have ascended in a blast of fire having turned myself about. The two skies go to me.[10]

And in Utterance 669 it was asked, 'Wherewith can the King be made to fly-up?'

The reply was given: 'There shall be brought to you the Hnw-bark [italicized word untranslatable] and the ... [text missing] of the hn-bird [italicized word untranslatable]. You shall fly up therewith ... You shall fly up and alight.'[11]

Other passages also seemed to me worthy of more thorough investigation than they have received from scholars. Here are a few examples:

> O my father, great King, the aperture of the sky-window is opened for you.[12]
> 'The door of the sky at the horizon opens to you, the gods are glad at meeting you ... May you sit on this iron throne of yours, as the Great One who is in Heliopolis.[13]
> O King, may you ascend ... The sky reels at you, the earth quakes at you, the Imperishable Stars are afraid of you. I have come to you, O you whose seats are hidden, that I may embrace you in the sky ...[14]
> The earth speaks, the gate of the earth god is open, the doors of Geb are opened for you ... May you remove yourself to the sky upon your iron throne.[15]
> O my father the King, such is your going when you have gone as a god, your travelling as a celestial being ... you stand in the Conclaves of the horizon ... and sit on this throne of iron at which the gods marvel ...[16]

The constant references to iron, though easy to overlook, were puzzling. Iron, I knew, had been a rare metal in Ancient Egypt, particularly in the Pyramid Age when it had supposedly only been available in meteoritic form.[17] Yet here, in the Pyramid Texts, there seemed to be an embarrassment of iron riches: iron plates in the sky, iron thrones, and elsewhere an iron sceptre (Utterance 665C) and even iron bones for the King (Utterances 325, 684 and 723).[18]

In the Ancient Egyptian language the name for iron had been bja, a word that meant literally 'metal of heaven' or 'divine metal'.[19] The knowledge of iron was thus regarded as yet another gift from the gods ...

Repositories of a lost science?

[20] Among the many mysterious aspects of the Pyramid Texts it is perhaps inevitable that a fully qualified Opener of the Ways should put in an appearance. 'The doors of the sky are opened to you, the starry sky is thrown open for you, the jackal of upper Egypt comes down to you as Anubis at your side.' (The Ancient Egyptian Pyramid Texts, pp.

In my readings—here and there among the most archaic of the Utterances—I had come across several metaphors that seemed to refer to the passage of epochs of precessional time. These metaphors stood out from the surrounding material because they were expressed in what had become a clear and familiar terminology to me: that of the archaic scientific language identified by Santillana and von Dechend in Hamlet's Mill.[21]

The reader may recall that a cosmic 'diagram' of the four props of the sky was one of the standard thought tools employed in that ancient language. Its purpose was to assist visualisation of the four imaginary bands conceived as framing, supporting and defining a precessional world age. These were what astronomers call the 'equinoctial and solstitial colures' and were seen as hooping down from the celestial north pole and marking the four constellations against the background of which, for periods of 2160 years at a time, the sun would consistently rise on the spring and autumn equinoxes and on the winter and summer solstices.[22]

The Pyramid Texts appear to contain several versions of this diagram. Moreover, as is so often the case with prehistoric myths which transmit hard astronomical data, the precessional symbolism is interwoven tightly with violent images of terrestrial destruction—as though to suggest that the 'breaking of the mill of heaven', that is the transition every 2160 years from one zodiacal age to another, could under ill-omened circumstances bring catastrophic influences to bear on terrestrial events.

Thus it was said that

> Ra-Atum, the god who created himself, was originally king over gods and men together but mankind schemed against his sovereignty, for he began to grow old, his bones became silver, his flesh gold and his hair [as] lapis lazuli.[23]

When he realized what was happening, the ageing Sun God (so reminiscent of Tonatiuh, the bloodthirsty Fifth Sun of the Aztecs) determined that he would punish this insurrection by killing off most of the human race. The instrument of the havoc he unleashed was symbolized at times as a raging lioness wading in blood and at times as the fearsome lion-headed goddess Sekhmet who 'poured fire out of herself and savaged mankind in an ecstasy of slaughter.[24]

The terrible destruction continued unabated for a long period. Then at last Ra intervened to save the lives of a 'remnant', the ancestors of present humanity. This intervention took the form of a flood which the lioness thirstily lapped up and then fell asleep. When she awoke, she was no longer interested in pursuing the destruction, and peace descended upon the devastated world.[25]

Meanwhile Ra had resolved to 'draw away' from what was left of his creation: 'As I live my heart is weary of staying with Mankind. I have gone on killing them [almost] to the very last one, so the [insignificant] remnant is not my affair ...'[26]

The Sun God then rose into the sky on the back of the sky-goddess Nut who (for the purposes of the precessional metaphor about to be delivered) had transformed herself into a cow. Before very long—in a close analogy to the 'shaft-tree' that 'shivered' on Amlodhi's wildly gyrating mill—the cow grew 'dizzy and began to shake and to tremble because she was so high above the earth.'[27] When she complained to Ra about this precarious state of affairs he commanded, 'Let my son Shu be put beneath Nut to keep guard for me over the heavenly supports—which exist in the twilight. Put her above your head and keep her there.'[28] As soon as Shu had taken his place beneath the cow and had stabilized her body, 'the heavens above and the earth beneath came into being'. At the same moment, 'the four legs of the cow', as Egyptologist Wallis Budge commented in his classic study The Gods of the Egyptians, 'became the four props of heaven at the four cardinal points'.[29]

Like most scholars, Budge understandably assumed that the 'cardinal points' referred to in this Ancient Egyptian tradition had strictly terrestrial connotations and that 'heaven' represented nothing more than the sky above our heads. He took it for granted that the point of the metaphor was for us to envisage the cow's four legs as positioned at the four points of the compass—north, south, east and west. He also thought—and even today few Egyptologists would disagree with him—that the simple-minded priests of Heliopolis had actually believed that the sky had four corners which were supported on four legs and that Shu, 'the skybearer par excellence', had stood immobile like a pillar at the centre of the whole edifice.[30]

Reinterpreted in the light of Santillana's and von Dechend's findings, however, Shu and the four legs of the celestial cow look much more like the components of an archaic scientific symbol depicting the frame of a precessional world age—the polar axis (Shu) and the colures (the four legs or 'props' marking the equinoctial and solstitial cardinal points in the annual round of the sun).

Moreover, it is tempting to speculate which world age was being signalled here ...

With a cow involved it could have been the Age of Taurus, although the Egyptians knew the difference between bulls and cows as well as anyone. But a much more likely contender—at any rate on purely symbolic grounds—is the age of Leo, from approximately 10,970 to 8810 BC.[31] The reason is that Sekhmet, the agent of the destruction of Mankind referred to in the myth, was leonine in form. What better way to symbolize the troubled birth of the new world age of Leo than to depict its harbinger as a rampaging lion, particularly since the Age of Leo coincided with the final ferocious meltdown of the last Ice Age, during which huge numbers of animal species all over the earth were suddenly and violently rendered extinct.'[32] Mankind survived the immense floods and earthquakes and rapid changes of climate that took place, but very probably in much reduced numbers and much reduced circumstances.

The train of the Sun and the dweller in Sirius

Of course the ability to recognize and define precessional world ages in myth implies that the Ancient Egyptians possessed better observational astronomy and a more sophisticated understanding of the mechanics of the solar system than any ancient people have hitherto been credited with.[33] There is no doubt that knowledge of this calibre, if it existed at all, would have been highly regarded by the Ancient Egyptians, who would have transmitted it from generation to generation in a secretive manner. Indeed, it would have ranked among the highest arcana entrusted to the keeping of the priestly elite at Heliopolis and would have been passed on, in the main, through an oral and initiatory tradition.[34] If, by chance it had found its way into the Pyramid Texts, is it not likely that its form would have been veiled by metaphors and allegories?

I walked slowly across the dusty floor of the tomb chamber of Unas, noting the heavy stillness in the air, casting my eyes over the faded blue and gold inscriptions. Expressed in coded language several millennia before Copernicus and Galileo, some of the passages inscribed on these walls seemed to offer clues to the true heliocentric nature of the solar system.

[34] The issue of priestly secrecy and the oral tradition is discussed at length in From Fetish to God in Ancient Egypt, e.g. p. 43: 'It is impossible to think that the highest order of the priests did not possess esoteric knowledge which they guarded with the greatest care. Each priesthood ... possessed a "Gnosis", a "superiority of knowledge", which they never put into writing ... It is therefore absurd to expect to find in Egyptian papyri descriptions of the secrets which formed the esoteric knowledge of the priests.' See also page 27, and Sacred Science, pp. 273-4.

In one, for example, Ra, the Sun God, was depicted as seated upon an iron throne encircled by lesser gods who moved around him constantly and who were said to be ‘in his train’.[35] Likewise, in another passage, the deceased Pharaoh was urged to ‘stand at the head of the two halves of the sky and weigh the words of the gods, the aged ones, who revolve around Ra.’[36]

If the ‘aged ones’ and the ‘encircling gods’ revolving around Ra should prove to be parts of a terminology referring to the planets of our solar system, the original authors of the Pyramid Texts must have enjoyed access to some remarkably advanced astronomical data. They must have known that the earth and the planets revolved around the sun rather than vice versa.[37] The problem this raises is that neither the Ancient Egyptians at any stage in their history, nor even their successors the Greeks, or for that matter the Europeans until the Renaissance, are supposed to have possessed cosmological data of anything approaching this quality. How, therefore, can its presence be explained in compositions which date back to the dawn of Egyptian civilization?

Another (and perhaps related) mystery concerns the star Sirius, which the Egyptians identified with Isis, the sister and consort of Osiris and the mother of Horus. In a passage addressed to Osiris himself, the Pyramid Texts state:

> Thy sister Isis cometh unto thee rejoicing in her love for thee. Thou settest her upon thee, thy issue entereth into her, and she becometh great with child like the star Sept [Sirius, the Dog Star]. Horus-Sept cometh forth from thee in the form of Horus, dweller in Sept.[38]

Many interpretations of this passage are, of course, possible. What intrigued me, however, was the clear implication that Sirius was to be regarded as a dual entity in some way comparable to a woman ‘great with child’. Moreover, after the birth (or coming forth) of that child, the text makes a special point of reminding us that Horus remained a ‘dweller in Sept’, presumably suggesting that he stayed close to his mother.

Sirius is an unusual star. A sparkling point of light particularly prominent in the winter months in the night skies of the northern hemisphere, it consists of a binary star system, i.e. it is in fact, as the Pyramid Texts suggest, a ‘dual entity’. The major component, Sirius-A, is what we see. Sirius-B, on the other hand—the dwarf-star which revolves around Sirius A—is absolutely invisible to the naked eye. Its existence did not become known to Western science until 1862, when US astronomer Alvin Clark spotted it through one of the largest and most advanced telescopes of the day.[39] How could the scribes who wrote the Pyramid Texts possibly have obtained the information that Sirius was two stars in one?

In The Sirius Mystery, an important book published in 1976, I knew that the American author Robert Temple had offered some extraordinary answers to this question.[40] His study focused on the traditional beliefs of the Dogon tribe of West Africa—beliefs in which the binary character of Sirius was explicitly described and in which the correct figure of fifty years was given for the period of the orbit of Sirius-B around Sirius-A.[41] Temple argued cogently that this high quality technical information had been passed down to the Dogon from the Ancient Egyptians through a process of cultural diffusion, and that it was to the Ancient Egyptians that we should look for an answer to the Sirius mystery. He also concluded that the Ancient Egyptians must have received the information from intelligent beings from the region of Sirius'.[42]

Like Temple, I had begun to suspect that the more advanced and sophisticated elements of Egyptian science made sense only if they were understood as parts of an inheritance. Unlike Temple, I saw no urgent reason to attribute that inheritance to extra-terrestrials. To my mind the anomalous star knowledge the Heliopolitan priests had apparently possessed was more plausibly explained as the legacy of a lost human civilization which, against the current of history, had achieved a high level of technological advancement in remote antiquity. It seemed to me that the building of an instrument capable of detecting Sirius-B might not have been beyond the ingenuity of the unknown explorers and scientists who originated the remarkable maps of the prehistoric world discussed in Part I. Nor would it have daunted the unknown astronomers and measurers of time who bequeathed to the Ancient Maya a calendar of amazing complexity, a data-base about the movements of the heavenly bodies which could only have been the product of thousands of years of accurately recorded observations, and a facility with very large numbers that seemed more appropriate to the needs of a complex technological society than to those of a 'primitive' Central American kingdom.[43]

Millions of years and the movements of the stars

Very large numbers also appeared in the Pyramid Texts, in the symbolic 'boat of millions of years', for example, in which the Sun God was said to navigate the dark and airless wastes of interstellar space.[44] Thoth, the god of wisdom ('he who reckons in heaven, the counter of the stars, the measurer of the earth') was specifically empowered to grant a life of millions of years to the deceased pharaoh.[45] Osiris, 'king of eternity, lord of everlasting', was described as traversing millions of years in his life.'[46] And figures like 'tens of millions of years' (as well as the more mind-boggling 'one million of millions of years')[47] occurred often enough to suggest that some elements at least of Ancient Egyptian culture must have evolved for the convenience of scientifically minded people with more than passing insight into the immensity of time.

Such a people would, of course, have required an excellent calendar—one that would have facilitated complex and accurate calculations. It was therefore not surprising to learn that the Ancient Egyptians, like the Maya, had possessed such a calendar and that their understanding of its workings seemed to have declined, rather than improved, as the ages went by.[48] It was tempting to see this as the gradual erosion of a corpus of knowledge inherited an extremely long time ago, an impression supported by the Ancient Egyptians themselves, who made no secret of their belief that their calendar was a legacy which they had received 'from the gods'.

We consider the possible identity of these gods in more detail in the following chapters. Whoever they were, they must have spent a great deal of their time observing the stars, and they had accumulated a fund of advanced and specialized knowledge concerning the star Sirius in particular. Further evidence for this came in the form of the most useful calendrical gift which the gods supposedly gave to the Egyptians: the Sothic (or Sirian) cycle.[49]

The Sothic cycle was based on what is referred to in technical jargon as 'the periodic return of the heliacal rising of Sirius', which is the first appearance of this star after a seasonal absence, rising at dawn just ahead of the sun in the eastern portion of the sky.[50] In the case of Sirius the interval between one such rising and the next amounts to exactly 365.25 days—a mathematically harmonious figure, uncomplicated by further decimal points, which is just twelve minutes longer than the duration of the solar year.[51]

The curious thing about Sirius is that out of an estimated 2000 stars in the heavens visible to the naked eye it is the only one to rise heliacally at this precise and nicely rounded interval of 365 and a quarter days—a unique product of its 'proper motion' (the speed of its own movement through space) combined with the effects of precession of the equinoxes.[52] Moreover, it is known that the day of the heliacal rising of Sirius—New Year's Day in the Ancient Egyptian calendar—was traditionally calculated at Heliopolis, where the Pyramid Texts were compiled, and announced ahead of time to all the other major temples up and down the Nile.[53]

I remembered that Sirius was referred to directly in the Pyramid Texts by 'her name of the New Year'.[54] Together with other relevant utterances (e.g., 669[55]), this confirmed that the Sothic calendar was at least as old as the Texts themselves,[56] and their origins stretched back into the mists of distant antiquity. The great enigma, therefore, is this: in such an early period, who could have possessed the necessary know-how to observe and take note of the coincidence of the period of 365.25 days with the heliacal rising of Sirius—a coincidence described by the French mathematician R.A. Schwaller de Lubicz as 'an entirely exceptional celestial phenomenon'?[57]

> We cannot but admire the greatness of a science capable of discovering such a coincidence. The double star of Sirius was chosen because it was the only star that moves the needed distance and in the right direction against the background of the other stars. This fact, known four thousand years before our time and forgotten until our day, obviously demands an extraordinary and prolonged observation of the sky.[58]

It was such a legacy—built out of long centuries of precise observational astronomy and scientific record-keeping—that Egypt seems to have I benefited from at the beginning of the historical period and that was expressed in the Pyramid Texts.

In this, too, there lies a mystery ...

Copies, or translations?

Writing in 1934, the year of his death, Wallis Budge, former Keeper of Egyptian Antiquities at the British Museum and the author of an authoritative hieroglyphic dictionary,[59] made this frank admission:

> The Pyramid Texts are full of difficulties of every kind. The exact meanings of a large number of words found in them are unknown ... The construction of the sentence often baffles all attempts to translate it, and when it contains wholly unknown words it becomes an unsolved riddle. It is only reasonable to suppose that these texts were often used for funerary purposes, but it is quite clear that their period of use in Egypt was little more than one hundred years. Why they were suddenly brought into use at the end of the Fifth Dynasty and ceased to be used at the end of the Sixth Dynasty is inexplicable.'[60]

Could the answer be that they were copies of an earlier literature which Unas, the last pharaoh of the Fifth Dynasty, together with several of his successors in the Sixth Dynasty, had attempted to fix for ever in stone in the tomb chambers of their own pyramids? Budge thought so, and felt the evidence suggested that some at least of the source documents must have been exceedingly old:

> Several passages bear evidence that the scribes who drafted the copies from which the cutters of the inscriptions worked did not understand what they were writing ... The general impression is that the priests who drafted the copies made extracts from several compositions of different ages and having different contents ...'[61]

All this assumed that the source documents, whatever they were, must have been written in an archaic form of the Ancient Egyptian language. There was, however, an alternative possibility which Budge failed to consider. Suppose that the task of the priests had been not only to copy material but to translate into hieroglyphs texts originally composed in another language altogether? If that language had included a technical terminology and references to artefacts and ideas for which no equivalent terms existed in Ancient Egyptian, this would provide an explanation for the strange impression given by certain of the utterances. Moreover, if the copying and translating of the original source documents had been completed by the end of the Sixth Dynasty, it was easy to understand why no more 'Pyramid Texts' had ever been carved: the project would have come to a halt when it had fulfilled its objective—which would have been to create a permanent hieroglyphic record of a sacred literature that had already been tottering with age when Unas had taken the throne of Egypt in 2356 BC.

Last records of the First Time?

Because we wanted to cover as much of the distance to Abydos as was possible before nightfall, Santha and I reluctantly decided that it was time to get back on the road. Although we had originally intended to spend only a few minutes, the sombre gloom and ancient voices of the Unas tomb chamber had lulled our senses and almost two hours had passed since our arrival. Stooping, we left the tomb and climbed the steeply angled passageway to the exit, where we paused to allow our eyes to adjust to the harsh mid-morning sunlight. As we did so, I took the opportunity to look over the pyramid itself, which had fallen into such a crumbling and thoroughly dilapidated state that its original form was barely recognizable. The core masonry, reduced to little more than a nondescript heap of rubble, was evidently of poor quality, and even the facing blocks—some of which were still intact—lacked the finesse and careful workmanship demonstrated by the older pyramids at Giza.

This was hard to explain in conventional historical terms. If the normal evolutionary processes that govern the development of architectural skills and ideas had been at work in Egypt, one would have expected to find the opposite to be true: the design, engineering and masonry of the Unas Pyramid should have been superior to these of the Giza group, which, according to orthodox chronology, had been built about two centuries previously.[62]

The uncomfortable fact that this was not the case (i.e., Giza was ‘better’ than Unas and not vice versa) created knotty challenges for Egyptologists and raised questions to which no satisfactory answers had been supplied. To reiterate the central problem: everything about the three stunning and superb pyramids of Khufu, Khafre and Menkaure proclaimed that they were the end products of hundreds, perhaps even thousands of years of accumulated architectural and engineering experience. This was not supported by the archaeological evidence which left no doubt that they were among the earliest pyramids ever built in Egypt—in other words, they were not the products of the mature phase of that country’s pyramid-building experiment but, anomalously, were the creations of its infancy.

A further mystery also cried out for a solution. In the three great pyramids at Giza, Egypt’s Fourth Dynasty had reared up mansions of eternity—unprecedented and unsurpassed masterpieces of stone, hundreds of feet high, weighing millions of tons apiece, which incorporated many extremely advanced features. No pyramids of comparable quality were ever built again. But only a little later, beneath the smaller, shabbier superstructures of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasty pyramids, a sort of Hall of Records seemed to have been deliberately created: a permanent exhibition of copies or translations of archaic documents which was, at the same time, an unprecedented and unsurpassed masterpiece of scribal and hieroglyphic art.

In short, like the pyramids at Giza, it seemed that the Pyramid Texts had burst upon the scene with no apparent antecedents, and had occupied centre-stage for approximately a hundred years before ‘ceasing operations’, never to be bettered.

Presumably the ancient kings and sages who had arranged these things had known what they were doing? If so, their minds must have contained a plan, and they must have intended a strong connection to be seen between the completely uninscribed (but technically brilliant)—pyramids at Giza, and the brilliantly inscribed (but technically slipshod) pyramids of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasties.

I suspected, too, that at least part of the answer to the problem might lie in the pyramid-field of Dahshur, which we passed fifteen minutes after leaving Saqqara. It was here that the so-called 'Bent' and 'Red' Pyramids were located. Attributed to Sneferu, Khufu's father, these two monuments (by all accounts very well preserved) had been closed to the public many years ago. A military base had been built around them and they had for a long while been impossible to visit—under any circumstances, ever ...

As we continued our journey south, through the bright colours of that December day, I was overtaken by a compelling sense that the Nile Valley had been the scene of momentous events for humanity long before the recorded history of mankind began. All the most ancient records and traditions of Egypt spoke of such events and associated them with the epoch during which the gods had ruled on earth: the fabled First Time, which was called Zep Tepi.[63] We shall delve into these records in the next two chapters.

Looking for the First Time

Here is what the Ancient Egyptians said about the First Time, Zep Tepi, when the gods ruled in their country: they said it was a golden age[1] during which the waters of the abyss receded, the primordial darkness was banished, and humanity, emerging into the light, was offered the gifts of civilization.[2] They spoke also of intermediaries between gods and men—the Urshu, a category of lesser divinities whose title meant 'the Watchers'.[3] And they preserved particularly vivid recollections of the gods themselves, puissant and beautiful beings called the Neteru who lived on earth with humankind and exercised their sovereignty from Heliopolis and other sanctuaries up and down the Nile. Some of these Neteru were male and some female but all possessed a range of supernatural powers which included the ability to appear, at will, as men or women, or as animals, birds, reptiles, trees or plants. Paradoxically, their words and deeds seem to have reflected human passions and preoccupations. Likewise, although they were portrayed as stronger and more intelligent than humans, it was believed that they could grow sick—or even die, or be killed—under certain circumstances.[4]

Records of prehistory

Archaeologists are adamant that the epoch of the gods, which the Ancient Egyptians, called the First Time, is nothing more than a myth. The Ancient Egyptians, however, who may have been better informed about their past than we are, did not share this view. The historical records they kept in their most venerable temples included comprehensive lists of all the kings of Egypt: lists naming every pharaoh of every dynasty recognized by scholars today.[5] Some of these lists went even further, reaching back beyond the historical horizon of the First Dynasty into the uncharted depths of a remote and profound antiquity.

Two lists of kings in this category have survived the ravages of the ages and, having been exported from Egypt, are now preserved in European museums. We shall consider these lists in more detail later in this chapter. They are known respectively as the Palermo Stone (dating from the Fifth Dynasty—around the twenty-fifth century BC), and the Turin Papyrus, a nineteenth Dynasty temple document inscribed in a cursive form of hieroglyphs known as hieratic and dated to the thirteenth century BC.[6]

In addition, we have the testimony of a Heliopolitan priest named Manetho. In the third century BC he compiled a comprehensive and widely respected history of Egypt which provided extensive king lists for the entire dynastic period. Like the Turin Papyrus and the Palermo Stone, Manetho's history also reached much further back into the past to speak of a distant epoch when gods had ruled in the Nile Valley.

Manetho's complete text has not come down to us, although copies of it seem to have been in circulation as late as the ninth century AD.[7] Fortuitously, however, fragments of it were preserved in the writings of the Jewish chronicler Josephus (AD 60) and of Christian writers such as Africanus (AD 300), Eusebius (AD 340) and George Syncellus (AD 800).[8] These fragments, in the words of the late Professor Michael Hoffman of the University of South Carolina, provide the 'framework for modern approaches to the study of Egypt's past'.[9]

This is quite true.[10] Nevertheless, Egyptologists are prepared to use Manetho only as a source for the historical (dynastic) period and repudiate the strange insights he provides into prehistory when he speaks of the remote golden age of the First Time. Why should we be so selective in our reliance on Manetho? What is the logic of accepting thirty 'historical' dynasties from him and rejecting all that he has to say about earlier epochs? Moreover, since we know that his chronology for the historical period has been vindicated by archaeology,[11] isn't it a bit premature for us to assume that his pre-dynastic chronology is wrong because excavations have not yet turned up evidence confirming it?[12]

[12] This is a particularly important point to remember in a discipline like Egyptology where so much of the record of the past has been lost through looting, the ravages of time, and the activities of archaeologists and treasure hunters. Besides, vast numbers of Ancient Egyptian sites have not been investigated at all, and many more may lie out of our reach beneath the millennial silt of the Nile Delta (or beneath the suburbs of Cairo for that matter), and even at well-studied locations such as the Giza necropolis there are huge areas—the bedrock beneath the Sphinx for example—which still await the attentions of the excavator.

Gods, Demigods and Spirits of the Dead

If we are to allow Manetho to speak for himself, we have no choice but to turn to the texts in which the fragments of his work are preserved. One of the most important of these is the Armenian version of the Chronica of Eusebius. It begins by informing us that it is extracted 'from the Egyptian History of Manetho, who composed his account in three books. These deal with the Gods, the Demigods, the Spirits of the Dead and the mortal kings who ruled Egypt ...'[13] Citing Manetho directly, Eusebius begins by reeling off a list of the gods which consists, essentially, of the familiar Ennead of Heliopolis—Ra, Osiris, Isis, Horus, Set, and so on:[14]

> These were the first to hold sway in Egypt. Thereafter, the kingship passed from one to another in unbroken succession ... through 13,900 years— ... After the Gods, Demigods reigned for 1255 years; and again another line of kings held sway for 1817 years; then came thirty more kings, reigning for 1790 years; and then again ten kings ruling for 350 years. There followed the rule of the Spirits of the Dead ... for 5813 years ...'[15]

The total of all these periods adds up to 24,925 years and takes us far beyond the biblical date for the creation of the world (some time in the fifth millennium BC[16]). Because it suggested that biblical chronology was wrong, this created difficulties for Eusebius, a staunchly Christian commentator. But, after a moment's thought, he overcame the problem in an inspired way: 'The year I take to be a lunar one, consisting, that is, of 30 days: what we now call a month the Egyptians used formerly to style a year ...'[17]

Of course they did no such thing.[18] By means of this sleight of hand, however, Eusebius and others succeeded in boiling down Manetho's grand pre-dynastic span of almost 25,000 years into a sanitized dollop a bit over 2000 years which fits comfortably into the 2242 years orthodox biblical chronology allows between Adam and the Flood.[19]

A different technique for downplaying the disturbing chronological implications of Manetho's evidence is employed by the monk George Syncellus (c. AD 800). This commentator, who relies entirely on invective, writes, 'Manetho, chief priest of the accursed temples of Egypt [tells us] of gods who never existed. These, he says, reigned for 11,895 years ...'[20]

Several other curious and contradictory numbers crop up in the fragments. In particular, Manetho is repeatedly said to have given the enormous figure of 36,525 years for the entire duration of the civilization of Egypt from the time of the gods down to the end of the thirtieth (and last) dynasty of mortal kings.[21] This figure of course, incorporates the 365.25 days of the Sothic year (the interval between two consecutive heliacal risings of Sirius, as described in the last chapter). More likely by design than by accident, it also represents 25 cycles of 1460 Sothic years, and 25 cycles of 1461 calendar years (since the ancient Egyptian civil calendar was constructed around a 'vague year' of 365 days exactly).[22]

What, if anything, does all this mean? It's hard to be sure. Out of the welter of numbers and interpretations, however, there is one aspect of Manetho's original message that comes through loud and clear. Irrespective of everything we have been taught about the orderly progress of history, what he seems to be telling us is that civilized beings (either gods or men) were present in Egypt for an immensely long period before the advent of the First Dynasty around 3100 BC.

Diodorus Siculus and Herodotus

In this assertion, Manetho finds much support among classical writers.

In the first century BC, for example, the Greek historian Diodorus Siculus visited Egypt. He is rightly described by C.H. Oldfather, his most recent translator, as 'an uncritical compiler who used good sources and reproduced them faithfully'.[23] In plain English, what this means is that Diodorus did not try to impose his prejudices and preconceptions on the material he collected. He is therefore particularly valuable to us because his informants included Egyptian priests whom he questioned about the mysterious past of their country. This is what they told him:

> 'At first gods and heroes ruled Egypt for a little less than 18,000 years, the last of the gods to rule being Horus, the son of Isis ... Mortals have been kings of their country, they say, for a little less than 5000 years ...[24]

Let us review these figures 'uncritically' and see what they add up to. Diodorus was writing in the first century BC. If we journey back from there for the 5000 years during which the 'mortal kings' supposedly ruled, we get to around 5100 BC. If we go even further back to the beginning of the age of 'gods and heroes', we find that we have arrived at 23,100 BC, when the world was still firmly in the grip of the last Ice Age.

[22] Like the Maya, (see Part III), the Ancient Egyptians made use for administrative purposes of a civil calendar year (or vague year) of 365 days exactly. See Skywatchers of Ancient Mexico, p. 151, for further details on the Maya vague year. The Ancient Egyptian civil calendar year was geared to the Sothic year so that both would coincide on the same day/month position once every 1461 calendar years.

Long before Diodorus, Egypt was visited by another and more illustrious Greek historian: the great Herodotus, who lived in the fifth century BC. He too, it seems, consorted with priests and he too managed to tune in to traditions that spoke of the presence of a high civilization in the Nile Valley at some unspecified date in remote antiquity. Herodotus outlines these traditions of an immense prehistoric period of Egyptian civilization in Book II of his History. In the same document he also hands on to us, without comment, a peculiar nugget of information which had originated with the priests of Heliopolis:

> During this time, they said, there were four occasions when the sun rose out of his wonted place—twice rising where he now sets, and twice setting where he now rises.[25]

What is this all about?

According to the French mathematician Schwaller de Lubicz, what Herodotus is transmitting to us (perhaps unwittingly) is a veiled and garbled reference to a period of time—that is, to the time that it takes for sunrise on the vernal equinox to precess against the stellar background through one and a half complete cycles of the zodiac.[26]

As we have seen, the equinoctial sun spends roughly 2160 years in each of the twelve zodiacal constellations. A full cycle of precession of the equinoxes therefore takes almost 26,000 years to complete (12 x 2160 years). It follows that one and a half cycles takes nearly 39,000 years (18 x 2160 years).

In the time of Herodotus the sun on the vernal equinox rose due east at dawn against the stellar background of Aries—at which moment the constellation of Libra was 'in opposition', lying due west where the sun would set twelve hours later. If we wind the clock of precession back half a cycle, however—six houses of the zodiac or approximately 13,000 years—we find that the reverse configuration prevails: the vernal sun now rises due east in Libra while Aries lies due west in opposition. A further 13,000 years back, the situation reverses itself once more, with the vernal sun rising again in Aries and with Libra in opposition.

This takes us to 26,000 years before Herodotus.

If we then step back another 13,000 years, another half precessional cycle, to 39,000 years before Herodotus, the vernal sunrise returns to Libra, and Aries is again in opposition.

The point is this: with 39,000 years we have an expanse of time during which the sun can be described as 'twice rising where he now sets', i.e. in

---

[25] The History, pp. 193-4. In the first century AD a similar tradition was recorded by the Roman scholar Pomponious Mela: 'The Egyptians pride themselves on being the most ancient people in the world. In their authentic annals one may read that since they have been in existence, the course of the stars has changed direction four times, and that the sun has set twice in the part of the sky where it rises today.' (Pomponious Mela, De Situ Orbis.)

Libra in the time of Herodotus (and again at 13,000 and at 39,000 years earlier), and as 'twice setting where he now rises', i.e. in Aries in the time of Herodotus (and again at 13,000 and 39,000 years earlier).[27] If Schwaller's interpretation is correct—and there is every reason to suppose it is—it suggests that the Greek historian's priestly informants must have had access to accurate records of the precessional motion of the sun going back at least 39,000 years before their own era.

The Turin Papyrus and the Palermo Stone

The figure of 39,000 years accords surprisingly closely with the testimony of the Turin Papyrus (one of the two surviving Ancient Egyptian king lists that extends back into prehistoric times before the First Dynasty).

Originally in the collection of the king of Sardinia, the brittle and crumbling 3000-year-old papyrus was sent in a box, without packing, to its present home in the Museum of Turin. As any schoolchild could have predicted, it arrived broken into countless fragments. Scholars were obliged to work for years to piece together and make sense of what remained, and they did a superb job.[28] Nevertheless, more than half the contents of this precious record proved impossible to reconstruct.[29]

What might we have learned about the First Time if the Turin Papyrus had remained intact?

The surviving fragments are tantalizing. In one register, for example, we read the names often Neteru with each name inscribed in a cartouche (oblong enclosure) in much the same style adopted in later periods for the historical kings of Egypt. The number of years that each Neter was believed to have reigned was also given, but most of these numbers are missing from the damaged document.[30]

In another column there appears a list of the mortal kings who ruled in upper and lower Egypt after the gods but prior to the supposed unification of the kingdom under Menes, the first pharaoh of the First Dynasty, in 3100 BC. From the surviving fragments it is possible to establish that nine ‘dynasties’ of these pre-dynastic pharaohs were mentioned, among which were ‘the Venerables of Memphis’, ‘the Venerables of the North’ and, lastly, the Shemsu Hor (the Companions, or Followers, of Horus) who ruled until the time of Menes. The final two lines of the column, which seem to represent a summing up or inventory, are particularly provocative. They read; ‘... Venerables Shemsu-Hor, 13,420 years; Reigns before the Shemsu-Hor, 23,200 years; Total 36,620 years’.[31]

The other king list that deals with prehistoric times is the Palermo Stone, which does not take us as far back into the past as the Turin Papyrus. The earliest of its surviving registers record the reigns of 120 kings who ruled in upper and lower Egypt in the late pre-dynastic period: the centuries immediately prior to the country’s unification in 3100 BC.[32] Once again, however, we really have no idea how much other information, perhaps relating to far earlier periods, might originally have been inscribed on this enigmatic slab of black basalt, because it, too, has not come down to us intact. Since 1887 the largest single part has been preserved in the Museum of Palermo in Sicily; a second piece is on display in Egypt in the Cairo Museum; and a third much smaller fragment is in the Petrie Collection at the University of London.[33] These are reckoned by archaeologists to have been broken out of the centre of a monolith which would originally have measured about seven feet long by two feet high (stood on its long side).[34] Furthermore, as one authority has observed:

> It is quite possible—even probable—that many more pieces of this invaluable monument remain, if we only knew where to look. As it is we are faced with the tantalising knowledge that a record of the name of every king of the Archaic Period existed, together with the number of years of his reign and the chief events which occurred during his occupation of the throne. And these events were compiled in the Fifth Dynasty, only about 700 years after the Unification, so that the margin of error would in all probability have been very small ...’[35]

The late Professor Walter Emery, whose words these are, was naturally concerned about the absence of much-needed details concerning the Archaic Period, 3200 BC to 2900 BC,[36] the focus of his own specialist interests. We should also spare a thought, however, for what an intact

Palermo Stone might have told us about even earlier epochs, notably Zep Tepi—the golden age of the gods.

The deeper we penetrate into the myths and memories of Egypt's long past, and the closer we approach to the fabled First Time, the stranger the landscapes that surround us become ... as we shall see.

Gods of the First Time

According to Heliopolitan theology, the nine original gods who appeared in Egypt in the First Time were Ra, Shu, Tefnut, Geb, Nut, Osiris, Isis, Nepthys and Set. The offspring of these deities included well-known figures such as Horus and Anubis. In addition, other companies of gods were recognized, notably at Memphis and Hermopolis, where there were important and very ancient cults dedicated to Ptah and to Thoth.[1] These First Time deities were all in one sense or another gods of creation who had given shape to chaos through their divine will. Out of that chaos they formed and populated the sacred land of Egypt,[2] wherein, for many thousands of years, they ruled among men as divine pharaohs.[3]

What was 'chaos'?

The Heliopolitan priests who spoke to the Greek historian Diodorus Siculus in the first century BC put forward the thought-provoking suggestion that 'chaos' was a flood—identified by Diodorus with the earth-destroying flood of Deucalion, the Greek Noah figure:[4]

> In general, they say that if in the flood which occurred in the time of Deucalion most living things were destroyed, it is probable that the inhabitants of southern Egypt survived rather than any others ... Or if, as some maintain, the destruction of living things was complete and the earth then brought forth again new forms of animals, nevertheless, even on such a supposition, the first genesis of living things fittingly attaches to this country ...[5]

Why should Egypt have been so blessed? Diodorus was told that it had something to do with its geographical situation, with the great exposure of its southern regions to the heat of the sun, and with the vastly increased rainfall which the myths said the world had experienced in the aftermath of the universal deluge: 'For when the moisture from the abundant rains which fell among other peoples was mingled with the intense heat which prevails in Egypt itself ... the air became very well tempered for the first generation of all living things ...'[6]

Curiously enough, Egypt does enjoy a special geographical situation: as is well known, the latitude and longitude lines which intersect just beside the Great Pyramid (30° north and 31° east) cross more dry land than any others.[7] Curiously, too, at the end of the last Ice Age, when millions of square miles of glaciation were melting in northern Europe, when rising sea levels were flooding coastal areas all around the globe, and when the huge volume of extra moisture released into the atmosphere through the evaporation of the ice fields was being dumped as rain, Egypt benefited for several thousands of years from an exceptionally humid and fertile climate.[8] It is not difficult to see how such a climate might indeed have been remembered as 'well tempered for the first generation of all living things'.

The question therefore has to be asked: whose information about the past are we receiving from Diodorus, and is the apparently accurate description of Egypt's lush climate at the end of the last Ice Age a coincidence, or is an extremely ancient tradition being transmitted to us here—a memory, perhaps, of the First Time?

Breath of the divine serpent

Ra was believed to have been the first king of the First Time and ancient myths say that as long as he remained young and vigorous he reigned peacefully. The passing years took their toll on him, however, and he is depicted at the end of his rule as an old, wrinkled, stumbling man with a trembling mouth from which saliva ceaselessly dribbles.[9]

Shu followed Ra as king on earth, but his reign was troubled by plots and conflicts. Although he vanquished his enemies he was in the end so ravaged by disease that even his most faithful followers revolted against him: 'Weary of reigning, Shu abdicated in favour of his son Geb and took refuge in the skies after a terrifying tempest which lasted nine days ...'[10]

Geb, the third divine pharaoh, duly succeeded Shu to the throne. His reign was also troubled and some of the myths describing what took place reflect the odd idiom of the Pyramid Texts in which a non-technical vocabulary seems to wrestle with complex technical and scientific imagery. For example, one particularly striking tradition speaks of a 'golden box' in which Ra had deposited a number of objects—described, respectively, as his 'rod' (or cane), a lock of his hair, and his uraeus (a rearing cobra with its hood extended, fashioned out of gold, which was worn on the royal head-dress).[11]

A powerful and dangerous talisman, this box, together with its bizarre contents, remained enclosed in a fortress on the 'eastern frontier' of Egypt until a great many years after Ra's ascent to heaven. When Geb came to power he ordered that it should be brought to him and unsealed in his presence. In the instant that the box was opened a bolt of fire (described as the 'breath of the divine serpent') ushered from it, struck dead all Geb's companions and gravely burned the god-king himself.[12]

It is tempting to wonder whether what we are confronted by here might not be a garbled account of a malfunctioning man-made device: a confused, awe-stricken recollection of a monstrous instrument devised by the scientists of a lost civilization. Weight is added to such extreme speculations when we remember that this is by no means the only golden box in the ancient world that functioned like a deadly and unpredictable machine. It has a number of quite unmissable similarities to the Hebrews' enigmatic Ark of the Covenant (which also struck innocent people dead with bolts of fiery energy, which also was 'overlaid round about with gold', and which was said to have contained not only the two tablets of the Ten Commandments but 'the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod.')[13]

A proper look at the implications of all these weird and wonderful boxes (and of other 'technological' artefacts referred to in ancient traditions) is beyond the scope of this book. For our purposes here it is sufficient to note that a peculiar atmosphere of dangerous and quasi-technological wizardry seems to surround many of the gods of the Heliopolitan Ennead.

Isis, for example (wife and sister of Osiris and mother of Horus) carries a strong whiff of the science lab. According to the Chester Beatty Papyrus in the British Museum she was 'a clever woman ... more intelligent than countless gods ... She was ignorant of nothing in heaven and earth.'[14] Renowned for her skilful use of witchcraft and magic, Isis was particularly remembered by the Ancient Egyptians as 'strong of tongue', that is being in command of words of power 'which she knew with correct pronunciation, and halted not in her speech, and was perfect both in giving the command and in saying the word'.[15] In short, she was believed, by means of her voice alone, to be capable of bending reality and overriding the laws of physics.

These same powers, though perhaps in greater degree, were attributed to the wisdom god Thoth who although not a member of the Heliopolitan Ennead is recognized in the Turin Papyrus and other ancient records as the sixth (or sometimes as the seventh) divine pharaoh of Egypt.[16]

Frequently represented on temple and tomb walls as an ibis, or an ibis-headed man, Thoth was venerated as the regulative force responsible for all heavenly calculations and annotations, as the lord and multiplier of time, the inventor of the alphabet and the patron of magic. He was particularly associated with astronomy, mathematics, surveying and geometry, and was described as 'he who reckons in heaven, the counter of the stars and the measurer of the earth'.[17] He was also regarded as a deity who understood the mysteries of 'all that is hidden under the heavenly vault', and who had the ability to bestow wisdom on selected individuals. It was said that he had inscribed his knowledge in secret books and hidden these about the earth, intending that they should be sought for by future generations but found 'only by the worthy'—who were to use their discoveries for the benefit of mankind.[18]

What stands out most clearly about Thoth, therefore, in addition to his credentials as an ancient scientist, is his role as a benefactor and civilizer.[19] In this respect he closely resembles his predecessor Osiris, the high god of the Pyramid Texts and the fourth divine pharaoh of Egypt, 'whose name becometh Sah [Orion], whose leg is long, and his stride extended, the President of the Land of the South ...'[20]

Osiris and the Lords of Eternity

Occasionally referred to in the texts as a neb tem, or 'universal master',[21] Osiris is depicted as human but also superhuman, suffering but at the same time commanding. Moreover, he expresses his essential dualism by ruling m heaven (as the constellation of Orion) and on earth as a king among men. Like Viracocha in the Andes and Quetzalcoatl in Central America, his ways are subtle and mysterious. Like them, he is exceptionally tall and always depicted wearing the curved beard of divinity.[22] And like them too, although he has supernatural powers at his reign, we have seven divine pharaohs up to and including Thoth (i.e., Ra, Shu, Geb, Osiris, Set, Horus, Thoth).

disposal, he avoids the use of force wherever possible.[23]

We saw in Chapter Sixteen that Quetzalcoatl, the god-king of the Mexicans, was believed to have departed from Central America by sea, sailing away on a raft of serpents. It is therefore hard to avoid a sense of déjà vu when we read in the Egyptian Book of the Dead that the abode of Osiris also 'rested on water' and had walls made of 'living serpents'.[24] At the very least, the convergence of symbolism linking these two gods and two far-flung regions is striking.

There are other obvious parallels as well.

The central details of the story of Osiris have been recounted in earlier chapters and we need not go over them again. The reader will not have forgotten that this god—once again like Quetzalcoatl and Viracocha—was remembered principally as a benefactor of mankind, as a bringer of enlightenment and as a great civilizing leader.[25] He was credited, for example, with having abolished cannibalism and was said to have introduced the Egyptians to agriculture—in particular to the cultivation of wheat and barley—and to have taught them the art of fashioning agricultural implements. Since he had an especial liking for fine wines (the myths do not say where he acquired this taste), he made a point of 'teaching mankind the culture of the vine, as well as the way to harvest the grape and to store the wine ...'[26] In addition to the gifts of good living he brought to his subjects, Osiris helped to wean them 'from their miserable and barbarous manners' by providing them with a code of laws and inaugurating the cult of the gods in Egypt.[27]

When he had set everything in order, he handed over the control of the kingdom to Isis, quit Egypt for many years, and roamed about the world with the sole intention, Diodorus Siculus was told, > of visiting all the inhabited earth and teaching the race of men how to cultivate the vine and sow wheat and barley; for he supposed that if he made men give up their savagery and adopt a gentle manner of life he would receive immortal honours because of the magnitude of his benefactions ...[28]

Osiris travelled first to Ethiopia, where he taught tillage and husbandry to the primitive hunter-gatherers he encountered. He also undertook a number of large-scale engineering and hydraulics works: 'He built canals, with flood gates and regulators ... he raised the river banks and took precautions to prevent the Nile from overflowing ...'[29] Later he made his way to Arabia and thence to India, where he established many cities. Moving on to Thrace he killed a barbarian king for refusing to adopt his system of government. This was out of character; in general, Osiris was remembered by the Egyptians for having > forced no man to carry out his instructions, but by means of gentle persuasion and an appeal to their reason he succeeded in inducing them to practise what he preached. Many of his wise counsels were imparted to his listeners in hymns and songs, which were sung to the accompaniment of instruments of music.'[30]

Once again the parallels with Quetzalcoatl and Viracocha are hard to avoid. During a time of darkness and chaos—quite possibly linked to a flood—a bearded god, or man, materializes in Egypt (or Bolivia, or Mexico). He is equipped with a wealth of practical and scientific skills, of the kind associated with mature and highly developed civilizations, which he uses unselfishly for the benefit of humanity. He is instinctively gentle but capable of great firmness when necessary. He is motivated by a strong sense of purpose and, after establishing his headquarters at Heliopolis (or Tiahuanaco, or Teotihuacan), he sets forth with a select band of companions to impose order and to reinstate the lost balance of the world.[31]

Leaving aside for the present the issue of whether we are dealing here with gods or men, with figments of the primitive imagination or with flesh-and-blood beings, the fact remains that the myths always speak of a company of civilizers: Viracocha has his 'companions', as have both Quetzalcoatl and Osiris. Sometimes there are fierce internal conflicts within these groups, and perhaps struggles for power: the battles between Seth and Horus, and between Tezcatlipoca and Quetzalcoatl are obvious examples. Moreover, whether the mythical events unfold in Central America, or in the Andes, or in Egypt, the upshot is also always pretty much the same: the civilizer is eventually plotted against and either driven out or killed.

The myths say that Quetzalcoatl and Viracocha never came back (although, as we have seen, their return to the Americas was expected at the time of the Spanish conquest). Osiris, on the other hand, did come back. Although he was murdered by Set soon after the completion of his worldwide mission to make men 'give up their savagery', he won eternal life through his resurrection in the constellation of Orion as the all-powerful god of the dead. Thereafter, judging souls and providing an immortal example of responsible and benevolent kingship, he dominated the religion (and the culture) of Ancient Egypt for the entire span of its known history.

Interestingly enough, Osiris was said to have been accompanied on his civilizing mission by two 'openers of the way': (Diodorus Siculus page 57), 'Anubis and Macedo, Anubis wearing a dog's skin and Macedo the fore-parts of a wolf ...'

Serene stability

Who can guess what the civilizations of the Andes and of Mexico might have achieved if they too had benefited from such powerful symbolic continuity. In this respect, however, Egypt is unique. Indeed, although the Pyramid Texts and other archaic sources recognize a period of disruption and attempted usurpation by Set (and his seventy-two 'precessional' conspirators), they also depict the transition to the reigns of Horus, Thoth and the later divine pharaohs as being relatively smooth and inevitable.

This transition was mimicked, through thousands of years, by the mortal kings of Egypt. From the beginning to the end, they saw themselves as the lineal descendants and living representatives of Horus, son of Osiris. As generation succeeded generation, it was supposed that each deceased pharaoh was reborn in the sky as 'an Osiris' and that each successor to the throne became a 'Horus'.[32]

This simple, refined, and stable scheme was already fully evolved and in place at the beginning of the First Dynasty—around 3100 BC.[33] Scholars accept this; the majority also accept that what we are dealing with here is a highly developed and sophisticated religion.[34] Strangely, very few Egyptologists or archaeologists have questioned where and when this religion took shape.

Is it not to defy logic to suppose that well-rounded social and metaphysical ideas like those of the Osiris cult sprung up fully formed in 3100 BC, or that they could have taken such perfect shape in the 300 years which Egyptologists sometimes grudgingly allow for them to have done so?[35] There must have been a far longer period of development than that, spread over several thousands rather than several hundreds of years. Moreover, as we have seen, every surviving record in which the Ancient Egyptians speak directly about their past asserts that their civilization was a legacy of 'the gods' who were 'the first to hold sway in Egypt'.[36]

The records are not internally consistent: some attribute much greater antiquity to the civilization of Egypt than others. All, however, clearly and firmly direct our attention to an epoch far, far in the past—anything from 8000 to almost 40,000 years before the foundation of the First Dynasty.

Archaeologists insist that no material artefacts have ever been found in Egypt to suggest that an evolved civilization existed at such early dates, but this is not strictly true. As we saw in Part VI, a handful of objects and structures exist which have not yet been conclusively dated by any scientific means.

The ancient city of Abydos conceals one of the most extraordinary of these undatable enigmas ...

The Works of Men and Gods

Among the numberless ruined temples of Ancient Egypt, there is one that is unique not only for its marvellous state of preservation, which (rare indeed!) includes an intact roof, but for the fine quality of the many acres of beautiful reliefs that decorate its towering walls. Located at Abydos, eight miles west of the present course of the Nile, this is the Temple of Seti I, a monarch of the illustrious nineteenth Dynasty, who ruled from 1306-1290 BC.[1]

Seti is known primarily as the father of a famous son: Ramesses II (1290-1224 BC), the pharaoh of the biblical Exodus.[2] In his own right, however, he was a major historical figure who conducted extensive military campaigns outside Egypt's borders, who was responsible for the construction of several fine buildings and who carefully and conscientiously refurbished and restored many older ones.[3] His temple at Abydos, which was known evocatively as 'The House of Millions of Years', was dedicated to Osiris,[4] the 'Lord of Eternity', of whom it was said in the Pyramid Texts:

> You have gone, but you will return, you have slept, but you will awake, you have died, but you will live ... Betake yourself to the waterway, fare upstream ... travel about Abydos in this spirit-form of yours which the gods commanded to belong to you.[5]

Atef Crown

It was eight in the morning, a bright, fresh hour in these latitudes, when I entered the hushed gloom of the Temple of Seti I. Sections of its walls were floor-lit by low-wattage electric bulbs; otherwise the only illumination was that which the pharaoh's architects had originally planned: a few isolated shafts of sunlight that penetrated through slits in the outer masonry like beams of divine radiance. Hovering among the motes of dust dancing in those beams, and infiltrating the heavy stillness of the air amid the great columns that held up the roof of the Hypostyle

Hall, it was easy to imagine that the spirit-form of Osiris could still be present. Indeed, this was more than just imagination because Osiris was physically present in the astonishing symphony of reliefs that adorned the walls—reliefs that depicted the once and future civilizer-king in his role as god of the dead, enthroned and attended by Isis, his beautiful and mysterious sister.

In these scenes Osiris wore a variety of different and elaborate crowns which I studied closely as I walked from relief to relief. Crowns similar to these in many respects had been important parts of the wardrobe of all the pharaohs of Ancient Egypt, at least on the evidence of reliefs depicting them. Strangely, however, in all the years of intensive excavations, archaeologists had not found a single example of a royal crown, or a small part of one, let alone a specimen of the convoluted ceremonial headdresses associated with the gods of the First Time.[6]

Of particular interest was the Atef crown. Incorporating the uraeus, the royal serpent symbol (which in Mexico was a rattlesnake but in Egypt was a hooded cobra poised to strike), the central core of this strange contraption was recognizable as an example of the hedjet, the white skittle-shaped war helmet of upper Egypt (again known only from reliefs). Rearing up on either side of this core were what seemed to be two thin leaves of metal, and at the front was an attached device, consisting of two wavy blades, which scholars normally describe as a pair of rams' horns.[7]

In several reliefs of the Seti I Temple Osiris was depicted wearing the Atef crown, which seemed to stand about two feet high. According to the Ancient Egyptian Book of the Dead, it had been given to him by Ra: 'But on the very first day that he wore it Osiris had much suffering in his head, and when Ra returned in the evening he found Osiris with his head angry and swollen from the heat of the Atef crown. Then Ra proceeded to let out the pus and the blood.'[8]

All this was stated in a matter-of-fact way, but—when you stopped to think about it—what kind of crown was it that radiated heat and caused the skin to haemorrhage and break out in pustulant sores?

Temple of Ramesses II

Seti I Temple

Abydos.

Seventeen centuries of kings

I walked on into the deeper darkness, eventually finding my way to the Gallery of the Kings. It led off from the eastern edge of the inner Hypostyle Hall about 200 feet from the entrance to the temple.

To pass through the Gallery was to pass through time itself. On the wall to my left was a list of 120 of the gods of Ancient Egypt, together with the names of their principal sanctuaries. On my right, covering an area of perhaps ten feet by six feet, were the names of the 76 pharaohs who had preceded Seti I to the throne; each name was carved in hieroglyphs inside an oval cartouche.

This tableau was known as the ‘Abydos King List’. Glowing with colours of molten gold, it was designed to be read from left to right and was divided into five vertical and three horizontal registers. It covered a grand expanse of almost 1700 years, beginning around 3000 BC with the reign of Menes, first king of the First Dynasty, and ending with Seti’s own reign around 1300 BC. At the extreme left stood two figures exquisitely carved in high relief: Seti and his young son, the future Ramesses II.

Hypogeum

Belonging to the same class of historical documents as the Turin Papyrus and the Palermo Stone, the list spoke eloquently of the continuity of tradition. An inherent part of that tradition, was the belief or memory of a First Time, long, long ago, when the gods had ruled in Egypt. Principal among those gods was Osiris, and it was therefore appropriate that the Gallery of the Kings should provide access to a second corridor, leading to the rear of the temple where a marvellous building was located—one associated with Osiris from the beginning of written records in Egypt[9] and described by the Greek geographer Strabo (who visited Abydos in the first century BC) as 'a remarkable structure built of solid stone ... [containing] a spring which lies at a great depth, so that one descends to it down vaulted galleries made of monoliths of surpassing size and workmanship. There is a canal leading to the place from the great river ...'[10]

A few hundred years after Strabo's visit, when the religion of Ancient Egypt had been supplanted by the new cult of Christianity, the silt of the river and the sands of the desert began to drift into the Osirieon, filling it foot by foot, century by century, until its upright monoliths and huge lintels were buried and forgotten. And so it remained, out of sight and out of mind, until the beginning of the twentieth century, when the archaeologists Flinders Petrie and Margaret Murray began excavations. In their 1903 season of digging they uncovered parts of a hall and passageway, lying in the desert about 200 feet south-west of the Seti I Temple and built in the recognizable architectural style of the Nineteenth Dynasty. However, sandwiched between these remains and the rear of the Temple, they also found unmistakable signs that 'a large underground building' lay concealed.[11] 'This hypogeum', wrote Margaret Murray, 'appears to Professor Petrie to be the place that Strabo mentions, usually called Strabo's Well.'[12] This was good guesswork on the part of Petrie and Murray. Shortage of cash, however, meant that their theory of a buried building was not tested until the digging season of 1912-13. Then, under the direction of Professor Naville of the Egypt Exploration Fund, a long transverse chamber was cleared, at the end of which, to the north-east, was found a massive stone gateway made up of cyclopean blocks of granite and sandstone.

The next season, 1913-14, Naville and his team returned with 600 local helpers and diligently cleared the whole of the huge underground building:

> What we discovered [Naville wrote] is a gigantic construction of about 100 feet in length and 60 in width, built with the most enormous stones that may be seen in Egypt. In the four sides of the enclosure walls are cells, 17 in number, of the height of a man and without ornamentation of any kind. The building itself is divided into three naves, the middle one being wider than those of the sides; the division is produced by two colonnades made of huge granite monoliths supporting architraves of equal size.[13]

Naville commented with some astonishment on one block he measured in the corner of the building's northern nave, a block more than twenty-five feet long.[14] Equally surprising was the fact that the cells cut into the enclosure walls had no floors, but turned out, as the excavations went deeper, to be filled with increasingly moist sand and earth:

> The cells are connected by a narrow ledge between two and three feet wide; there is a ledge also on the opposite side of the nave, but no floor at all, and in digging to a depth of 12 feet we reached infiltrated water. Even below the great gateway there is no floor, and when there was water in front of it the cells were probably reached with a small boat.[15]

The most ancient stone building in Egypt

Water, water, everywhere—this seemed to be the theme of the Osireion, which lay at the bottom of the huge crater Naville and his men had excavated in 1914. It was positioned some 50 feet below the level of the floor of the Seti I Temple, almost flush with the water-table, and was approached by a modern stairway curving down to the south-east. Having descended this stairway, I passed under the hulking lintel slabs of the great gateway Naville (and Strabo) had described and crossed a narrow wooden footbridge—again modern—which brought me to a large sandstone plinth.

Measuring about 80 feet in length by 40 in width, this plinth was composed of enormous paving blocks and was entirely surrounded by water. Two pools, one rectangular and the other square, had been cut into the plinth along the centre of its long axis and at either end stairways led down to a depth of about 12 feet below the water level. The plinth also supported the two massive colonnades Naville mentioned in his report, each of which consisted of five chunky rose-coloured granite monoliths about eight feet square by 12 feet high and weighing, on average, around 100 tons.[16] The tops of these huge columns were spanned by granite lintels and there was evidence that the whole building had once been roofed over with a series of even larger monolithic slabs.[17]

To get a proper understanding of the structure of the Osireion, I found it helpful to raise myself directly above it in my mind's eye, so that I could look down on it. This exercise was assisted by the absence of the original roof which made it easier to envisage the whole edifice in plan. Also helpful was the fact that water had now seeped up to fill all of the building's pools, cells and channels to a depth of a few inches below the lip of the central plinth, as the original designers had apparently intended it should.[18]

Looking down in this manner, it was immediately apparent that the plinth formed a rectangular island, surrounded on all four sides by a water-filled moat about 10 feet wide. The moat was contained by an immense, rectangular enclosure wall, no less than 20 feet thick,[19] made of very large blocks of red sandstone disposed in polygonal jigsaw-puzzle patterns. Into the huge thickness of this wall were set the 17 cells mentioned in Naville's report. Six lay to the east, six to the west, two to the south and three to the north. Off the central of the three northern cells lay a long transverse chamber, roofed with and composed of limestone. A similar transverse chamber, also of limestone but no longer with an intact roof, lay immediately south of the great gateway. Finally, the whole structure was enclosed within an outer wall of limestone, thus completing a sequence of inter-nested rectangles, i.e., from the outside in, wall, wall, moat, plinth.

Another notable and outstandingly unusual feature of the Osireion was that it was not even approximately aligned to the cardinal points. Instead, like the Way of the Dead at Teotihuacan in Mexico, it was oriented to the east of due north. Since Ancient Egypt had been a civilization that could and normally did achieve precise alignments for its buildings, it seemed to me improbable that this apparently skewed orientation was accidental. Moreover, although 50 feet higher, the Seti I Temple was oriented along exactly the same axis—and again not by accident. The question was: which was the older building? Had the axis of the Osireion been predetermined by the axis of the Temple or vice versa? This, it turned out, was an issue over which considerable controversy, now long forgotten, had once raged. In a debate which had many connections with that surrounding the Sphinx and the Valley Temple at Giza, eminent archaeologists had initially argued that the Osireion was a building of truly immense antiquity, a view expressed by Professor Naville in the London Times of 17 March 1914:

> This monument raises several important questions. As to its date, its great similarity with the Temple of the Sphinx [as the Valley Temple was then known] shows it to be of the same epoch when building was made with enormous stones without any ornament. This is characteristic of the oldest architecture in Egypt. I should even say that we may call it the most ancient stone building in Egypt.[20]

Reconstruction of the Osireion.

Describing himself as overawed by the ‘grandeur and stern simplicity’ of the monument’s central hall, with its remarkable granite monoliths, and by ‘the power of those ancients who could bring from a distance and move such gigantic blocks’, Naville made a suggestion concerning the function the Osireion might originally have been intended to serve: ‘Evidently this huge construction was a large reservoir where water was stored during the high Nile ... It is curious that what we may consider as a beginning in architecture is neither a temple nor a tomb, but a gigantic pool, a waterwork ...[21]

Curious indeed, and well worth investigating further; something Naville hoped to do the following season. Unfortunately, the First World War intervened and no archaeology could be undertaken in Egypt for several years. As a result, it was not until 1925 that the Egypt Exploration Fund was able to send out another mission, which was led not by Naville but by a young Egyptologist named Henry Frankfort.

Frankfort's facts

Later to enjoy great prestige and influence as professor of Pre-Classical Antiquity at the University of London, Frankfort spent several consecutive digging seasons re-clearing and thoroughly excavating the Osireion between 1925 and 1930. During the course of this work he made discoveries which, so far as he was concerned, 'settled the date of the building':

1 A granite dovetail in position at the top of the southern side of the main entrance to the central hall, which was inscribed with the cartouche of Seti I.

2 A similar dovetail in position inside the eastern wall of the central hall.

3 Astronomical scenes and inscriptions by Seti I carved in relief on the ceiling of the northern transverse chamber.

4 The remains of similar scenes in the southern transverse chamber.

5 An ostracon (piece of broken potsherd) found in the entrance passage and bearing the legend 'Seti is serviceable to Osiris'.[22]

The reader will recall the lemming behaviour which led to a dramatic change of scholarly opinion about the antiquity of the Sphinx and the Valley Temple (due to the discovery of a few statues and a single cartouche which seemed to imply some sort of connection with Khafre). Frankfort's finds at Abydos caused a similar volte-face over the antiquity of the Osireion. In 1914 it was 'the most ancient stone building in Egypt'. By 1933, it had been beamed forward in time to the reign of Seti I—around 1300 BC—whose cenotaph it was now believed to be.[23]

Within a decade, the standard Egyptological texts began to print the attribution to Seti I as though it were a fact, verifiable by experience or observation. It is not a fact, however, merely Frankfort's interpretation of the evidence he had found.

The only facts are that certain inscriptions and decorations left by Seti appear in an otherwise completely anonymous structure. One plausible explanation is that the structure must have been built by Seti, as Frankfort proposed. The other possibility is that the half-hearted and scanty decorations, cartouches and inscriptions found by Frankfort could have been placed in the Osireion as part of a renovation and repair operation undertaken in Seti's time (implying that the structure was by then ancient, as Naville and others had proposed).

What are the merits of these mutually contradictory propositions which identify the Osireion as (a) the oldest building in Egypt, and (b) a relatively late New Kingdom structure?

Proposition (b)—that it is the cenotaph of Seti I—is the only attribution accepted by Egyptologists. On close inspection, however, it rests on the circumstantial evidence of the cartouches and inscriptions which prove nothing. Indeed part of this evidence appears to contradict Frankfort's case. The ostracon bearing the legend 'Seti is serviceable to Osiris' sounds less like praise for the works of an original builder than praise for a restorer who had renovated, and perhaps added to, an ancient structure identified with the First Time god Osiris. And another awkward little matter has also been overlooked. The south and north 'transverse chambers', which contain Seti I's detailed decorations and inscriptions, lie outside the twenty-foot-thick enclosure wall which so adamantly defines the huge, undecorated megalithic core of the building. This had raised the reasonable suspicion in Naville's mind (though Frankfort chose to ignore it) that the two chambers concerned were 'not contemporaneous with the rest of the building' but had been added much later during the reign of Seti I, 'probably when he built his own temple'.[24]

To cut a long story short, therefore, everything about proposition (b) is based in one way or another on Frankfort's not necessarily infallible interpretation of various bits and pieces of possibly intrusive evidence.

Proposition (a)—that the core edifice of the Osireion had been built millennia before Seti's time—rests on the nature of the architecture itself. As Naville observed, the Osireion's similarity to the Valley Temple at Giza 'showed it to be of the same epoch when building was made with enormous stones'. Likewise, until the end of her life, Margaret Murray remained convinced that the Osireion was not a cenotaph at all (least of all Seti's). She said,

> It was made for the celebration of the mysteries of Osiris, and so far is unique among all the surviving buildings of Egypt. It is clearly early, for the great blocks of which it is built are of the style of the Old Kingdom; the simplicity of the actual building also points to it being of that early date. The decoration was added by Seti I, who in that way laid claim to the building, but seeing how often a Pharaoh claimed the work of his predecessors by putting his name on it, this fact does not carry much weight. It is the style of the building, the type of the masonry, the tooling of the stone, and not the name of a king, which date a building in Egypt.[25]

This was an admonition Frankfort might well have paid more attention to, for as he bemusedly observed of his 'cenotaph', 'It has to be admitted that no similar building is known from the Nineteenth Dynasty.'[26]

Indeed it is not just a matter of the Nineteenth Dynasty. Apart from the Valley Temple and other Cyclopean edifices on the Giza plateau, no other building remotely resembling the Osireion is known from any other epoch of Egypt's long history. This handful of supposedly Old Kingdom structures, built out of giant megaliths, seems to belong in a unique category. They resemble one another much more than they resemble any other known style of architecture and in all cases there are question-marks over their identity.

Isn't this precisely what one would expect of buildings not erected by any historical pharaoh but dating back to prehistoric times? Doesn't it make sense of the mysterious way in which the Sphinx and the Valley Temple, and now the Osireion as well, seem to have become vaguely connected with the names of particular pharaohs (Khafre and Seti I), without ever yielding a single piece of evidence that clearly and unequivocally proves those pharaohs built the structures concerned? Aren't the tenuous links much more indicative of the work of restorers seeking to attach themselves to ancient and venerable monuments than of the original architects of those monuments—whoever they might have been and in whatever epoch they might have lived?

Setting sail across seas of sand and time

Before leaving Abydos, there was one other puzzle that I wanted to remind myself of. It lay buried in the desert, about a kilometre north-west of the Osireion, across sands littered with the rolling, cluttered tumuli of ancient graveyards.

Out among these cemeteries, many of which dated back to early dynastic and pre-dynastic times, the jackal gods Anubis and Upuaut had traditionally reigned supreme. Openers of the way, guardians of the spirits of the dead, I knew that they had played a central role in the mysteries of Osiris that had been enacted each year at Abydos—apparently throughout the span of Ancient Egyptian history.

It seemed to me that there was a sense in which they guarded the mysteries still. For what was the Osireion if was not a huge, unsolved mystery that deserved closer scrutiny than it has received from the scholars whose job it is to look into these matters? And what was the burial in the desert of twelve high-prowed, seagoing ships if not also a mystery that cried out, loudly, for solution?

It was the burial place of those ships I was now crossing the cemeteries of the jackal gods to see:

> The Guardian, London, 21 December 1991: A fleet of 5000-year-old royal ships has been found buried eight miles from the Nile. American and Egyptian archaeologists discovered the 12 large wooden boats at Abydos ... Experts said the boats—which are 50 to 60 feet long—are about 5000 years old, making them Egypt's earliest royal ships and among the earliest boats found anywhere ... The experts say the ships, discovered in September, were probably meant for burial so the souls of the pharaohs could be transported on them. 'We never expected to find such a fleet, especially so far from the Nile,' said David O'Connor, the expedition leader and curator of the Egyptian Section of the University Museum of > the University of Pennsylvania ...[27]

The boats were buried in the shadow of a gigantic mud-brick enclosure, thought to have been the mortuary temple of a Second Dynasty pharaoh named Khasekhemwy, who had ruled Egypt in the twenty-seventh century BC.[28] O'Connor, however, was certain that they were not associated directly with Khasekhemwy but rather with the nearby (and largely ruined) 'funerary-cult enclosure built for Pharaoh Djer early in Dynasty I. The boat graves are not likely to be earlier than this and may in fact have been built for Djer, but this remains to be proven.'[29]

A sudden strong gust of wind blew across the desert, scattering sheets of sand. I took refuge for a while in the lee of the looming walls of the Khasekhemwy enclosure, close to the point where the University of Pennsylvania archaeologists had, for legitimate security reasons, reburied the twelve mysterious boats they had stumbled on in 1991. They had hoped to return in 1992 to continue the excavations, but there had been various hitches and, in 1993, the dig was still being postponed.

In the course of my research O'Connor had sent me the official report of the 1991 season,[30] mentioning in passing that some of the boats might have been as much as 72 feet in length.[31] He also noted that the boat-shaped brick graves in which they were enclosed, which would have risen well above the level of the surrounding desert in early dynastic times, must have produced quite an extraordinary effect when they were new:

> Each grave had originally been thickly coated with mud plaster and whitewash so the impression would have been of twelve (or more) huge 'boats' moored out in the desert, gleaming brilliantly in the Egyptian sun. The notion of their being moored was taken so seriously that an irregularly shaped small boulder was found placed near the 'prow' or 'stern' of several boat graves. These boulders could not have been there naturally or by accident; their placement seems deliberate, not random. We can think of them as 'anchors' intended to help 'moor' the boats.[32]

Like the 140-foot ocean-going vessel found buried beside the Great Pyramid at Giza (see Chapter Thirty-three), one thing was immediately clear about the Abydos boats—they were of an advanced design capable of riding out the most powerful waves and the worst weather of the open seas. According to Cheryl Haldane, a nautical archaeologist at Texas A-and-M University, they showed 'a high degree of technology combined with grace'.[33] Exactly as was the case with the Pyramid boat, therefore (but at least 500 years earlier) the Abydos fleet seemed to indicate that a people able to draw upon the accumulated experiences of a long tradition of seafaring had been present in Egypt from the very beginning of its 3000 year history. Moreover I knew that the earliest wall paintings found in the Nile Valley, dating back perhaps as much as 1500 years before the burial of the Abydos fleet (to around 4500 BC) showed the same long, sleek, high-prowed vessels in action.[34]

Could an experienced race of ancient seafarers have become involved with the indigenous inhabitants of the Nile Valley at some indeterminate period before the official beginning of history at around 3000 BC? Wouldn't this explain Egypt's curious and paradoxical—but nonetheless enduring—obsession with ships in the desert (and references to what sounded like sophisticated ships in the Pyramid Texts, including one said to have been more than 2000 feet long)?[35]

In raising these conjectures, I did not doubt that religious symbolism had existed in Ancient Egypt in which, as scholars endlessly pointed out, ships had been designated as vessels for the pharaoh's soul. Nevertheless that symbolism did not solve the problem posed by the high level of technological achievement of the buried ships; such evolved and sophisticated designs called for a long period of development. Wasn't it worth looking into the possibility—even if only to rule it out—that the Giza and Abydos vessels could have been parts of a cultural legacy, not of a land-loving, riverside-dwelling, agricultural people like the indigenous Ancient Egyptians but of an advanced seafaring nation?

Such seafarers could have been expected to be navigators who would have known how to set a course by the stars and who would perhaps also have developed the skills necessary to draw up accurate maps and charts of the oceans they had traversed.

Might they also have been architects and stonemasons whose characteristic medium had been polygonal, megalithic blocks like those of the Valley Temple and the Osireion?

And might they have been associated in some way with the legendary gods of the First Time, said to have brought to Egypt not only civilization and astronomy and architecture, and the knowledge of mathematics and writing, but a host of other useful skills and gifts, by far the most notable and the most significant of which had been the gift of agriculture?

There is evidence of an astonishingly early period of agricultural advance and experimentation in the Nile Valley at about the end of the last Ice Age in the northern hemisphere. The characteristics of this great

The Eleventh Millennium BC

If it were not for the powerful mythology of Osiris, and if this civilizing, scientific, law-making deity was not remembered in particular for having introduced domesticated crops into the Nile Valley in the remote and fabled epoch known as the First Time, it would probably not be a matter of any great interest that at some point between 13,000 BC and 10,000 BC Egypt enjoyed a period of what has been described as 'precocious agricultural development'—possibly the earliest agricultural revolution anywhere in the world identified with certainty by historians.[1]

As we saw in recent chapters, sources such as the Palermo Stone, Manetho and the Turin Papyrus contain several different and at times contradictory chronologies. All these chronologies nevertheless agree on a very ancient date for the First Time of Osiris: the golden age when the gods were believed to have ruled in Egypt. In addition, the sources demonstrate a striking convergence over the importance they accord to the eleventh millennium BC in particular,[2] the precessional Age of Leo when the great ice sheets of the northern hemisphere were undergoing their final, ferocious meltdown.

Perhaps coincidentally, evidence unearthed since the 1970s by geologists, archaeologists and prehistorians like Michael Hoffman, Fekri Hassan and Professor Fred Wendorff has confirmed that the eleventh millennium BC was indeed an important period in Egyptian prehistory, during which immense and devastating floods swept repeatedly down the Nile Valley.[3] Fekri Hassan has speculated that this prolonged series of natural disasters, which reached a crescendo around or just after 10,500 BC (and continued to recur periodically until about 9000 BC) might have been responsible for snuffing out the early agricultural experiment.[4]

At any rate, that experiment did come to an end (for whatever reason), and appears not to have been attempted again for at least another 5000 years.[5]

Kick-start

There is something mysterious about Egypt's so-called 'palaeolithic agricultural revolution'. Here, quoted from the standard texts (Hoffman's Egypt before The Pharaohs and Wendorff and Schild's Prehistory of the Nile Valley) are some key facts from the little that is known about this great leap forward that occurred so inexplicably towards the end of the last Ice Age:

1. 'Shortly after 13,000 BC, grinding stones and sickle blades with a glossy sheen on their bits (the result of silica from cut stems adhering to a sickle's cutting edge) appear in late Palaeolithic tool kits ... It is clear that the grinding stones were used in preparing plant food.'[6]

2. At many riverside sites, at exactly this time, fish stopped being a significant food source and became a negligible one, as evidenced by the absence of fish remains: 'The decline in fishing as a source of food is related to the appearance of a new food resource represented by ground grain. The associated pollen strongly suggests that this grain was barley, and significantly, this large grass-pollen, tentatively identified as barley, makes a sudden appearance in the pollen profile just before the time when the first settlements were established in this area ...'[7]

3. 'As apparently spectacular as the rise of protoagriculture in the late Palaeolithic Nile Valley was its precipitous decline. No one knows exactly why, but after about 10,500 BC the early sickle blades and grinding disappear to be replaced throughout Egypt by Epipalaeolithic hunting, fishing and gathering peoples who use stone tools.'[8]

Scanty though the evidence may be, it is clear in its general implications: Egypt enjoyed a golden age of agricultural plenty which began around 13,000 BC and was brought to an abrupt halt around the middle of the eleventh millennium BC. A kick-start to the process appears to have been given by the introduction of already domesticated barley into the Nile Valley, immediately followed by the establishment of a number of farming settlements which exploited the new resource. The settlements were equipped with simple but extremely effective agricultural tools and accessories. After the eleventh millennium BC, however, there was a prolonged relapse to more primitive ways of life.

The imagination is inclined to roam freely over such data in search of an explanation—and all such explanations can only be guesswork. What is certain is that the none of the evidence suggests that palaeolithic Egypt's 'agricultural revolution' could have been a local initiative. On the contrary it feels in every way like a transplant. A transplant appears suddenly, after all, and can be rejected equally fast if conditions change, just as settled agriculture seems to have been rejected in ancient Egypt after the great Nile floods of the eleventh millennium BC.

Climate Change

What was the weather like then?

We've noted in earlier chapters that the Sahara, a relatively young desert, was green savannah until about the tenth millennium BC; this savannah, brightened by lakes, boiling with game, extended across much of upper Egypt. Farther north, the Delta area was marshy but dotted with many large and fertile islands. Overall the climate was significantly cooler, cloudier and rainier than it is today.[9] Indeed, for two or three thousand years before and about a thousand years after 10,500 BC it rained and rained and rained. Then, as though marking an ecological turning-point, the floods came. When they were over, increasingly arid conditions set in.[10] This period of desiccation lasted until approximately 7000 BC when the 'Neolithic Subpluvial' began with a thousand years of heavy rains, followed by 3000 years of moderate rainfall which once again proved ideal for agriculture: 'For a time the deserts bloomed and human societies colonized areas that have been unable to support such dense populations since.'[11]

By the birth of dynastic Egypt around 3000 BC, however, the climate had turned around again and a new period of desiccation had begun—one that has continued until the present day.

This, then, in broad outline, is the environmental stage upon which the mysteries of Egyptian civilization have been played out: rain and floods between 13,000 BC and 9500 BC; a dry period until 7000 BC; rain again (though increasingly less frequent) until about 3000 BC; thereafter a renewed and enduring dry period.

The expanse of years is great, but if one is looking for a First Time within it which might accord with the golden age of the gods, one's thoughts turn naturally to the mysterious epoch of early agricultural experimentation that shadowed the great rains and floods between 13,000 BC and 10,500 BC.

Unseen connections?

This epoch was crucial not only for the Ancient Egyptians but for many peoples in other areas. Indeed, as we saw in Part IV, it was the epoch of dramatic climate shifts, rapidly rising sea levels, earth movements, floods, volcanic eruptions, bituminous rains and darkened skies that was the most probable source of many of the great worldwide myths of universal cataclysm.

Could it also have been an epoch in which 'gods' really did walk among men, as the legends said?

On the Bolivian Altiplano those gods were known as the Viracochas and were linked to the astonishing megalithic city of Tiahuanaco, which may have pre-existed the immense floods in the Andes in the eleventh millennium BC. Thereafter, according to Professor Arthur Posnansky, though the flood-waters subsided, 'the culture of the Altiplano did not again attain a high point of development but rather fell into a total and definitive decadence.'[12]

Of course, Posnansky's conclusions are controversial and must be evaluated on their own merits. Nevertheless, it is interesting that both the Bolivian Altiplano and Egypt should have been scoured by immense floods in the eleventh millennium BC. In both areas too, there are signs that extraordinarily early agricultural experiments—apparently based on introduced techniques—were attempted and then abandoned.[13] And in both areas important question-marks have been raised over the dating of monuments: the Puma Punku and the Kalasasaya in Tiahuanaco, for example, which Posnansky argued might have been built as early as 15,000 BC,[14] and, in Egypt, megalithic structures like the Osireion, the Great Sphinx and the Valley Temple of Khafre at Giza, which John West and the Boston University geologist Robert Schoch have dated on geological grounds to earlier than 10,000 BC.

Could there be an unseen connection linking all these beautiful, enigmatic monuments, the anomalous agricultural experiments of 13,000-10,000 BC, and the legends of civilizer gods like Osiris and Viracocha?

'Where is the rest of this civilization?'

As we set out on the road from Abydos to Luxor, where we were to meet John West, I realized that there was a sense in which all the connections would look after themselves if the central issue of the antiquity of the monuments could be settled. In other words, if West's geological evidence proved that the Sphinx was more than 12,000 years old, the history of human civilization was going to have to be rewritten. As part of that exciting process, all the other strange, anachronistic ‘fingerprints of the gods’ that kept appearing around the world, and the sense of an undercurrent of ancient connections linking apparently unrelated civilizations, would begin to make sense ...

When West’s evidence was presented in 1992 at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science it had been taken seriously enough to be publicly debated by the Chicago University Egyptologist Mark Lehner, director of the Giza Mapping Project, who—to the astonishment of almost everybody present—had been unable to come up with a convincing refutation. ‘When you say something as complex as the Sphinx dates to 9000 or 10,000 BC,’ Lehner had concluded:

> it implies, of course, that there was a very high civilization that was capable of producing the Sphinx at that period. The question an archaeologist has to ask, therefore, is this: if the Sphinx was made at that time then where is the rest of this civilization, where is the rest of this culture?[15]

Lehner, however, was missing the point.

If the Sphinx did date to 9000 or 10,000 BC, the onus was not on West to produce other evidence for the existence of the civilization which produced it, but on Egyptologists and archaeologists to explain how they had got things so wrong, so consistently, for so long. So could West prove the antiquity of the Sphinx?

Sphinx

‘Egyptologists,’ said John West, ‘are the last people in the world to address any anomaly.’

Of course, there are many anomalies in Egypt. The one West was referring to at that moment, however, was the anomaly of the Fourth Dynasty pyramids: an anomaly because of what had happened during the Third, Fifth and Sixth Dynasties. Zoser’s Step Pyramid at Saqqara (Third Dynasty) was an imposing edifice, but it was built with relatively small, manageable blocks that five or six men working together could carry, and its internal chambers were structurally unsound. The pyramids of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasties (although adorned inside with the beautiful Pyramid Texts) were so poorly built and had collapsed so completely that today most of them amount to little more than mounds of rubble. The Fourth Dynasty pyramids at Giza, however, were wonderfully well made and had endured the passage of thousands of years more or less intact.

It was this sequence of events, or rather its implications, that West felt Egyptologists should have paid more attention to: ‘There’s a discrepancy in the scenario that reads “building kind of rubbishy pyramids that are structurally unsound, suddenly building absolutely unbelievable pyramids that are structurally the most incredible things ever conceived of, and then immediately afterwards going back to structurally unsound pyramids.” It doesn’t make sense ... The parallel scenario in, say, the auto-industry would be inventing and building the Model-T Ford, then suddenly inventing and building the ’93 Porsche and making a few of those, then forgetting how to do that and going back to building Model-T Fords again ... Civilizations don’t work this way.’

‘So what are you saying?’ I asked. ‘Are you saying that the Fourth Dynasty pyramids weren’t built by the Fourth Dynasty at all?’

‘My gut feeling is that they weren’t. They don’t look like the mastabas in front of them. They don’t look like any other Fourth Dynasty stuff either ... They don’t seem to fit in ...’

‘And nor does the Sphinx?’

‘And nor does the Sphinx. But the big difference is that we don’t have to rely on gut feelings where the Sphinx is concerned. We can prove that it was built long before the Fourth Dynasty ...’

John West

Santha and I had been fans of John Anthony West ever since we had first started travelling in Egypt. His guide-book, The Traveller's Key had been a brilliant and indispensable introduction to the mysteries of this ancient land, and we still carried it with us. At the same time his scholarly works, notably Serpent in the Sky, had opened our eyes to the revolutionary possibility that Egyptian civilization—with its manifold glimpses of high science apparently out of place in time—might not have developed entirely within the confines of the Nile Valley but might have been a legacy of some earlier, greater and as yet unidentified civilization 'antedating dynastic Egypt, and all other known civilizations, by millennia'.[1]

Tall and strongly built, West was in his early sixties. He had cultivated a neatly trimmed white beard, was dressed in a khaki safari-suit and wore an eccentric nineteenth-century pith helmet. His manner was youthful and energetic and there was a roguish sparkle in his eyes.

The three of us were sitting on the open upper deck of a Nile cruiser, moored off the corniche in Luxor just a few yards downstream from the Winter Palace Hotel. To our west, across the river, a big red sun, distorted by atmospheric refraction, was setting behind the cliffs of the Valley of the Kings. To our east lay the battered but noble ruins of the Luxor and Karnak temples. Beneath us, transmitted through the hull of the boat, we could feel the lap and flow of the water as it rolled by on its meridional course towards the far-off Delta.

West had first presented his thesis for an older Sphinx in Serpent in the Sky, a comprehensive exposition of the work of the French mathematician R.A. Schwaller de Lubicz. Schwaller's research at the Luxor Temple between 1937 and 1952 had unearthed mathematical evidence which suggested that Egyptian science and culture had been far more advanced and sophisticated than modern scholars had appreciated. However, as West put it, this evidence had been set out in 'abstruse, complex and uncompromising language ... Few readers seem comfortable with raw Schwaller. It's a bit like trying to wade directly into high energy physics without extensive prior training.'

Schwaller's principal publications, both originally in French, were the massive three-volume Temple de l'Homme, which focused on Luxor, and the more general Roi de la théocratie Pharaonique. In this latter work, subsequently translated into English as Sacred Science, Schwaller made a passing reference to the tremendous floods and rains which devastated Egypt in the eleventh millennium BC. Almost as an afterthought, he added:

> A great civilization must have preceded the vast movements of water that passed over Egypt, which leads us to assume that the Sphinx already existed, sculptured in the rock of the west cliff at Giza—that Sphinx whose leonine body, except for the head, shows indisputable signs of water erosion.'[2]

[2] Sacred Science, p. 96.

While working on Serpent, West was struck by the possible significance of this remark and decided to follow it up: 'I realized that if I could prove Schwaller's offhand observation empirically, this would be ironclad evidence for the existence of a previously unidentified high civilization of distant antiquity.'

'Why?'

'Once you've established that water was the agent that eroded the Sphinx the answer is almost childishly simple. It can be explained to anybody who reads the National Enquirer or the News of the World. It's almost moronically simple ... The Sphinx is supposed to have been built by Khafre around 2500 BC, but since the beginning of dynastic times—say 3000 BC onwards—there just hasn't been enough rain on the Giza plateau to have caused the very extensive erosion that we see all over the Sphinx's body. You really have to go back to before 10,000 BC to find a wet enough climate in Egypt to account for weathering of this type and on this scale. It therefore follows that the Sphinx must have been built before 10,000 BC and since it's a massive, sophisticated work of art it also follows that it must have been built by a high civilization.'

'But John,' Santha asked, 'how can you be so sure that the weathering was caused by rain water? Couldn't the desert winds have done the job just as well? After all even orthodox Egyptologists admit that the Sphinx has existed for nearly 5000 years. Isn't that long enough for these effects to have been caused by wind erosion?'

'Naturally that was one of the first possibilities that I had to exclude. Only if I could show that wind-borne abrasive sand couldn't possibly have brought the Sphinx to its present condition would there be any point in looking further into the implications of water erosion.'

Robert Schoch's geology: Unriddling the Sphinx

A key issue turned out to be the deep trench that the monument was surrounded by on all sides: 'Because the Sphinx is set in a hollow,' West explained, 'sand piles up to its neck within a few decades if it's left untended ... It has been left untended often during historical times. In fact through a combination of textual references and historical extrapolations it's possible to prove that during the 4500 years that have elapsed since it was ostensibly built by Khafre it's been buried to its neck for as much as 3300 years.[3] That means that in all this time there has only been a cumulative total of just over 1000 years in which its body has been susceptible to wind-erosion; all the rest of the time it's been protected from the desert winds by an enormous blanket of sand. The point is that if the Sphinx was really built by Khafre in the Old Kingdom, and if wind erosion was capable of inflicting such damage on it in so short a time-span, then other Old Kingdom structures in the area, built out of the same limestone, ought to show similar weathering. But none do—you know, absolutely unmistakable Old Kingdom tombs, full of hieroglyphs and inscriptions—none of them show the same type of weathering as the Sphinx.'

[3] West's detailed evidence is set out in Serpent in the Sky, pp. 184-20. Concerning the covering of the Sphinx by sand he arrives at the following table:

Chephren-Tuthmosis IV c. 1300 years	1000 years

Indeed, none did. Professor Robert Schoch, a Boston University geologist and specialist in rock erosion who had played a key role in validating West's evidence, was satisfied as to the reason for this. The weathering of the Sphinx—and of the walls of its surrounding rock-hewn enclosure—had not been caused by wind-scouring at all but by thousands of years of heavy rainfall long ages before the Old Kingdom came into being.

Having won over his professional peers at the 1992 Convention of the Geological Society of America,[4] Schoch went on to explain his findings to a much wider and more eclectic audience (including Egyptologists) at the 1992 Annual Meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS). He began by pointing out to delegates that 'the body of the Sphinx and the walls of the Sphinx ditch are deeply weathered and eroded ... This erosion is a couple of metres thick in places, at least on the walls. It's very deep, it's very old in my opinion, and it gives a rolling and undulating profile ...'[5]

Such undulations are easily recognizable to stratigraphers and palaeontologists as having been caused by 'precipitation-induced weathering'. As Santha Faiia's photographs of the Sphinx and the Sphinx enclosure indicate, this weathering takes the distinctive form of a combination of deep vertical fissures and undulating, horizontal coves—'a classic textbook example,' in Schoch's words, 'of what happens to a limestone structure when you have rain beating down on it for thousands of years ... It's clearly rain precipitation that produced these erosional

[4] 'An abstract of our team's work was submitted to the Geological Society of America, and we were invited to present our findings at a poster session of at the GSA convention in San Diego—the geological Superbowl. Geologists from all over the world thronged to our booth, much intrigued. Dozens of experts in fields relevant to our research offered help and advice. Shown the evidence, some geologists just laughed, astounded [as Schoch had been initially] that in two centuries of research, no one, geologist or Egyptologist, had noticed that the Sphinx had been weathered by water.' Serpent in the Sky, p. 229; Mystery of the Sphinx. NBC-TV, 1993. 275 geologists endorsed Schoch's findings.

Wind/sand erosion presents a very different profile of sharp-edged horizontal channels selectively scoured out from the softer layers of the affected rock. Under no circumstances can it cause the vertical fissures particularly visible in the wall of the Sphinx enclosure. These could only have been 'formed by water running down the wall',[7] the result of rain falling in enormous quantities, cascading over the slope of the Giza plateau and down into the Sphinx enclosure below. 'It picked out the weak spots in the rock,' Schoch elaborated, 'and opened them up into these fissures—clear evidence to me as a geologist that this erosional feature was caused by rainfall.'[8]

Although in some places obscured by repair blocks put in place by numerous restorers over the passing millennia, the same observation holds true for the scooped-out, undulating, scalloped coves that run the entire length of the Sphinx's body. Again, these are characteristic of precipitation-induced weathering because only long periods of heavy rainfall beating down on the upper parts of the immense structure (and cascading over its sides) could have produced such effects. Confirmation of this comes from the fact that the limestone out of which the Sphinx was carved is not uniform in its composition, but consists of a series of hard and soft layers in which some of the more durable rocks recede farther than some of the less durable rocks.[9] Such a profile simply could not have been produced by wind erosion (which would have selectively chiselled out the softer layers of rock) but 'is entirely 'consistent with precipitation-induced weathering where you have water, rain water beating down from above. The rocks higher up are the more durable ones but they recede back farther than some of the less durable rocks lower in the section which are more protected.'[10]

In his summing up at the AAAS meeting, Schoch concluded:

> It's well known that the Sphinx enclosure fills with sand very quickly, in just a matter of decades, under the desert conditions of the Sahara. And it has to be dug out periodically. And this has been the case since ancient times. Yet you still get this dramatic rolling, erosional profile in the Sphinx enclosure ... Simply put, therefore, what I'm suggesting is that this rolling profile, these features seen on the body and in the Sphinx ditch, hark back to a much earlier period when there was more precipitation in the area, and more moisture, more rain on the Giza plateau.'[11]

As Schoch admitted, he was not the first geologist to have noticed the 'anomalous precipitation-induced weathering features on the core body of the Sphinx'.[12] He was, however, the first to have become involved in public debates over the immense historical implications of this weathering. His attitude was that he preferred to stick to his geology:

> I've been told over and over again that the peoples of Egypt, as far as we know, did not have either the technology or the social organization to cut out the core body of the Sphinx in pre-dynastic times ... However, I don't see it as being my problem as a geologist. I'm not seeking to shift the burden, but its really up to the Egyptologists and archaeologists to figure out who carved it. If my findings are in conflict with their theory about the rise of civilization then maybe its time for them to re-evaluate that theory. I'm not saying that the Sphinx was built by Atlanteans, or people from Mars, or extra-terrestrials. I'm just following the science where it leads me, and it leads me to conclude that the Sphinx was built much earlier than previously thought ...'[13]

Legendary civilizations

How much earlier?

John West told us that he and Schoch had 'a friendly debate going' about the age of the Sphinx: 'Schoch puts the date somewhere between 5000 BC and 7000 BC minimum [the epoch of the Neolithic Subpluvial] mainly by taking the most cautious view allowed by the data to hand. As a professor of Geology at a big university, he's almost constrained to take a conservative view—and it's true that there were rains between 7000 BC and 5000 BC. However, for a variety of both intuitive and scholarly reasons, I think that the date is much, much older and that most of the weathering of the Sphinx took place in the earlier rainy period before 10,000 BC ... Frankly, if it was as relatively recent as 5000 to 7000 BC, I think we'd probably have found other evidence of the civilization that carved it. A lot of evidence from that period has been found in Egypt. There are some strange anomalies within it, I'll admit,[14] but most of it—the vast bulk—is really quite rudimentary.'

'So who built the Sphinx if it wasn't the pre-dynastic Egyptians?' 'My conjecture is that the whole riddle is linked in some way to those legendary civilizations spoken of in all the mythologies of the world. You know—that there were great catastrophes, that a few people survived and went wandering around the earth and that a bit of knowledge was preserved here, a bit there ... My hunch is that the Sphinx is linked to all that. If I were asked to place a bet I'd say that it predates the break-up of the last Ice Age and is probably older than 10000 BC, perhaps even older than 15,000 BC. My conviction—actually it's more than a conviction—is that it's vastly old?

This was a conviction I increasingly shared—and, I reminded myself, that most nineteenth-century Egyptologists had shared it too. Nevertheless the Sphinx's appearance argued against such intuitions since there was no doubt that its head looked conventionally pharaonic. 'If it's as old as you think it is,' I now asked John, 'then how do you explain that the sculptors depicted it wearing the characteristic nemes head-dress and uraeus of dynastic times?'

'I'm not bothered about that. In fact, as you know, Egyptologists contend that the face of the Sphinx resembles the face of Khafre—its one of the reasons why they claim it must have been built by him. Schoch and I have looked into this very carefully. We think, from the proportions of the head relative to the rest of the body, that it's been recarved during dynastic times—and that's why it looks very dynastic. But we don't think it was ever meant to represent Khafre. As part of our ongoing research into these issues we had Lieutenant Frank Domingo, a forensic artist with the New York Police Department, come over and do point by point comparisons between the face of the Sphinx and the face of Cephren's statue in the Cairo Museum. His conclusion was that in no way was the Sphinx ever intended to represent Khafre. It's not just a matter of it being a different face—it's probably a different race.[15] So this is a very ancient monument that was recarved at a much later date. Originally it may not even have had a human face. Maybe it started out with a lion's face as well as a lion's body.'

Magellan and the first dinosaur bone

After my own explorations at Giza I was interested to know whether West's research had cast doubt on the orthodox dating of any of the other monuments on the plateau—particularly the so-called Valley Temple of Khafre.

'We think there's quite a lot of stuff that may be older,' he told me. 'Not just the Valley Temple but also the Mortuary Temple up the hill, probably something to do with the Menkaure complex, maybe even the Pyramid of Khafre ...'

'What in the Menkaure complex?'

'Well, the Mortuary Temple. And actually I'm only using the conventional attribution of the Pyramids for convenience here ...'

[15] 'After reviewing my various drawings, schematics and measurements, my final conclusion concurs with my initial reaction: the two works represent two separate individuals. The proportions in the frontal view and especially the angles and facial protrusion in the lateral views, convinced me that the Sphinx is not Khafre. If the ancient Egyptians were skilled technicians and capable of duplicating images, then these two works cannot represent the same individual.' Frank Domingo, cited in Serpent in the Sky, p. 232. See also AAAS 1992, for Schoch's views on the recarving of the Sphinx's head.

‘It’s hard to say. I think something was there where those pyramids now are—because of the geometry. The Sphinx was part of a master-plan. And the Khafre Pyramid is maybe the most interesting in that respect because it was definitely built in two stages. If you look at it—maybe you’ve noticed—you’ll see that its base consists of several courses of gigantic blocks similar in style to the blocks of the core masonry of the Valley Temple. Superimposed above the base, the rest of the pyramid is composed of smaller, less precisely engineered stuff. But when you look at it, knowing what you’re looking for, you see instantly that it’s built in two separate bits. I mean I can’t help but feel that the vast blocks on the bottom date from the earlier period—from the time the Sphinx was built—and that the second part was added later—but even then not necessarily by Khafre. As you go into this you begin to realize that the more you learn the more complex everything becomes. For example, there may even have been an intermediate civilization, which actually would correspond to the Egyptian texts. They talk themselves about two long prior periods. In the first of these Egypt was supposedly ruled by the gods—the Neteru—and in the second it was ruled by the Shemsu Hor, the “Companions of Horus”. So, as I say, the problems just get more and more complicated. Fortunately, however, the bottom line stays simple. The bottom line is the Sphinx wasn’t built by Khafre. The geology proves that it’s a hell of a lot older ...’

‘Nevertheless the Egyptologists won’t accept that it is. One of the arguments they’ve used against you—Mark Lehner did so—goes something like this: “If the Sphinx was made before 10,000 BC then why can’t you show us the rest of the civilization that built it?” In other words, why don’t you have any other evidence to put forward for the presence of your legendary lost civilization apart from a few structures on the Giza plateau? What do you say to that?’

‘First off, there are structures outside Giza—for example the Osireion in Abydos, where you’ve just come from. We think that amazing edifice may relate to our work on the Sphinx. Even if the Osireion didn’t exist, however, the absence of other evidence wouldn’t worry me. I mean, to make a big deal out of the fact that further confirmatory evidence hasn’t been found yet and to use this to try to scuttle the arguments for an older Sphinx is completely illogical. Analogously it’s like saying to Magellan ... “Where are the other guys who’ve sailed round the world? Of course it’s still flat.” Or in 1838 when the first dinosaur bone was found they would have said, “Of course there’s no such thing as a giant extinct animal. Where’s the rest of the skeletons? They’ve only found one bone.” But once a few people began to realize that this bone could only be from an extinct animal, within twenty years the museums of the world were filled up with complete dinosaur skeletons. So it’s sort of like that. Nobody’s thought to look in the right places. I'm absolutely certain that other evidence will be found once a few people start looking in the right places—along the banks of the ancient Nile, for example, which is miles from the present Nile, or even at the bottom of the Mediterranean, which was dry during the last Ice Age.'

The problem of transmission

I asked John West why he thought that Egyptologists and archaeologists were so unwilling to consider that the Sphinx might be a clue to the existence of a forgotten episode in human history.

'The reason, I think, is that they're quite fixed in their ideas about the linear evolution of civilization. They find it hard to come to terms with the notion that there might have been people, more than 12,000 years ago, who were more sophisticated than we are today ... The Sphinx, and the geology which proves its antiquity, and the fact that the technology that was involved in making it is in many ways almost beyond our own capacities, contradicts the belief that civilization and technology have evolved in a straightforward, linear way ... Because even with the best modern technology we almost couldn't carry out the various tasks that were involved in the project. The Sphinx itself, that's not such a staggering feat. I mean if you get enough sculptors to cut the stone away they could carve a statue a mile long. The technology was involved in taking the stones, quarrying the stones, to free the Sphinx from its bedrock and then in moving those stones and using them to build the Valley Temple a couple of hundred feet away ...'

This was news to me: 'You mean that the 200-ton blocks in the Valley Temple walls were quarried right out of the Sphinx enclosure?'

'Yes, no doubt about it. Geologically they're from the identical member of rock. They were quarried out, moved over to the site of the Temple—God knows how—and erected into forty-foot-high walls—again God knows how. I'm talking about the huge limestone core blocks, not the granite facing. I think that the granite was added much later, quite possibly by Khafre. But if you look at the limestone core blocks you'll see that they bear the marks of exactly the same kind of precipitation-induced weathering that are found on the Sphinx. So the Sphinx and the core structure of the Valley Temple were made at the same time by the same people—whoever they may have been.'

'And do you think that those people and the later dynastic Egyptians were connected to each other in some way? In Serpent in the Sky you suggested that a legacy must have been passed on.'

'It's still just a suggestion. All that I know for sure on the basis of our work on the Sphinx is that a very, very high, sophisticated civilization capable of undertaking construction projects on a grand scale was present in Egypt in the very distant past. Then there was a lot of rain.

Then, thousands of years later, in the same place, pharaonic civilization popped up already fully formed, apparently out of nowhere, with all its knowledge complete. That much we can be certain of. But whether or not the knowledge that Ancient Egypt possessed was the same as the knowledge that produced the Sphinx I really can't say.'

'How about this,' I speculated: 'The civilization that produced the Sphinx wasn't based here, at least not originally ... It wasn't in Egypt. It put the Sphinx here as some sort of a marker or outpost ...'

'Perfectly possible. Could be that the Sphinx for that civilization was like, let's say, what Abu Simbel [in Nubia] was for dynastic Egypt.'

'Then that civilization came to an end, was extinguished by some sort of massive catastrophe, and that's when the legacy of high knowledge was handed on ... Because they had the Sphinx here they knew about Egypt, they knew this place, they knew this country, they had a connection here. Maybe people survived the ending of that civilization. Maybe they came here. ... Does that work for you?'

'Well, it's a possibility. Again, going back into the mythologies and legends of the world, many of them tell of such a catastrophe and of the few people—the Noah story that's prevalent through endless civilizations—who somehow or other retained and passed on knowledge. The big problem with all this, from my point of view, is the transmission process: how exactly the knowledge does get handed on during the thousands and thousands of years between the construction of the Sphinx and the flowering of dynastic Egypt. Theoretically you're sort of stuck—aren't you?—with this vast period in which the knowledge has to be transmitted. This is not easy to slough off. On the other hand we do know that those legends we're referring to were passed on word for word over countless generations. And in fact oral transmission is a much surer means of transmission than written transmission, because the language may change but as long as whoever's telling the story tells it true in whatever the language of the time is ... it surfaces some 5000 years later in its original form. So maybe there are ways—in secret societies and religious cults, or through mythology, for example—that the knowledge could have been preserved and passed on before flowering again. The point, I think, with problems as complex and important as these, is simply not to dismiss any possibilities, no matter how outrageous they may at first seem, without investigating them very, very thoroughly ...'

Second opinion

John West was in Luxor, leading a study group on Egypt's sacred sites. Early the next day he and his students went south to Aswan and Abu Simbel. Santha and I journeyed north again, back towards Giza and the mysteries of the Sphinx and the pyramids. We were to meet there with the archaeo-astronomer Robert Bauval. As we shall see, his stellar correlations provided startling independent corroboration for the geological evidence of Giza’s vast antiquity.

Chapter 48

Earth Measurers

Follow these instructions carefully:

Draw two parallel straight lines vertically down a sheet of paper, about seven inches long and a bit under three inches apart. Draw a third line, also vertical, also parallel and of equal length, exactly mid-way between the first two. Write the letter 'S'—for 'South'—at the top end of your diagram (the end farthest away from you), and the letter 'N' for 'North' at the bottom end. Add the letters 'E' for 'East' and 'W for 'West' in their appropriate positions at either side of the diagram, to your left for East and to your right for West.

What you are looking at are the outlines of a geometrical map of Egypt incorporating a perspective very different from our own (where 'North' is always equated with 'Up'). This map where 'Up' is 'South' seems to have been worked out an enormously long time ago by cartographers with a scientific understanding of the shape and size of our planet.

To complete the map you should now mark a dot on the central of the three parallel lines about an inch to the south of ('up' from) the northern end of the diagram. Then draw two more lines diagonally down from this point, respectively to the north-east and north-west, until they reach the northern ends of the two outermost parallel lines. Finally link those parallel lines directly with horizontal lines running east to west at the northern and southern ends of the diagram.

The shape produced is a meridional rectangle (oriented north-south). This rectangle is seven inches long by just under three inches wide and has a triangle demarcated at its northern (lower) end. The triangle represents the Nile Delta and the dot at the apex of the triangle represents the apex of the Delta—a point on the ground at 30˚ 06' north and 31˚ 14' east, very close to the location of the Great Pyramid.

Whatever else it may be, it has long been understood by mathematicians and geographers that the Great Pyramid serves the function of a geodetic marker (geodetics being the branch of science concerned with determining the exact position of geographical points and the shape and size of the earth[1]). This realization first dawned in the late eighteenth century when the armies of revolutionary France, led by Napoleon Bonaparte, invaded Egypt. Bonaparte, who had cultivated a deep interest in the enigmas of the pyramids, brought with him a large number of scholars, 175 in all, including several 'greybeards' gathered from various universities who were reputed to have acquired 'a profound knowledge of Egyptian antiquities', and, more usefully, a group of mathematicians, cartographers and surveyors.[2]

One of the tasks the savants were set, after the conquest was completed, was to draw up detailed maps of Egypt. In the process of doing this they discovered that the Great Pyramid was perfectly aligned to true north—and of course to the south, east and west as well, as we saw in Part VI. This meant that the mysterious structure made an excellent reference and triangulation point, and a decision was therefore taken to use the meridian passing through its apex as the base-line for all other measurements and orientations. The team then proceeded to produce the first accurate maps of Egypt drawn up in the modern age. When they had finished, they were intrigued to note that the Great Pyramid's meridian sliced the Nile Delta region into two equal halves. They also found that if the diagonals running from the pyramid's apex to its north-eastern and north-western corners were extended (forming lines on the map running north-east and northwest until they reached the Mediterranean), the triangle thus formed would neatly encapsulate the entire Delta area.[3]

Let us now return to our map, which also incorporates a triangle representing the Delta. Its other main components are the three parallel meridians. The eastern meridian is at longitude 32° 38' east—the official eastern border of Ancient Egypt from the beginning of dynastic times. The western meridian is at longitude 29° 50' east, the official western border of ancient Egypt. The central meridian is at longitude 31° 14' east, exactly midway between the other two (1° 24' away from each).[4]

What we now have is a representation of a strip on the surface of planet earth that is exactly 2° 48' wide. How long is this strip? Ancient Egypt's 'official' northern and southern borders (which bore no more relationship to settlement patterns than the official eastern and western boundaries) are marked by the horizontal lines at the top and bottom of the map and are located respectively at 31° 06' north and 24° 06' north.[5] The northern border, 31° 06' north, joins the two outer ends of the estuary of the Nile. The southern border, 24° 06' N, marks the precise latitude of the island of Elephantine at Aswan (Seyne) where an important astronomical and solar observatory was located throughout known Egyptian history.[6] It seems, that this archaic land, sacred since time began—the creation and habitation of the gods—was originally conceived of as a geometric construct exactly seven terrestrial degrees in length.

Within this construct, the Great Pyramid appears to have been carefully sited as a geodetic marker for the apex of the Delta. The latter, which we have indicated on our map, is located at 30° 06' N 31° 14' E—a point in the middle of the Nile at the northern edge of modern Cairo. Meanwhile the pyramid stands at latitude of 30°N (corrected for atmospheric refraction) and at longitude 31° 09' E, an error of just a few minutes of terrestrial arc to the south and west. This 'error', however, does not appear to have resulted from sloppiness or inaccuracy on the part of the pyramid builders. On the contrary, a close look at the topography of the area suggests that the explanation should be sought in the need to find a site suitable for all the astronomical observations that had to be taken for accurate setting-out, and with a sufficiently stable geological structure on which to park, for ever, a six-million-ton monument almost 500 feet high with a footprint of over thirteen acres.

The Giza plateau fits the bill on all counts: close to the apex of the Delta, elevated above the Valley of the Nile, and equipped with an excellent foundation of solid limestone bedrock.

Doing things by degrees

We were driving north from Luxor to Giza in the back of Mohamed Walilli's Peugeot 504—a journey of just over 4 degrees of longitude, i.e., from 25° 42' N, to the 30th parallel. Between Asiut and El Minya, a corridor of conflict in recent months between Islamic extremists and Egyptian government forces, we were provided with an armed escort of soldiers, one of whom wore plain clothes and sat in the passenger seat beside Mohamed fondling an automatic pistol. The others, about a dozen men armed with AK47 assault rifles, were distributed equally between two pick-up trucks which sandwiched us front and rear.

'Dangerous people live here,' Mohamed had confided out of the corner of his mouth when we had been stopped at a road-block in Asiut and ordered to wait for our escort. Now, although obviously rattled at being obliged to match the high speed of the escorting vehicles, he seemed to relish the kudos of being part of an impressive convoy, lights flashing and sirens wailing, weaving in and out of the slower traffic on the main highway from upper to lower Egypt.

I looked out of the car window for a while at the unchanging spectacle of the Nile, at its fertile green banks and the red haze of the deserts a few miles away to east and west. This was Egypt, the real organic Egypt of today and yesterday, which overlapped (but spread out far beyond) the strange 'official' Egypt of the map described, a rectangular fiction exactly seven terrestrial degrees in length.

In the nineteenth century the renowned Egyptologist Ludwig Borchardt expressed what is still the conventional wisdom of his colleagues when he remarked, 'One must absolutely exclude the possibility that the ancients may have measured by degrees.'[7] This was a judgement that seemed increasingly unlikely to be tenable. Whoever they may have been, it was obvious that the original planners and architects of the Giza necropolis had belonged to a civilization which knew the earth to be a sphere, knew its dimensions almost as well as we do ourselves, and had divided it into 360 degrees, just as we do today.

The proof of this lay in the creation of a symbolic official 'country' exactly seven terrestrial degrees in length, and in the admirably geodetic location and orientation to the cardinal points of the Great Pyramid. Equally persuasive was the fact, already touched on in Chapter Twenty-three, that the perimeter of the pyramid's base stood in the relationship 2*pi* to its height and that the entire monument seemed to have been designed to serve as a map-projection—on a scale of 1:43,200—of the northern hemisphere of our planet:

> The Great Pyramid was a projection on four triangular surfaces. The apex represented the pole and the perimeter represented the equator. This is the reason why the perimeter is in relation 2*pi* to the height.[8]

The Pyramid/Earth ratio

We have demonstrated the use of pi in the Pyramid[9] and need not go into this matter again; besides, the existence of the pi relationship, though interpreted as accidental by orthodox scholars, is not contested by them.[10] But are we seriously supposed to accept that the monument could also be a representation of the northern hemisphere of the earth projected on flat surfaces at a scale of 1:43,200? Let us remind ourselves of the figures.

According to the best modern estimates, based on satellite observations, the equatorial circumference of the earth is 24,902.45 miles and its polar radius is 3949.921 miles.[11] The perimeter of the Great Pyramid's base is 3023.16 feet and its height is 481.3949 feet.[12] The scaling-down, as it turns out, is not absolutely exact, but it is very near. Moreover, when we remember the bulge at the earth's equator (our planet being an oblate spheroid rather than a perfect sphere), the results achieved by the pyramid builders seem even closer to 1:43,200.

If we take the earth's equatorial circumference, 24,902.45 miles, and scale it down (divide it) by 43,200 we get a result of 0.5764 of a mile. There are 5280 feet in a mile. The next step, therefore, is to multiply 0.5764 by 5280, which produces a figure of 3043.39 feet. The earth's equatorial circumference scaled down 43,200 times is therefore 3,043.39 feet. By comparison, as we have seen, the perimeter of the Great Pyramid's base is 3,023.16 feet. This represents an 'error' of only 20 feet—or about three-quarters of 1 per cent. Given the razor-sharp accuracy of the pyramid builders, however (who normally worked to even finer tolerances), the error is less likely to have resulted from mistakes in the construction of the giant monument than in an underestimation of our planet's true circumference by just 163 miles, probably caused in part by failure to take account of the equatorial bulge.

Let us now consider the earth's polar radius of 3949.921 miles. If we scale it down 43,200 times we get 0.0914 of a mile: 482.59 feet. The earth's polar radius scaled down 43,200 times is therefore 482.59 feet. By comparison the Great Pyramid's height is 481.3949 feet—just a foot less than the ideal figure, an error of barely one-fifth of one per cent.

As near as makes no difference, therefore, the perimeter of the Great Pyramid's base is indeed 1:43,200 of the equatorial circumference of the earth. And as near as makes no difference, the height of the Great Pyramid above that base is indeed 1:43,200 of the polar radius of the earth. In other words, during all the centuries of darkness experienced by Western civilization when knowledge of our planet's dimensions was lost to us, all we ever needed to do to rediscover that knowledge was to measure the height and base perimeter of the Great Pyramid and multiply by 43,200!

The commonsense answer is 'not very likely at all,' since it should be obvious to any reasonable person that what we are looking at could only be the result of a deliberate and carefully calculated planning decision. Commonsense, however, has never been a faculty held in high esteem by Egyptologists, and it is therefore necessary to ask whether there is anything else in the data which might confirm that the ratio of 143,200 is a purposeful expression of intelligence and knowledge, rather than some numerical fluke.

The ratio itself seems to provide that confirmation, for the simple reason that 43,200 is not a random number (like, say, 45,000 or 47,000, or 50,500, or 38,800). On the contrary it is one of a series of numbers, and multiples of those numbers, which relate to the phenomenon of precession of the equinoxes, and which have become embedded in archaic myths all around the world. As the reader can confirm by glancing back at Part V the basic numerals of the Pyramid/Earth ratio crop up again and again in those myths, sometimes directly as 43,200 sometimes as 432, as 4320, as 432,000, as 4,320,000, and so on.

What we appear to be confronted by are two remarkable propositions, back-to-back, as though designed to reinforce one another. It is surely remarkable enough that the Great Pyramid should be able to function as an accurate scale-model of the northern hemisphere of planet earth. But it is even more remarkable that the scale involved should incorporate numbers relating precisely to one of the key planetary mechanisms of the earth. This is the fixed and apparently eternal precession of its axis of rotation around the pole of the ecliptic, a phenomenon which causes the vernal point to migrate around the band of the zodiac at the rate of one degree every 72 years, and 30 degrees (one complete zodiacal constellation) every 2160 years. Precession through two zodiacal constellations, or 60 degrees along the ecliptic, takes 4320 years.[13]

The constant repetition of these precessional numbers in ancient myths could, perhaps, be a coincidence. Viewed in isolation, the appearance of the precessional number 43,200 in the pyramid/earth ratio might also be a coincidence (although the odds against this must be astronomical). But when we find precessional numbers in both these very different media—the ancient myths and the ancient monument—it really does strain credulity to suppose that coincidence is all that is involved here. Moreover, just as the Teutonic myth of Valhalla's walls leads us to the precessional number 432,000 by inviting us to calculate the warriors who 'go to war with the Wolf (500 plus 40 multiplied by 800, as saw in Chapter Thirty-three), so the Great Pyramid leads us to the precessional number 43,200 by demonstrating through the pi relationship that it might be a scale-model part of the earth and then by inviting us to calculate that scale.

Matching fingerprints?

At El Minya our escort vehicles left us, though the plain-clothes soldier in the front seat stayed with us until Cairo. We paused for a late lunch of bread and felafel in a boisterous, noisy village, then motored north again.

Throughout all this, my thoughts remained focused on the Great Pyramid. Obviously it was not an accident that so immense and conspicuous a structure should occupy a key geographic and geodetic location in a part of the world that appeared, bizarrely, to have been conceived of and 'geometrized' as a rectangular, symbolic construct exactly seven terrestrial degrees in length. But it was the pyramid's other function as a three-dimensional map projection of the northern hemisphere that particularly interested me because it suggested a 'match' with the ancient but advanced maps of the world described in Part I. Those maps, which made use of spherical trigonometry and a range of sophisticated projections, had been claimed by Professor Charles Hapgood to provide tangible, documentary evidence that an advanced civilization with a comprehensive knowledge of the globe must have flourished during the last Ice Age. Now here was the Great Pyramid proving to have a cartographic function vis-à-vis the northern hemisphere and also incorporating a sophisticated projection. As one expert explained:

> Each flat face of the Pyramid was designed to represent one curved quarter of the northern hemisphere, or spherical quadrant of 90 degrees. To project a spherical quadrant on to a flat triangle correctly, the arc, or base, of the quadrant must be the same length as the base of the triangle, and both must have the same height. This happens to be the case only with a cross-section or meridian bisection of the Great Pyramid, whose slope angle gives the pi relation between height and base ...[14]

Was it possible that surviving copies and compilations of ancient maps—like the Piri Reis Map, for example—might in some cases go back to source documents produced by the same culture that skillfully incorporated its knowledge of the globe into the dimensions of the Great Pyramid (and indeed into the carefully geometrized dimensions of Ancient Egypt itself)?

I could hardly forget that Charles Hapgood and his team had spent months trying to work out where the original projection of the Piri Reis Map had been centred. The answer they finally obtained was Egypt and specifically Seyne (Aswan) in upper Egypt[15]—where, as we have seen, an important astronomical observatory was situated at latitude 24° 06' N, the official southern border.

Needless to say, precise astronomical observations would have been essential for calculations of the circumference of the earth and of latitude positions.[16] But for how long before the historical period had the Ancient Egyptians and their ancestors been making such observations? And had they indeed learned this skill, as they stated forthrightly in their traditions, from the gods who had once walked among them?

Navigators in the Boat of Millions of Years

The god believed by the Ancient Egyptians to have taught the principles of astronomy to their ancestors was Thoth: 'He who reckons in heaven, the counter of the stars, the enumerator of the earth and of what is therein, and the measurer of the earth.'[17]

Normally depicted as a man wearing an ibis mask, Thoth was a leading member of the elite company of First Time deities who dominated religious life in Ancient Egypt from the beginning to the end of its civilization. These were the great gods, the Neteru. Although they were believed in one sense to be self-created, it was also openly acknowledged and understood that they had a special connection of some kind with another land—a fabulous and far-off country referred to in the ancient texts as Ta-Neteru, the 'land of the gods'.[18]

Ta-Neteru was thought to have had a definite earthly location a very long way south of Ancient Egypt—seas and oceans away—farther even than the spice country of Punt (which probably lay along East Africa's Somali coast).[19] To confuse matters, however, Punt was also spoken of sometimes as the 'Divine Land', or 'God's Land', and was the source of the sweet-smelling frankincense and myrrh especially favoured by the gods.[20]

Another mythical paradise was also linked to the Neteru—an 'abode of the blessed', where the best of humans were sometimes taken—which was believed to be 'situated away beyond a large expanse of water'. As Wallis Budge observed in his important study, Osiris and the Egyptian Resurrection, 'the Egyptians believed that this land could only be reached by means of a boat, or by the personal help of the gods who were thought to transport their favourites thither ...'[21] Those lucky enough to gain entry would find themselves in a magical garden consisting of 'islands, interconnected by canals filled with running water which caused them to be always green and fertile'.[22] On the islands in this garden, 'the wheat grew to a height of five cubits, the ears being two cubits long and the stalks three, and the barley grew to a height of seven cubits, the ears being three cubits long and the stalks four.'[23]

Was it from a land such as this,, superbly irrigated and scientifically farmed, that the agriculture bringer Osiris, whose title was 'President of the Land of the South',[24] had voyaged to Egypt at the dawn of the First

Time? And was it from a land such as this, accessible only by boat, that ibis-masked Thoth had also made his way, crossing seas and oceans to deliver the priceless gifts of astronomy and earth-measurement to the primitive inhabitants of the prehistoric Nile Valley?

Whatever the truth behind the tradition, Thoth was remembered and revered by the Ancient Egyptians as the inventor of mathematics, astronomy and engineering.[25] 'It was his will and power', according to Wallis Budge, 'that were believed to keep the forces of heaven and earth in equilibrium. It was his great skill in celestial mathematics which made proper use of the laws upon which the foundation and maintenance of the universe rested.'[26] Thoth was also credited with teaching the ancestral Egyptians the skills of geometry and land-surveying, medicine and botany. He was believed to have been the inventor 'of figures, of the letters of the alphabet, and of the arts of reading and writing'.[27] He was the Great Lord of Magic'[28] who could move objects with the power of his voice, 'the author of every work on every branch of knowledge, both human and divine'.[29]

It was to the teachings of Thoth—which they guarded jealously in their temples and claimed to have been handed down from generation to generation in the form of forty-two books of instruction[30]—that the Ancient Egyptians ascribed their world-renowned wisdom and knowledge of the skies. This knowledge was spoken of almost in awe, by the classical commentators who visited Egypt from the fifth century BC onwards.

Herodotus, the earliest of these travellers, noted:

> The Egyptians were the first to discover the solar year, and to portion out its course into twelve parts ... It was observation of the course of the stars which led them to adopt this division ...[31]

Plato (fourth century BC) reported that the Egyptians had observed the stars 'for ten thousand years'.[32] And later, in the first century BC, Diodorus Siculus left this more detailed account:

> The positions and arrangements of the stars as well as their motions have always been the subject of careful observation among the Egyptians ... From ancient times to this day they have preserved the records concerning each of these stars over an incredible number of years ...[33]

Why should the Ancient Egyptians have cultivated an almost obsessional interest in the long-term observation of the stars, and why in particular should they have kept records of their movements 'over an incredible number of years'? Such detailed observations would not have been necessary if their only interest, as a number of scholars have seriously suggested, had been agricultural (the need to predict the seasons, which any country-born person can do). There must have been some other purpose.

Moreover, how did the Ancient Egyptians get started on astronomy in the first place? It is not an obvious hobby for a valley-dwelling landlocked people to develop on their own initiative. Perhaps we should take more seriously the explanation they themselves offer: that their ancestors were taught the study of the stars by a god. We might also pay closer attention to the many unmistakably maritime references in the Pyramid Texts.[34] And there could be important new inferences to draw from ancient Egyptian religious art in which the gods are shown travelling in beautiful, high-prowed, streamlined boats, built to the same advanced ocean-going specifications as the pyramid boats at Giza and the mysterious fleet moored in the desert sands at Abydos.

Landlocked people do not as rule become astronomers; seafaring people do. Is it not possible that the maritime iconography of the Ancient Egyptians, the design of their ships, and also their splendid obsession with observing the stars, could have been part of an inheritance passed on to their ancestors by an unidentified seafaring, navigating race, in remote prehistory? It is really only such an archaic race, such a forgotten maritime civilization, that could have left its fingerprints behind in the form of maps which accurately depict the world as it looked before the end of the last Ice Age. It is really only such a civilization, steering its course by the stars 'for ten thousand years' that could have observed and accurately timed the phenomenon of equinoctial precession with the exactitude attested in the ancient myths. And, although hypothetical, it is only such a civilization that could have measured the earth with sufficient precision to have arrived at the dimensions scaled down in the Great Pyramid.

The signature of a distant date

It was almost midnight by the time that we reached Giza. We checked into the Siag, a hotel with an excellent pyramid view, and sat out on our balcony as the three stars of Orion's belt tracked slowly across the southern heavens.

It was the disposition of these three stars, as archaeo-astronomer Robert Bauval had recently demonstrated, that served as the celestial template for the site-plan of the three Giza pyramids. This, in itself, was a remarkable discovery, suggesting a far higher level of observational astronomy, and of surveying and setting-out skills, than scholars had attributed to the Ancient Egyptians. Even more remarkable, however—and the reason that I had arranged to meet him at Giza the next morning—was Bauval's contention that the pattern traced out on the ground (in almost fifteen million tons of perfectly dressed stone) matched exactly the pattern in the sky during the epoch of 10,450 BC.

[34] The Ancient Egyptian Pyramid Texts, for example pp. 78, 170, 171, 290.

If Bauval was correct, the pyramids had been devised, using the changes precession effects in the positions of the stars, as the permanent architectural signature of the eleventh millennium BC.

Chapter 49

The Power of the Thing

On a scale of 1:43,200 the Great Pyramid serves as a model, and map-projection, of the northern hemisphere of the earth. What absolutely excludes the possibility that this could be a coincidence is the fact that the scale involved is keyed in numerically to the rate of precession of the equinoxes—one of earth's most characteristic planetary mechanisms. It is therefore clear that we are confronted here by the manifestation of a deliberate planning decision: one intended to be recognizable as such by any culture which had acquired (a) an accurate knowledge of the dimensions of the earth and (b) an accurate knowledge of the rate of precessional motion.

Thanks to the work of Robert Bauval, we can now be certain that another deliberate planning decision was implemented in the Great Pyramid (which—it is increasingly apparent—must be understood as a device designed to fulfill many different functions). In this case the plan was a truly ambitious one involving the Second and Third Pyramids as well, but it bears the fingerprints of the same ancient architects and builders who conceived of the Great Pyramid as a scale model of the earth. Their hallmark seems to have been precession—perhaps because they liked its mathematical regularity and predictability—and they used precession to devise a plan which could be understood properly only by a scientifically advanced culture.

Ours is such a culture, and Robert Bauval is the first to have worked out the basic parameters of the plan—a discovery for which he has received public acclaim and will in due course, get the scientific recognition he deserves.[1] Belgian by nationality, born and brought up in Alexandria, he is tall, lean, clean-shaven, forty-something, and going a little thin on top. His most notable feature is a stubborn lower jaw which characterizes his tenacious, inquiring personality; he speaks with a hybrid French-Egyptian-English accent and is decidedly oriental in manner. He has a first-class mind and is always restlessly accumulating and analysing new data relevant to his interests, finding new ways to look at old problems. In the process, entirely by accident, he has succeeded in transforming himself into a kind of magician of esoteric knowledge.

[1] Robert Bauval's The Orion Mystery (Heinemann, London; Crown, New York; Doubleday, Canada; List, Germany; Planeta, Spain; Pygmalion, France, etc.) was an international bestseller when it was published in 1994. Egyptologists closed ranks against its implications, which they refused to discuss, but many distinguished astronomers hailed Bauval's findings as a breakthrough.

The Orion Mystery

The roots of Bauval's discoveries at Giza go back to the 1960s when the Egyptologist and architect Dr. Alexander Badawy and the American astronomer Virginia Trimble demonstrated that the southern shaft of the King's Chamber in the Great Pyramid was targeted like a gun-barrel on the Belt of Orion during the Pyramid Age—around 2600 to 2400 BC.[2]

Bauval decided to test the southern shaft of the Queen's Chamber, which Badawy and Trimble had not investigated, and established that it had been sighted on the star Sirius during the Pyramid Age. The evidence that proved this was provided by the German engineer Rudolf Gantenbrink as a result of measurements taken by his robot Upuaut in March 1993. This was the robot that had made the startling discovery of a closed portcullis door blocking the shaft at a distance of about 200 feet from the Queen's Chamber. Equipped with a high-tech on-board clinometer, the little machine had also provided the first-ever completely accurate reading of the shaft's angle of inclination: 39° 30'.[3]

As Bauval explains:

> I did the calculations and these established that the shaft had been targeted on the meridian transit of Sirius around the epoch 2400 BC. There couldn't be any doubt about it at all. I also recalculated the Orion's Belt alignment worked out by Badawy and Trimble with new data that Gantenbrink gave me on the inclination of the southern shaft of the King's Chamber. He'd measured that at 45 degrees exactly, whereas Badawy and Trimble had worked with Flinders Petrie's slightly less accurate measurement of 44° 30'. The new data enabled me to refine Badawy's and Trimble's date for the alignment. What I found was that the shaft had been precisely targeted on Al Nitak, the lowest of the three belt stars, which crossed the meridian at altitude 45 degrees around the year 2475 BC.[4]

Up to this point Bauval's conclusions had been well within the chronological bounds set by orthodox Egyptologists, who normally dated the construction of the Great Pyramid to around 2520 BC.[5] If anything, the alignments the archaeo-astronomer had come up with suggested that the shafts had been built a little later, rather than earlier, than conventional wisdom allowed.

As the reader is aware, however, Bauval had also made another discovery of an altogether more unsettling nature. Once again it involved the stars of Orion's Belt:

> They're slanted along a diagonal in a south-westerly direction relative to the axis of the Milky Way and the pyramids are slanted along a diagonal in a southwesterly direction relative to the axis of the Nile. If you look carefully on a clear night you'll also see that the smallest of the three stars, the one at the top which the Arabs call Mintaka, is slightly offset to the east of the principal diagonal formed by the > other two. This pattern is mimicked on the ground where we see that the Pyramid of Menkaure is offset by exactly the right amount to the east of the principal diagonal formed by the Pyramid of Khafre (which represents the middle star, Al Nilam) and the Great Pyramid, which represents Al Nitak. It's really quite obvious that all these monuments were laid out according to a unified site plan that was modelled with extraordinary precision on those three stars. ... What they did at Giza was to build Orion's Belt on the ground.'[6]

There was more to come. Using a sophisticated computer programme[7] capable of plotting the precessionally induced changes in the declinations of all the stars visible in the sky over any part of the world in any epoch, Bauval found that the Pyramids/Orion's Belt correlation was general and obvious in all epochs, but specific and exact in only one:

> At 10,450 BC—and at that date only—we find that the pattern of the pyramids on the ground provides a perfect reflection of the pattern of the stars in the sky. I mean it's a perfect match—faultless—and it cannot be an accident because the entire arrangement correctly depicts two very unusual celestial events that occurred only at that time. First, and purely by chance, the Milky Way, as visible from Giza in 10,450 BC, exactly duplicated the meridional course of the Nile Valley; secondly, to the west of the Milky Way, the three stars of Orion's Belt were at the lowest altitude in their precessional cycle, with Al Nitak, the star represented by the Great Pyramid, crossing the meridian at 11° 08'.[8]

Precession and the stars of Orion's belt.

The reader is already familiar with the way the earth's axial precession causes sunrise on the vernal equinox to migrate along the band of the zodiac over a cycle of about 26,000 years. The same phenomenon also affects the declination of all visible stars, producing, in the case of the Orion constellation, very gradual but significant changes in altitude. Thus from its highest point at meridian transit (58° 11' above the southern horizon as viewed from Giza) it takes Al Nitak about 13,000 years to descend to the low point, last registered in 10,450 BC, that is immortalized in stone on the Giza plateau—i.e. 11° 08'. As another 13,000 years pass, the belt stars very slowly rise again until Al Nitak is back at 58° 11'; then during the next 13,000 years they gradually fall once more to 11° 08'. This cycle is eternal: 13,000 years up, 13,000 years down, 13,000 years up, 13,000 years down, for ever.[9]

> It's the precise configuration for 10,450 BC that we see on the Giza plateau—as though a master-architect came here in that epoch and decided to lay out a huge map on the ground using a mixture of natural and artificial features. He used the meridional course of the Nile Valley to depict the Milky Way, as it looked then. He built the three pyramids to represent the three stars, exactly as they looked then. And he put the three pyramids in exactly the same relationship to the Nile Valley as the three stars then had to the Milky Way. It was a very clever, very ambitious, very exact way to mark an epoch—to freeze a particular date into architecture if you like ...[10]

The First Time

I found the implications of the Orion correlation complicated and eerie.

On the one hand, the Great Pyramid's southern shafts 'precessionally anchored' the monument to Al Nitak and Sirius in 2475-2400 BC, dates which coincided comfortably with the epoch when Egyptologists said the monument had been built.

On the other hand the disposition of all three of the pyramids in relation to the Nile Valley eloquently signalled the much earlier date of 10,450 BC. This coincided with the controversial geological findings John West and Robert Schoch had made at Giza, which suggested the presence of a high civilization in Egypt in the eleventh millennium BC. Moreover, the disposition of the pyramids had not been arrived at by any random or accidental process but seemed to have been deliberately chosen because it marked a precessionally significant event: the lowest point, the beginning, the First Time in Orion's 13,000-year 'up' cycle.

I knew that Bauval believed this astronomical event to have been linked symbolically to the mythical First Time of Osiris—the time of the gods, when civilization had supposedly been brought into the Nile Valley—and that his reasoning for this derived from the mythology of Ancient Egypt which directly associated Osiris with the Orion constellation (and Isis with Sirius).[11]

Had the historical archetypes for Osiris and Isis actually come here in the First Time, twelve and a half thousand years ago?[12] My research into Ice Age mythologies had persuaded me that certain ideas and memories could linger in the human psyche for many millennia, transmitted from generation to generation by oral tradition. I could therefore see no prima facie reasons why the Osirian mythology, with its strange and anomalous characteristics, should not have originated as far back as 10,450 BC.

However, it was the civilization of dynastic Egypt that had elevated Osiris to the status of the high god of resurrection. That civilization was one that had few known antecedents, and none at all recognizable in the remote epoch of the eleventh millennium BC. If the Osirian mythology had been transmitted across 8000 years, therefore, then what culture had transmitted it? And had this culture also been responsible for both the astronomical alignments proven to have been manifested by the pyramids: 10,450 BC and 2450 BC?

These were among the questions I planned to put to Robert Bauval in the shadow of the pyramids. Santha and I had arranged to meet him at dawn, at the Mortuary Temple of Khafre, so that the three of us could watch the sun come up over the Sphinx.

[12] 'The Egyptians ... believed that they were a divine nation, and that they were ruled by kings who were themselves gods incarnate; their earliest kings, they asserted, were actually gods, who did not disdain to live on earth, and to go about up and down through it, and to mingle with men.' The Gods of the Egyptians, volume I, p. 3.

The pyramids and the belt stars of Orion at 10,450 BC, meridian view.

The platform

Positioned beside the eastern face of the Second Pyramid, the largely ruined Mortuary Temple was a spooky, grey, cold place to be at this hour. And as John West had indicated during our conversation at Luxor, there could be little doubt that it belonged to the same severe, imposing and unadorned style of architecture as the better-known Valley Temple. Here, at any rate, were the same enormous blocks, weighing 200 tons or more each.[13] And here too was the same intangible atmosphere of vast antiquity and awakening intelligence, as though some epiphany might be at hand. Even in its present, much despoiled state, this anonymous structure, which Egyptologists had called a Mortuary Temple, was still a place of power that seemed to draw its energy from an epoch far in the past.

I looked up at the huge mass of the Second Pyramid's eastern face just behind us in the pearl-grey dawn light. Again, as John West had pointed out, there was much to suggest that it might have been built in two different stages. The lower courses, up to a height of perhaps thirty feet, consisted largely of cyclopean limestone megaliths like those in the temples. Above this height, however, the remainder of the pyramid's gigantic core had been formed out of much smaller blocks weighing around two to three tons each (like the majority of the blocks in the Great Pyramid).

Had there been a time when a twelve-acre, thirty-foot-high megalithic platform had stood here on the 'hill of Giza', west of the Sphinx, surrounded only by nameless square and rectangular structures such as the Valley and Mortuary Temples? In other words, was it possible that the Second Pyramid's lower courses might have been built first, before the other pyramids—perhaps long before, in a much earlier age?

The cult

That question was still on my mind when Robert Bauval arrived. After exchanging a few chilly pleasantries about the weather—a cold desert wind was blowing across the plateau—I asked him, 'How do you account for the 8000-year gap in your correlations?'

'Gap?'

'Yes; shafts that seem to have been aligned in 2450 BC and a site-plan that maps star positions in 10,450 BC.'

'Actually, I see two explanations that both make some kind of sense,' said Bauval, 'and I think the answer has to be one or the other of these ... Either the pyramids were designed as a sort of "star-clock" to mark two particular epochs, 2450 and 10,450 BC, in which case we actually can't say when they were built. Or they were built up over ...'

'Hang on with that first point,' I interrupted. 'How do you mean "star-clock"? How do you mean we can't say when they were built?'

'Well, let's assume for a moment that the pyramid builders knew precession. Let's assume they were able to calculate the declination of particular star-groups backwards and forwards in time, just as we can today with computers ... Assuming they could do that then, no matter which epoch they lived in, they'd have been able to make a model of what the skies over Giza looked like in 10,450 BC or 2450 BC as required, just as we could. In other words, if they'd built the pyramids in 10,450 BC they would have had no difficulty in calculating the correct angles of inclination for the southern shafts so that they would be sighted on Al Nitak and Sirius around 2450 BC. Likewise, if they'd lived in 2450 BC they'd have had no difficulty in calculating the correct site-plan to reflect the position of Orion's Belt in 10,450 BC. Agreed?'

[13] The Mortuary Temple was excavated by von Sieglin in 1910 and was found to consist of blocks of varying sizes weighing 'between 100 and 300 tons'. Blue Guide: Egypt, p. 431.

'Agreed.'

'OK. That's one explanation. But the second explanation, which I personally favour—and which I think the geological evidence also supports—is that the whole Giza necropolis was developed and built up over an enormously long period of time. I think it's more than possible that the site was originally planned and laid out at around 10,450 BC, so that its geometry would reflect the skies as they looked then, but that the work was completed, and the shafts of the Great Pyramid aligned, around 2450 BC.'

'So you're saying that the ground-plan of the Pyramids could date back to 10,450 BC?

'I think it does. And I think that the geometrical centre of that plan was located more or less where we're standing now, right in front of the Second Pyramid ...'

I pointed out the large blocks in the lower courses of the huge edifice: 'It even looks like it was built in two stages, by two completely different cultures ...'

Bauval shrugged. 'Let's speculate ... Maybe it wasn't two different cultures, Maybe it was one culture, or cult—the cult of Osiris, perhaps. Maybe it was a very long-lived, very ancient cult dedicated to Osiris that was here in 10,450 BC and was still here in 2450 BC. Maybe what happened was that some of the ways that this cult did things changed over time. Maybe they used huge blocks in 10,450 BC and smaller blocks in 2450 BC ... It seems to me there's a lot here that supports this notion, a lot that says "very ancient cult", a lot of evidence that has just never been investigated ...'

'For example?'

'Well, obviously the astronomical alignments of the site. I've been among the first to start looking into those properly. And the geology: the work that John West and Robert Schoch have been involved in at the Sphinx. Here are two sciences—both hard, empirical, evidence-driven sciences—that have never been applied to these problems before. But now that we have started to apply them, we're beginning to get a whole new reading on the antiquity of the necropolis. And I honestly think we've just scratched the surface and that much more will emerge from the geology and the astronomy in the future. In addition, nobody's yet made a really detailed study of the Pyramid Texts from anything other than the so-called "anthropological" perspective, which means a preconceived notion that the priests of Heliopolis were a bunch of half-civilized witch-doctors who wanted to live for ever ... Actually they did want to live for ever but they certainly weren't witch-doctors ... They were highly civilized, highly initiated men and they were, in their own fashion, scientists, as we can judge from their works. Therefore I suggest that it's as scientific or at least quasi-scientific documents that the Pyramid Texts need to be read, not as mumbo-jumbo. I'm already satisfied that they respond to precessional astronomy. There may be other keys too: mathematics, geometry—particularly geometry ... Symbolism ... What's needed is a multi-disciplinary approach to understanding the Pyramid Texts ... and to understanding the pyramids themselves. Astronomers, mathematicians, geologists, engineers, architects, even philosophers to deal with the symbolism—everybody who can bring a fresh eye and fresh skills to bear on these very important problems should be encouraged to do so.'

'Why do you feel the problems are so important?'

'Because they have a colossal bearing on our understanding of the past of our own species. The very careful, very precise site-planning and setting-out that appears to have been done here in 10,450 BC could only have been the work of a highly-evolved, probably technological civilization. ...'

'Whereas no such civilization is supposed to have existed anywhere on earth in that epoch ...'

'Exactly. It was the Stone Age. Human society was supposed to have been at a very primitive level, with our ancestors wearing skins, sheltering in caves, following a hunting-gathering way of life and so on and so forth. So its rather unsettling to discover that civilized people seem to have been present in Giza in 10,450 BC, who understood the obscure science of precession extremely well, who had the technical capacity to work out that they were witnessing the lowest point in Orion's precessional cycle—and thus the beginning of the constellation's 13,000 year upwards journey—and who set out to create a permanent memorial of that moment here on the plateau. By putting Orion's Belt on the ground in the way they did they knew that they were freezing a very specific moment in time.'

A perverse thought occurred to me: 'How can we be so sure that the moment that they were freezing was 10,450 BC? After all, Orion's Belt takes up that same configuration in the southern sky, west of the Milky Way at 11-plus degrees above the horizon, once every 26,000 years. So why shouldn't they have been immortalizing 36,450 BC or even the precessional cycle that began 26,000 years before that?'

Robert was clearly ready for this question. 'Some ancient records do suggest that Egyptian civilization had roots going back almost 40,000 years,' he mused, 'like that strange report in Herodotus that talks about the sun rising where it once set and setting where it once rose ...'

'Which is also a precessional metaphor ...'

'Yes. Precession again. Most peculiar the way it always keeps cropping up ... At any rate, you're right, they could have been marking the beginning of the previous precessional cycle ...'

'But do you think they were?'

'No. I think 10,450 BC is the more likely date. It's more within the range of what we know about the evolution of homo sapiens. And although it still leaves a lot of years to account for before the sudden emergence of dynastic Egypt around 3000 BC, it isn't too long a period ...'

'Too long a period for what?'

'It's the answer to your question about the 8000-year gap between the alignment of the site and the alignment of the shafts. Eight thousand years is a very long time but it isn't too long for a dedicated highly motivated cult to have preserved and nurtured and faithfully passed on the high-knowledge of the people who invented this place in 10,450 BC.'[14]

The machine

How high was the knowledge of those prehistoric inventors?

'They knew their epochs,' said Bauval, 'and the clock that they used was the natural clock of the stars. Their working language was precessional astronomy and these monuments express that language in a very clear, unambiguous, scientific manner. They were also highly skilled surveyors—I mean the people who originally prepared the site and laid out the orientations for the pyramids—because they worked to an exacting geometry and because they knew how to align the base-platforms, or whatever it was they built, perfectly to the cardinal points.'

[14] Just as any great Christian cathedral, however modern (for example the twentieth-century gothic cathedral on Nob Hill in San Francisco), expresses the thinking, symbolism and iconography of the Judaeo-Christian 'cult' which has roots at least 4000 years old, it should not be impossible to imagine a cult enduring for 8000 years in Ancient Egypt and thus linking the epoch of 10450 BC to 2,450 BC. The completion of the pyramids at that time, like the completion of a cathedral today, would therefore have resulted in structures that expressed extremely old ideas. Plentiful evidence exists within Ancient Egyptian tradition which seems to attest to the existence and preservation of such ancient ideas. For example, 'King Nefer-hetep [XIIIth Dynasty] was a loyal worshipper of Osiris and hearing that his Temple [at Abydos] was in ruins, and that a new statue of the god was required, he went to the temple of Ra-Atum at Heliopolis, and consulted the books in the library there, so that he might learn how to make a statue of Osiris which should be like that which had existed in the beginning of the world ...' (Osiris and the Egyptian Resurrection, volume II, p. 14). Also Sacred Science; pp. 103-4, explains that the construction of temples in the Ptolemaic and late periods of Egyptian history continued to obey very ancient specifications: 'All the plans always refer to a divine book; thus the temple of Edfu was rebuilt under the Ptolemies according to the book of foundation composed by Imhotep, a book descended from heaven to the north of Memphis. The temple of Dendera followed a plan recorded in ancient writings dating from the Companions of Horus.'

'Do you think they also knew that they were marking out the site of the Great Pyramid on latitude 30° North?'

Bauval laughed: I'm certain they knew. I think they knew everything about the shape of the earth. They knew their astronomy. They had a good understanding of the solar system and of celestial mechanics. They were also incredibly accurate and incredibly precise in everything they did. So, all in all, I don't think anything really happened here by chance—at least not between 10,450 and 2450 BC. I get the feeling that everything was planned, intended, carefully worked out ... Indeed I get the feeling that they were fulfilling a long-term objective—some kind of purpose, if you like, and that they brought this to fruition in the third millennium BC ...

'In the form of the fully built pyramids which they then precessionally anchored to Al Nitak and to Sirius at the time of completion?'

'Yes. And also, I think, in the form of the Pyramid Texts. My guess is that the Pyramid Texts are part of the puzzle.'

'The software to the Pyramids' hardware?'

'Quite possibly. Why not? At any rate it's certain that there's a connection. I think what it means is that if we're going to decode the pyramids properly then we're going to have to use the Texts ...'

'What's your guess?' I asked Bauval. 'What do you think the purpose of the pyramid builders really might have been?'

'They didn't do it because they wanted an eternal tomb,' he replied firmly. 'In my view, they had no doubts at all that they would eternally live. They did it—whoever did it—they have transmitted the power of their ideas through something that is to all intents and purposes eternal. They succeeded in creating a force that is functional in itself, provided you understand it, and that force is the questions it challenges you to ask. My guess is that they knew the human mind to perfection. They knew the game of ritual ... Right? I'm serious. They knew what they were doing. They knew that they could initiate people far ahead in the future into their way of thinking even though they couldn't be there themselves. They knew that they could do this by creating an eternal machine, the function of which was to generate questions.'

I suppose that I must have looked puzzled.

'The machine is the pyramids!' Bauval exclaimed, 'the whole of the Giza necropolis really. And look at us. What are we doing? We're asking questions. We're standing out here, shivering, at an ungodly hour, watching the sun come up, and we're asking questions, lots and lots of questions just as we've been programmed to do. We're in the hands of real magicians here, and real magicians know that with symbols—with the right symbols, with the right questions—they can lead you into initiating yourself. Provided, that is, you are a person who asks questions. And, if you are, then the minute you start asking questions about the pyramids you begin to stumble into a whole series of answers which lead you to other questions, and then more answers until finally you initiate yourself ...'

'Sow the seed ...'

'Yes. They were sowing the seed. Believe me, they were magicians, and they knew the power of ideas ... They knew how to set ideas growing and developing in people's minds. And if you start with such ideas, and follow the process of reasoning like I did, you arrive at things like Orion, and 10,450 BC. In short, this is a process that works on its own. When it enters, when it settles into the subconscious, it is a self-willing conversion. Once it's there you can't even resist it ...'

'You're talking as though this Giza cult, whatever it was—revolving around precession, and geometry, and the pyramids, and the Pyramid Texts—you're talking as though it still exists.'

'In a sense it does still exist,' Robert replied. 'Even if the driver is no longer at the wheel, the Giza necropolis is still a machine that was designed to provoke questions.' He paused and pointed up to the summit of the Great Pyramid where Santha and I had climbed, at dead of night, nine months previously. 'Look at its power,' he continued. 'Five thousand years on it still gets you. It involves you whether you like it or not ... It forces you into a process of thinking ... forces you to learn. The minute you ask a question about it you've asked a question about engineering, you've asked a question about geometry, you've asked a question about astronomy. So it forces you to learn about engineering and geometry and astronomy, and gradually you begin to realize how sophisticated it is, how incredibly clever and skilful and knowledgeable its builders must have been, which forces you to ask questions about mankind, about human history, eventually about yourself too. You want to find out. This is the power of the thing.'

The second signature

As Robert, Santha and I sat out on the Giza plateau that cold December morning at the end of 1993, we watched the winter sun, now very close to solstice, rising over the right shoulder of the Sphinx, almost as far south of east as it would travel on its yearly journey before turning north again.

The Sphinx was an equinoctial marker, with its gaze directed precisely at the point of sunrise on the vernal equinox. Was it, too, part of the Giza 'grand plan'?

I reminded myself that in any epoch, and at any period of history or prehistory, the Sphinx's due east gaze would always have been sighted on the equinoctial rising of the sun, at both the vernal and the autumnal equinoxes. As the reader will recall from Part V, however, it was the vernal equinox that was considered by ancient man to be the marker of the astronomical age. In the words of Santillana and von Dechend:

> The constellation that rose in the east, just before the sun, marked the 'place' where the sun rested ... It was known as the sun's 'carrier' and the vernal equinox was recognised as the fiducial point of the 'system' determining the first degree of the sun's yearly cycle ...'[15]

Why should an equinoctial marker have been made in the shape of a giant lion?

In our own lifetimes, the epoch of AD 2000, a more suitable shape for such a marker—should anyone wish to build one—would be a representation of a fish. This is because the sun on the vernal equinox rises against the stellar background of Pisces, as it has done for approximately the last 2000 years. The astronomical Age of Pisces began around the time of Christ.[16] Readers must judge for themselves whether it is a coincidence that the principal symbol used for Christ by the very early Christians was not the cross but the fish.[17]

During the preceding age, which broadly-speaking encompassed the first and second millennia BC, it was the constellation of Aries—the Ram—which had the honour of carrying the sun on the vernal equinox. Again, readers must judge whether it is a coincidence that the religious iconography of that epoch was predominantly ram-oriented.[18] Is it a coincidence, for example, that Yahweh, God of Old Testament Israel, provided a ram as a substitute for Abraham's offered sacrifice of his son Isaac?[19] (Abraham and Isaac are assumed by biblical scholars and archaeologists to have lived during the early second millennium BC[20]). Is it likewise coincidental that rams, in one context or another, are referred to in almost every book of the Old Testament (entirely composed during the Age of Aries) but in not a single book of the New Testament?[21] And is it an accident that the advent of the Age of Aries, shortly before the beginning of the second millennium BC, was accompanied in Ancient Egypt by an upsurge in the worship of the god Amon whose symbol was a ram with curled horns?[22] Work on the principal sanctuary of Amon—the Temple of Karnak at Luxor in upper Egypt—was begun at around 2000 BC[23] and, as those who have visited that temple will recall, its principal icons are rams, long rows of which guard its entrances.

The immediate predecessor to the Age of Aries was the Age of Taurus—

the Bull—which spanned the period between 4380 and 2200 BC.[24] It was during this precessional epoch, when the sun on the vernal equinox rose in the constellation of Taurus, that the Bull-cult of Minoan Crete flourished.[25] And during this epoch, too, the civilization of dynastic Egypt burst upon the historical scene, fully formed, apparently without antecedents. Readers must judge whether it is a coincidence that Egyptians at the very beginning of the dynastic period were already venerating the Apis and Mnevis Bulls—the former being considered a theophany of the god Osiris and the latter, the sacred animal of Heliopolis, a theophany of the god Ra.[26]

Why should an equinoctial marker have been made in the form of a lion?

I looked down the slope of the Giza plateau towards the great leonine body of the Sphinx.

Khafre, the Fourth Dynasty pharaoh believed by Egyptologists to have carved the monument out of bedrock around 2500 BC, had been a monarch of the Age of Taurus. For almost 1800 years before his reign, and more than 300 years after it, the sun on the vernal equinox rose unfailingly in the constellation of the Bull. It follows that if a monarch at such a time had set out to create an equinoctial marker at Giza, he would have had every reason to have it carved in the form of a bull, and none whatsoever to have it carved in the form of a lion. Indeed, and it was obvious, there was only one epoch when the celestial symbolism of a leonine equinoctial marker would have been appropriate. That epoch was, of course, the Age of Leo, from 10,970 to 8810 BC.[27]

Why, therefore, should an equinoctial marker have been made in the shape of a lion? Because it was made during the Age of Leo when the sun on the vernal equinox rose against the stellar background of the constellation of the Lion, thus marking the coordinates of a precessional epoch that would not experience its ‘Great Return’ for another 26,000 years.

Around 10,450 BC the three stars of Orion’s Belt reached the lowest point in their precessional cycle: west of the Milky Way, 11° 08’ above the southern horizon at meridian transit. On the ground west of the Nile, this event was frozen into architecture in the shape of the three pyramids of Giza. Their layout formed the signature of an unmistakable epoch of precessional time.

Around 10,450 BC, the sun on the vernal equinox rose in the constellation of Leo. On the ground at Giza, this event was frozen into architecture in the shape of the Sphinx, a gigantic, leonine, equinoctial marker which, like the second signature on an official document, could be taken as a confirmation of authenticity.

The eleventh millennium BC, in other words, soon after the 'Mill of Heaven' broke, shifting sunrise on the spring equinox from Virgo into the constellation of Leo, was the only epoch in which the due east facing Sphinx would have manifested exactly the right symbolic alignment on exactly the right day—watching the vernal sun rising in the dawn sky against the background of his own celestial counterpart ...

Looking due east at dawn on the vernal equinox in 10,450 BC. The Sphinx and the constellation of Leo.

Forcing the question

'It can't be a coincidence that such a perfect alignment of the terrestrial and the celestial occurs at around 10,450 BC,' said Robert. 'In fact I don't think coincidence is any longer an issue. To me the real question is why? Why was it done? Why did they go to such lengths to make this enormous statement about the eleventh millennium BC?'

'Obviously because it was an important time for them,' suggested Santha.

'It must have been very, very important. You don't do something like this, create a series of vast precessional markers like these, carve a Sphinx, put up three pyramids weighing almost 15 million tons, unless you have some hugely important reason. So the question is: what was that reason? They've forced this question by making such a strong, imperative statement about 10,450 BC. Really, they've forced the question. They want to draw our attention to 10,450 BC and it's up to us to work out why.'

We fell silent, for a long while as the sun climbed the sky south-east of the Great Sphinx.

Part VIII

Conclusion

Where's the Body?

Chapter 50

Not a Needle in a Haystack

When I was only a few months into this investigation, my research assistant sent me a fifteen-page letter explaining why he had decided to resign. At that stage I hadn't yet begun to put the pieces of the puzzle together and I was working more on hunches than on hard evidence. I was captivated by all the mysteries, anomalies, anachronisms and puzzles, and wanted to learn as much about them as I could. My researcher, meanwhile, had been looking into the long, slow processes by which some known civilizations had come into global history.

It transpired that, in his opinion, certain significant economic, climatic, topographical and geographical preconditions had to be met before a civilization could evolve:

> So if you are looking for a hitherto undiscovered civilization of great originators who made it on their own, separate from any of the ones we already know, you are not looking for a needle in a haystack. You are looking for something more like a city in its hinterland. What you are looking for is a vast region which occupied a land area at least a couple of thousand miles across. This is a landmass as big as the Gulf of Mexico, or twice the size of Madagascar. It would have had major mountain ranges, huge river systems and a Mediterranean to sub-tropical climate which was buffered by its latitude from the adverse effects of short-term climatic cooling. It would have needed this relatively undisturbed climate to last for around ten thousand years ... Then the population of several hundred thousand sophisticated people, we are to believe, suddenly vanished, together with their homeland, leaving very little physical trace, with only a few surviving individuals who were shrewd enough to see the end coming, wealthy enough and in the right place, with the resources they needed to be able to do something about escaping the cataclysm.

So there I was without a researcher. My proposition was a priori impossible. There could be no lost advanced civilization because a landmass big enough to support such a civilization was too big to lose.

Geophysical impossibilities

The problem was a serious one and it continued to nag at the back of my mind all the way through my own research and travels. It was, indeed, this exact problem, more than any other, which had scuppered Plato's Atlantis as a serious proposition for scholars. As one critic of the lost continent theory put it:

> There never was an Atlantic landbridge since the arrival of man in the world; there is no sunken landmass in the Atlantic: the Atlantic Ocean must have existed in its present form for at least a million years. In fact it is a geophysical impossibility for > an Atlantis of Plato's dimensions to have existed in the Atlantic ...[1]

The adamant and assertive tone, I had long ago learnt, was entirely justified. Modern oceanographers had thoroughly mapped the floor of the Atlantic Ocean and there was definitely no lost continent lurking there.

But if the evidence that I was gathering did represent the fingerprints of a vanished civilization, a continent had to have got lost somewhere,

So where? For a while I used the obvious working hypothesis that it might be under some other ocean. The Pacific was very big but the Indian Ocean looked more promising because it was located relatively close to the Middle East's Fertile Crescent, where several of the earliest known historical civilizations had emerged with extreme suddenness at around 3000 BC. I had plans to go chasing rumours of ancient pyramids in the Maldive Islands and along the Somali coast of East Africa to see if I could pick up any clues of a lost paradise of antiquity. I thought I might even work in a trip to the Seychelles.

The problem was the oceanographers again. The floor of the Indian Ocean, too, had been mapped and it didn't conceal any lost continents. Ditto every other ocean and every other sea. There seemed to be nowhere now under water into which a landmass big enough to have nurtured a high civilization could have vanished.

Yet, as my research continued, the evidence kept mounting that precisely such a civilization had once existed. I began to suspect that it must have been a maritime civilization: a nation of navigators. In support of this hypothesis, among other anomalies, were the remarkable ancient maps of the world, the 'Pyramid Boats' of Egypt, the traces of advanced astronomical knowledge in the astonishing calendar system of the Maya, and the legends of seafaring gods like Quetzalcoatl and Viracocha.

A nation of navigators, then. And a nation of builders, too: Tiahuanaco builders, Teotihuacan builders, pyramid builders, Sphinx builders, builders who could lift and position 200-ton blocks of limestone with apparent ease, builders who could align vast monuments to the cardinal points with uncanny accuracy. Whoever they were, these builders appeared to have left their characteristic fingerprints all over the world in the form of cyclopean polygonal masonry, site layouts involving astronomical alignments, mathematical and geodetic puzzles, and myths about gods in human form. But a civilization advanced enough to build like that—rich enough, sufficiently well organized and mature to have explored and mapped the world from pole to pole, a civilization smart enough to have calculated the dimensions of the earth—simply could not have evolved on an insignificant landmass. Its homeland, as my researcher had rightly pointed out, must have been blessed with major mountain ranges, huge river systems and a congenial climate, and with many other obvious environmental prerequisites for the development of an advanced and prosperous economy: good agricultural lands, mineral resources, forests, and so on.

So where could such a landmass have been located, if not under any of the world's oceans?

Library angels

Where could it have been located and when might it have disappeared? And if it had disappeared (and no other explanation would do) then how, why, and under what circumstances?

Seriously, how do you lose a continent?

Commonsense suggested that the answer had to lie in a cataclysm of some kind, a planetary disaster capable of wiping out almost all physical traces of a large civilization. But if so, why were there no records of such a cataclysm? Or perhaps there were.

As my research progressed I studied many of the great myths of flood, fire, earthquakes and ice handed down from generation to generation around the world. We saw in Part IV that it was difficult to resist the conclusion that the myths were describing real geological and climatic events, quite possibly the different local effects of the same events in all cases.

During the short history of mankind's presence on this planet, I found that there was only one known and documented catastrophe that fitted the bill: the dramatic and deadly meltdown of the last Ice Age between 15000 and 8000 BC. Moreover, as was more obviously the case with architectural relics like Teotihuacan and the Egyptian pyramids, many of the relevant myths appeared to have been designed to serve as vehicles for encrypted scientific information, again an indication of what I was coming to think of as 'the fingerprints of the gods'.

What I had become sensitized to, although I did not properly realize its implications at the time, was the possibility that a strong connection might exist between the collapsing chaos of the Ice Age and the disappearance of an archaic civilization which had been the stuff of legend for millennia.

It was at this moment exactly that the library angels intervened ...

The missing piece of the puzzle

The novelist Arthur Koestler, who had a great interest in synchronicity, coined the term 'library angel' to describe the unknown agency responsible for the lucky breaks researchers sometimes get which lead to exactly the right information being placed in their hands at exactly the right moment.[2]

At exactly the right moment, one of those lucky breaks came my way. The moment was the summer of 1993. I was at a low ebb physically and spiritually after months of hard travel, and the geophysical impossibility of actually losing a continent-sized landmass was beginning to undermine my confidence in the strength of my findings. It was then that I received a letter from the town of Nanaimo in British Columbia, Canada. The letter referred to my previous book The Sign and the Seal, in which I had made passing mention of the Atlantis theory and of traditions of civilizing heroes who had been 'saved from water':

> 19 July 1993
> Dear Mr. Hancock,
> After 17 years of research into the fate of Atlantis, my wife and I have finished a manuscript entitled When the Sky Fell. Our frustration is that despite positive feedback about the book's approach from the few publishers who have seen it, the mere mention of Atlantis closes minds.[3] In The Sign and the Seal you write of 'a tradition of secret wisdom started by the survivors of a flood ...' Our work explores sites where some survivors might have relocated. High altitude, fresh-water lakes made ideal post-deluge bases for the survivors of Atlantis. Lake Titicaca and Lake Tana [in Ethiopia, where much of The Sign and the Seal was set] fit the climatic criteria. Their stable environment provided the raw materials for restarting agriculture.
> We have taken the liberty of enclosing an outline of When the Sky Fell. If you are interested we will be pleased to send you a copy of the manuscript.
> Sincerely,
> Rand Flem-Ath

I turned to the enclosure and there, in the first few paragraphs, found the missing piece of the jigsaw puzzle I had been looking for. It meshed perfectly with the ancient global maps I had studied—maps which accurately depicted the subglacial topography of the continent of Antarctica (see Part I). It made perfect sense of all the great worldwide myths of cataclysm and planetary disaster, with their differing climatic effects. It explained the enigma of the huge numbers of apparently 'flash-frozen' mammoths in northern Siberia and Alaska, and the 90-foot tall fruit trees locked in the permafrost deep inside the Arctic Circle at a latitude where nothing now grows. It provided a solution to the problem of the extreme suddenness with which the last Ice Age in the northern hemisphere melted down after 15,000 BC. It also solved the mystery of the exceptional worldwide volcanic activity that accompanied the meltdown. It answered the question, 'How do you lose a continent?' And it was solidly based in Charles Hapgood's theory of 'earth-crust displacement'—a radical geological hypothesis with which I was already familiar:

---

[3] When the Sky Fell, with an Introduction by Colin Wilson and Afterword by John Anthony West, is published by Stoddart, Canada, 1995.

> Antarctica is our least understood continent [wrote the Flem-Aths in their outline]. Most of us assume that this immense island has been ice-bound for millions of years. But new discoveries prove that parts of Antarctica were free of ice thousands of years ago, recent history by the geological clock. The theory of ‘earth-crust displacement’ explains the mysterious surge and ebb of Antarctica’s vast ice sheet.

What the Canadian researchers were referring to was Hapgood’s suggestion that until the end of the last Ice Age—say the eleventh millennium BC—the landmass of Antarctica had been positioned some 2000 miles further north (at a congenial and temperate latitude) and that it had been moved to its present position inside the Antarctic Circle as a result of a massive displacement of the earth’s crust.[4] This displacement, the Flem-Aths continued, had > also left other evidence of its deadly visit in a ring of death around the globe. All the continents that experienced rapid and massive extinctions of animal species (notably the Americas and Siberia) underwent a massive change in their latitudes ...

> The consequences of a displacement are monumental. The earth’s crust ripples over its interior and the world is shaken by incredible quakes and floods. The sky appears to fall as continents groan and shift position. Deep in the ocean, earthquakes generate massive tidal waves which crash against coastlines, flooding them. Some lands shift to warmer climes, while others, propelled into polar zones, suffer the direst of winters. Melting ice caps raise the ocean’s level higher and higher. All living things must adapt, migrate or die ...
> If the horror of an earth-crust displacement were to be visited upon today’s interdependent world the progress of thousands of years of civilization would be torn away from our planet like a fine cobweb. Those who live near high mountains might escape the global tidal waves, but they would be forced to leave behind, in the lowlands, the slowly constructed fruits of civilization. Only among the merchant marine and navies of the world might some evidence of civilization remain. The rusting hulls of ships and submarines would eventually perish but the valuable maps that are housed in them would be saved by survivors, perhaps for hundreds, even thousands of years. Until once again mankind could use them to sail the World Ocean in search of lost lands ...

As I read these words I remembered Charles Hapgood’s account of how the layer of the earth that geologists call the lithosphere—the thin but rigid outer crust of the planet—could at times be displaced, moving in one piece ‘over the soft inner body, much as the skin of an orange, if it were loose, might shift over the inner part of the orange all in one piece.’[5]

Thus far, I felt I was on familiar ground. But then the Canadian researchers made two vital connections which I had missed.

Section through the earth. The crustal displacement theory envisages the possibility of periodic displacements of the entire crust in one piece. Often less than 30 miles thick, the crust rests on a lubricating layer known as the asthenosphere.

Gravitational influences

The first of these was the possibility that gravitational influences (as well as the variations in the earth's orbital geometry discussed in Part V) might, through the mechanism of earth-crust displacement, play a role in the onset and decline of Ice Ages:

> When the naturalist and geologist Louis Agassiz presented the idea of ice ages to the scientific community in 1837 he was met with great skepticism. However, as evidence slowly gathered in his favour, the skeptics were forced to accept that the earth had indeed been gripped by deadly winters. But the trigger of these paralysing ice ages remained a puzzle. It was not until 1976 that solid evidence existed to establish the timing of ice ages. The explanation was found in various astronomical features of the earth's orbit and the tilt of the axis. Astronomical factors have clearly played a role in the timing of glacial epochs. But this is only part of the problem. Of equal importance is the geography of glaciation. It is here that the theory of earth-crust displacement plays its role in unravelling the

> Albert Einstein investigated the possibility that the weight of the ice-caps, which are not symmetrically distributed about the pole, might cause such a displacement. Einstein wrote: ‘The earth’s rotation acts on these unsymmetrically deposited masses, and produces centrifugal momentum that is transmitted to the rigid crust of the earth. The constantly increasing centrifugal momentum produced this way will, when it reaches a certain point, produce a movement of the earth’s crust over the earth’s body, and this will displace the polar regions towards the equator.
> When Einstein wrote these words [1953] the astronomical causes of ice ages were not fully appreciated. When the shape of the earth’s orbit deviates from a perfect circle by more than one per cent, the gravitational influence of the sun increases, exercising more pull on the planet and its massive ice sheets. Their ponderous weight pushes against the crust and this immense pressure, combined with the greater incline in the earth’s tilt [another changing factor of the orbital geometry] forces the crust to shift ...

The connection with the onset and decline of ice ages?

Very straightforward.

In a displacement, those parts of the earth’s crust which are situated at the North and South Poles (and which are therefore as completely glaciated as Antarctica is today) shift suddenly into warmer latitudes and begin to melt with extraordinary rapidity. Conversely, land that has hitherto been located at warmer latitudes is shifted equally suddenly into the polar zones, suffers a devastating climate change, and begins to vanish under a rapidly expanding ice-cap.

In other words, when huge parts of northern Europe and north America were heavily glaciated in what we think of as the last Ice Age, it was not because of some mysterious slow-acting climatic factor, but rather because those areas of land were then situated much closer to the North Pole than they are today. Similarly, when the Wisconsin and Wurm glaciations described in Part IV began to go into their meltdown at around 15,000 BC the trigger was not global climate change but a shift of the ice-caps into warmer latitudes ...

In other words: there is an Ice Age going on right now—inside the Arctic Circle and in Antarctica.

The lost continent

The second connection the Flem-Aths made followed logically from the first: if there was such a recurrent, cyclical geological phenomenon as earth-crust displacement, and if the last displacement had shifted the enormous landmass we call Antarctica out of temperate latitudes and into the Antarctic Circle, it was possible that the substantial remains of a lost civilization of remote antiquity might today be lying under two miles of ice at the South Pole.

It was suddenly clear to me how a continent-sized landmass, which had been the home of a large and prosperous society for thousands of years, could indeed get lost almost without trace. As the Flem-Aths concluded: ‘It is to icy Antarctica that we look to find answers to the very roots of civilization—answers which may yet be preserved in the frozen depths of the forgotten island continent.’

I hauled out my researcher’s resignation letter from the files and started to check off his preconditions for the emergence of an advanced civilization. He wanted ‘major mountain ranges’. He wanted ‘huge river systems’. He wanted ‘a vast region which occupied a land area at least a couple of thousand miles across’. He also wanted a stable, congenial climate for ten thousand years, to allow time for a developed culture to evolve.

Antarctica is by no means a needle in a haystack. It’s a huge landmass, much, much bigger than the Gulf of Mexico, about seven times larger than Madagascar—indeed roughly the size of the continental USA. Moreover, as seismic surveys have demonstrated, there are major mountain ranges in Antarctica. And as several of the ancient maps seem to prove, unknown prehistoric cartographers, who possessed a scientific understanding of latitude and longitude, depicted these mountain ranges before they disappeared beneath the ice-cap that covers them today. These same ancient maps also show ‘huge river systems’ flowing down from the mountains, watering the extensive valleys and plains below and running into the surrounding ocean. And these rivers, as I already knew from the Ross Sea cores,[6] had left physical evidence of their presence in the composition of ocean bottom sediments.

Last but not least, I noted that the earth-crust displacement theory did not conflict with the requirement for 10,000 years of stable climate. Prior to the supposed sudden shift of the crust, at around the end of the last Ice Age in the northern hemisphere, the climate of Antarctica would have been stable, perhaps for a great deal longer than 10,000 years. And if the theory was right in suggesting that Antarctica’s latitude in that epoch had been about 2000 miles (30 degrees of arc) further north than it is today, the northernmost parts of it would have been situated in the vicinity of latitude 30° South and would, indeed, have enjoyed a Mediterranean to sub-tropical climate.

Had the earth’s crust really shifted? And could the ruins of a lost civilization really lie beneath the ice of the southern continent?

As we see in the following chapters, it might have ... and they could.

Chapter 51

The Hammer and the Pendulum

Although beyond the scope of this book, a detailed exposition of the earth-crust displacement theory is to be found in Rand and Rose Flem-Ath's When the Sky Fell (published by Stoddart, Canada, 1995).

As noted, this geological theory was formulated by Professor Charles Hapgood and supported by Albert Einstein. In brief, what it suggests is a complete slippage of our planet's thirty-mile-thick lithosphere over its nearly 8000-mile-thick central core, forcing large parts of the western hemisphere southward towards the equator and thence towards the Antarctic Circle. This movement is not seen as taking place along a due north-south meridian but on a swivelling course—pivoting, as it were, around the central plains of what is now the United States. The result is that the north-eastern segment of North America (in which the North Pole was formerly located in Hudson's Bay) is dragged southwards out of the Arctic Circle and into more temperate latitudes while at the same time the north-western segment (Alaska and the Yukon) swivels northwards into the Arctic Circle along with large parts of northern Siberia.

In the southern hemisphere, Hapgood's model shows the landmass that we now call Antarctica, much of which was previously at temperate or even warm latitudes, being shifted in its entirety inside the Antarctic Circle. The overall movement is seen as having been in the region of 30 degrees (approximately 2000 miles) and as having been concentrated, in the main, between the years 14,500 BC and 12,500 BC—but with massive aftershocks on a planetary scale continuing at widely-separated intervals down to about 9500 BC.

According to the earth-crust displacement theory, large parts of Antarctica were positioned outside the Antarctic circle prior to 15,000 BC and thus could have been inhabited, with a climate and resources suitable for the development of civilization. A cataclysmic slippage of the crust then shifted the continent to the position it occupies today—dead centre within the Antarctic circle.

Suppose that, before the displacement of the earth's crust, a great civilization had grown up in Antarctica, when much of it was located at green and pleasant latitudes? If so, that civilization might easily have been destroyed by the effects of the displacement: the tidal waves, the hurricane-force winds and electric storms, the volcanic eruptions as seismic faults split open all around the planet, the darkened skies, and the remorselessly expanding ice-cap. Moreover, as the millennia passed, the ruins left behind—the cities, the monuments, the great libraries, and the engineering works of the destroyed civilization—would have been ever more deeply buried beneath the mantle of ice.

Little wonder, if the earth-crust displacement theory is correct, that all that can be found today, scattered around the world, are the tantalizing fingerprints of the gods. These would be the traces, the echoes of the works and deeds, the much misunderstood teachings and the geometrical edifices left behind by the few survivors of Antarctica's former civilization who had made it across the turbulent oceans in great ships and settled themselves in faraway lands: in the Nile Valley, for example (or perhaps, first, around Lake Tana at the headwaters of the Blue Nile), and in the Valley of Mexico, and near Lake Titicaca in the Andes—and no doubt in several other places as well ...

Here and there around the globe, in other words, the fingerprints of a lost civilization remain faintly visible. The body is out of sight, buried under two miles of Antarctic ice and almost as inaccessible to archaeologists as if it were located on the dark side of the moon.

Fact?

Or fiction?

Possibility?

Or impossibility?

Is it a geophysical possibility or a geophysical impossibility that Antarctica, the world's fifth-largest continent (with a surface area of almost six million square miles) could (a) previously have been located in a more temperate zone and (b) have been shifted out of that zone and into the Antarctic Circle within the last 20,000 years?

Is Antarctica movable?

A lifeless polar desert

'Continental drift' and/or 'plate-tectonics' are key terms used to describe an important geological theory that has become increasingly well understood by the general public since the 1950s. It is unnecessary to go into the basic mechanisms here. But most of us are aware that the continents in some way 'float around', relocate and change position on the earth's surface. Common sense confirms this: if you take a look at a map of the west coast of Africa and the east coast of South America it's pretty obvious that these two landmasses were once joined. The time-scale according to which continental drift operates is, however, immense: continents can typically be expected to float apart (or together) at a rate of no more than 2000 miles every 200 million years or so: in other words, very, very slowly.[1]

Plate-tectonics and Charles Hapgood's earth-crust displacement theory are by no means mutually contradictory. Hapgood envisaged that both could occur: that the earth's crust did indeed exhibit continental drift as the geologists claimed—almost imperceptibly, over hundreds of millions of years—but that it also occasionally experienced very rapid one-piece displacements which had no effect on the relationships between individual landmasses but which thrust entire continents (or parts of them) into and out of the planet's two fixed polar zones (the perennially cold and icy regions surrounding the North and South Poles of the axis of spin).

Continental drift?

Earth-crust displacement?

Both?

Some other cause?

I honestly don't know. Nevertheless, the simple facts about Antarctica are really strange and difficult to explain without invoking some notion of sudden, catastrophic and geologically recent change.

Before reviewing a few of these facts, let us remind ourselves that we are referring to a landmass today oriented by the curvature of the earth so that the sun never rises on it during the six winter months and never sets during the six summer months (but rather, as viewed from the Pole, remains low above the horizon, appearing to transcribe a circular path around the sky during each twenty-four hours of daylight).

Antarctica is also by far the world's coldest continent, where temperatures on the polar plain can fall as low as minus 89.2 degrees centigrade. Although the coastal areas are slightly warmer (minus 60 degrees centigrade) and shelter huge numbers of seabird rookeries, there are no native land mammals and there is only a small community of cold-tolerant plants capable of surviving lengthy winter periods of total or near-total darkness. The Encyclopaedia Britannica lists these plants laconically: 'Lichens, mosses and liverworts, moulds, yeasts, other fungi, algae and bacteria ...'[2]

In other words, although magnificent to behold in the long-drawn-out antipodean dawn, Antarctica is a freezing, unforgiving, almost lifeless polar desert, as it has been throughout mankind's entire 5000-year 'historical' period.

Was it always so?

Discover The World Of Science Magazine,* February 1993, page 17: 'Some 260 million years ago, during the Permian period, deciduous trees adapted to a warm climate grew in Antarctica. This is the conclusion palaeobotanists are drawing from a stand of fossilized tree stumps discovered at an altitude of 7000 feet on Mount Achernar in the Transantarctic mountains. The site is at 84° 22' south, some 500 miles north of the South Pole.

' "The interesting thing about this find is that it's really the only forest, living or fossil, that's been found at 80 or 85 degrees latitude," says Ohio State University palaeobotanist Edith Taylor, who has studied the fossil trees. "The first thing we palaeobotanists do is look for something in the modern records that is comparable, and there are no forests growing at that latitude today. We can go to the tropics and find trees growing in a warm environment, but we can't find trees growing in a warm environment with the light regime these trees had: 24 hours of light in the summer and 24 hours of dark in the winter." Exhibit 2

Geologists have found no evidence of any glaciation having been present anywhere on the Antarctic continent prior to the Eocene (about 60 million years ago.)[4] And if we go as far back as the Cambrian (c. 550 million years ago) we find irrefutable evidence of a warm sea stretching nearly or right across Antarctica, in the form of thick limestones rich in reef-building Archaeocyathidae: 'Millions of years later, when these marine formations had appeared above the sea, warm climates brought forth a luxuriant vegetation in Antarctica. Thus Sir Ernest Shackleton found coal beds within 200 miles of the South Pole, and later, during the Byrd expedition of 1935, geologists made a rich discovery of fossils on the lofty sides of Mount Weaver, in latitude 86° 58' S., about the same distance from the Pole and about two miles above sea level. These included leaf and stem impressions and fossilized wood. In 1952 Dr Lyman H. Dougherty, of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, completing a study of these fossils, identified two species of a tree fern called Glossopteris, once common to the other southern continents (Africa, South America, Australia) and a giant fern tree of another species ...'[5]

[3] Discover The World Of Science, February 1993, p. 17. The fifteen mineralized tree stumps, presumably the remnant of a much larger forest, range from three and a half to seven inches in diameter. They were saplings of a well-known genus of seed fern, Glossopteris [found in much of the southern hemisphere's coal]. Unlike true ferns, seed ferns had seeds instead of spores, were often treelike, and are now extinct ... All around the Mount Achernar tree stumps, Taylor's colleagues found the tongue-shaped imprints of fallen Glossopteris leaves.

Deciduous trees are an indicator of a warm climate, and so is the absence of 'frost rings'. When Taylor analysed the growth rings in samples from the stumps she found none of the ice-swollen cells and gaps between cells that arise when the growth of a tree is disrupted by frost. That means there wasn't any frost in the Antarctic at that time.

'In our memory Antarctica has always been cold,' says Taylor. 'It's only by looking at fossil floras that we can see what potential there is for plant communities. This fossil forest, growing at 85 degrees latitude, gives us some idea of what is possible with catastrophic climate change.' N.B. The trees were killed by a flood or mudflow—another impossibility in Antarctica today.

Admiral Byrd's own comment on the significance of the Mount Weaver finds: 'Here at the southernmost known mountain in the world, scarcely two hundred miles from the South Pole, was found conclusive evidence that the climate of Antarctica was once temperate or even sub-tropical.'[6]

'Soviet scientists have reported finding evidence of tropical flora in Graham Land, another part of Antarctica, dating from the early Tertiary Period (perhaps the Paleocene or Eocene) ... Further evidence is provided by the discovery by British geologists of great fossil forests in Antarctica, of the same type that grew on the Pacific coast of the United States 20 million years ago. This of course shows that after the earliest known Antarctic glaciation in the Eocene [60 million years ago] the continent did not remain glacial but had later episodes of warm climate.'[7]

Exhibit 5

'On 25 December 1990 geologists Barrie McKelvey and David Harwood were working 1830 metres above sea level and 400 kilometres [250 miles] from the South Pole in Antarctica. The geologists discovered fossils from a deciduous southern beach forest dating from between two and three million years ago'.[8]

In 1986 the discovery of fossilized wood and plants showed that parts of Antarctica may have been ice free as little as two and a half a million years ago. Further discoveries showed that some places on the continent were ice-free 100,000 years ago.[9]

Ross Sea by one of the Byrd Antarctic Expeditions provide conclusive evidence that 'great rivers, carrying down fine well grained sediments' did flow in this part of Antarctica until perhaps as late as 4000 BC. According to the report of Dr Jack Hough of the University of Illinois: 'The log of core N-5 shows glacial marine sediment from the present to 6000 years ago. From 6000 to 15,000 years ago the sediment is fine-grained with the exception of one granule at about 12,000 years ago. This suggests an absence of ice from the area during that period, except perhaps for a stray iceberg 12,000 years ago.'[10]

The Orontaeus Finnaeus World Map reviewed in Part I accurately depicts the Ross Sea as it would look if it were free of ice and, in addition, shows Antarctica's ranges of lofty coastal mountains with great rivers flowing from them where only mile-deep glaciers are to be found today.[11]

Charles Hapgood, The Path Of The Pole, 1970, page 111ff: 'It is rare that geological investigations receive important confirmation from archaeology; yet in this case, it seems that the matter of the deglaciation of the Ross Sea can be confirmed by an old map that has somehow survived many thousands of years ... It was discovered and published in 1531 by the French geographer Oronce Fine [Oronteus Finnaeus] and is part of his Map of the World ...

It has been possible to establish the authenticity of this map. In several years of research the projection of this ancient map was worked out. It was found to have been drawn on a sophisticated map projection, with the use of spherical trigonometry, and to be so scientific that over 50 locations on the Antarctic continent have been found to be located on it with an accuracy that was not attained by modern cartographic science until the 19th century. And, of course, when this map was first published, in 1531, nothing at all was known of Antarctica. The continent was not discovered in modern times until about 1818 and was not fully mapped until after 1920 ...'[12]

The Buache Map, also reviewed in Part I, accurately depicts the subglacial topography of Antarctica.[13] Does it do so by chance or might the continent indeed have been entirely ice-free recently enough for the cartographers of a lost civilization to have mapped it?

The reverse side of the coin. If the lands presently inside the Antarctic Circle were once temperate or tropical, what about lands inside the Arctic Circle? Were they affected by the same dramatic climate changes, suggesting that some common factor might have been at work?

- 'On the island of Spitzbergen (Svalbard), palm leaves ten and twelve feet long have been fossilized, along with fossilized marine crustaceans of a type that could only inhabit tropical waters. This suggests that at one time the temperatures of the Arctic Ocean were similar to the contemporary temperatures of the Bay of Bengal or the Caribbean Sea. Spitzbergen is half way between the northern tip of Norway and the North Pole, at a latitude of 80 degrees N. Today, ships can reach Spitzbergen through the ice only about two or at the most three months during the year.'[14]

- There is firm fossil evidence that stands of swamp cypress flourished within 500 miles of the North Pole in the Miocene [between 20 million and 6 million years ago], and that water-lillies flourished in Spitzbergen in the same period: 'The Miocene floras of Grinnell Land and Greenland, and Spitzbergen, all required temperate climatic conditions with plentiful moisture. The water lillies of Spitzbergen would have required flowing water for the greater part of the year. In connection with the flora of Spitzbergen it should be realized that the island is in polar darkness for half the year. It lies on the Arctic Circle, as far north of Labrador as Labrador is north of Bermuda.[15]

- Some of the islands in the Arctic Ocean were never covered by ice during the last Ice Age. On Baffin Island, for example, 900 miles from the North Pole, alder and birch remains found in peat suggest a much warmer climate than today less than 30,000 years ago. These conditions prevailed until 17,000 years ago: 'During the Wisconsin ice age there was a temperate-climate refuge in the middle of the Arctic Ocean for the flora and fauna that could not exist in Canada and the United States.'[16]

- Russian scientists have concluded that the Arctic Ocean was warm during most of the last Ice Age. A report by academicians Saks, Belov and Lapina covering many phases of their oceanographic work highlights the period from about 32,000 to about 18,000 years ago as being one during which particularly warm conditions prevailed.[17]

- As we saw in Part IV, huge numbers of warm-blooded, temperate adapted mammal species were instantly frozen, and their bodies preserved in the permafrost, all across a vast zone of death stretching from the Yukon, through Alaska and deep into northern Siberia. The bulk of this destruction appears to have taken place during the eleventh millennium BC, although there was an earlier episode of large-scale extinctions around 13,500 BC.[18]

- We also saw (Chapter Twenty-seven) that the last Ice Age came to an end between 15,000 and 8000 BC, but principally between 14500 and 12,500 BC, with a further outburst of extraordinarily intense activity in the eleventh millennium BC. During this geologically brief period of time, glaciation up to two miles deep covering millions of square miles which had taken more than 40,000 years to build-up suddenly and inexplicably melted: 'It must be obvious that this could not have been the result of the gradually acting climatic factors usually called upon to explain ice ages ... The rapidity of the deglaciation suggests that some extraordinary factor was affecting climate ...'[19]

The icy executioner

Some extraordinary factor was affecting climate ...

Was it a 30° one-piece shift of the lithosphere that abruptly terminated the Ice Age in the northern hemisphere (by pushing the most heavily glaciated areas southwards from the northern pole of the spin axis)? If so, why shouldn't the same 30° one-piece shift of the lithosphere have swivelled a largely deglaciated six-million-square-mile southern hemisphere continent from temperate latitudes to a position directly over the southern pole of the spin axis?

On the issue of the movability of Antarctica, we now know that it is movable and, more to the point, that it has moved, because trees have grown there and trees simply cannot grow at latitudes which suffer six months of continual darkness.

What we do not know (and may never know for certain) is whether this movement was a consequence of earth-crust displacement, or of continental drift, or of some other unguessed-at factor.

Let us consider Antarctica for a moment.

We have already seen that it is big. It has a land area of 5.5 million square miles, and is presently covered by something in excess of seven million cubic miles of ice weighing an estimated 19 quadrillion tons (19 followed by 15 zeros).[20] What worries the theorists of earth-crust displacement is that this vast ice-cap is remorselessly increasing in size and weight: 'at the rate of 293 cubic miles of ice each year—almost as much as if Lake Ontario were frozen solid annually and added to it.'[21]

The fear is that when it is coupled with the effects of precession, obliquity, orbital eccentricity, the earth's own centrifugal motion, and the gravitational tug of the sun, moon and planets, Antarctica's huge, ever-expanding burden of glaciation could provide the final trigger-factor for a massive displacement of the crust:

> The growing South Pole ice-cap [wrote Hugh Auchincloss Brown, somewhat colourfully, in 1967] has become a stealthy, silent and relentless force of nature—a result of the energy created by its eccentric rotation. The ice-cap is the creeping peril, the deadly menace and the executioner of our civilization.[22]

Did this 'executioner' cause the end of the last Ice Age in the northern hemisphere by setting in motion a 7000-year shift of the crust between 15,000 BC and 8000 BC—a shift that was perhaps at its most rapid, and would have had its most devastating effects, between 14,500 BC and 10,000 BC?[23] Or were the sudden and dramatic climate changes experienced in the northern hemisphere during this period the result of some other catastrophic agency simultaneously capable of melting millions of cubic miles of ice and of sparking off the worldwide increase in volcanism that accompanied the melt-down?[24]

Modern geologists are opposed to catastrophes, or rather to catastrophism, preferring to follow the 'uniformitarian' doctrine: 'that existing processes, acting as at present, are sufficient to account for all geological changes'. Catastrophism, on the other hand, holds that 'changes in the earth's crust have generally been effected suddenly by physical forces.'[25] Is it possible, however, that the mechanism responsible for the traumatic earth changes which took place at the end of the last Ice Age could have been a geological event both catastrophic and uniform?

> To my mind there appears to be no sort of theoretical antagonism between Catastrophism and Uniformitarianism; on the contrary, it is very conceivable that catastrophes may be part and parcel of uniformity. Let me illustrate my case by analogy. The working of a clock is a model of uniform action. Good timekeeping means uniformity of action. But the striking of a clock is essentially a catastrophe.

> The hammer might be made to blow up a barrel of gunpowder, or turn on a deluge of water and, by proper arrangement, the clock, instead of marking the hours, might strike at all sorts of irregular intervals, never twice alike in the force or number of its blows. Nevertheless, all these irregular and apparently lawless catastrophes would be the result of an absolutely uniformitarian action, and we might have two schools of clock theorists, one studying the hammer and the other the pendulum.[26]

Could continental drift be the pendulum?

Could earth-crust displacement be the hammer?

Mars and earth

Crustal displacements are thought to have taken place on other planets. In the December 1985 issue of Scientific American, Peter H. Schultz drew attention to meteorite impact craters visible on the Martian surface. Craters in polar areas have a distinctive 'signature' because the meteorites land amid the thick deposits of dust and ice that accumulate there. Outside the present polar circles of Mars, Schultz found two other such areas: 'These zones are antipodal; they are on opposite faces of the planet. The deposits show many of the processes and characteristics of today's poles, but they lie near the present-day equator ...'

What could have caused this effect? Judging from the evidence, Shultz put forward the theory that the mechanism appeared to have been 'the movement of the entire lithosphere, the solid outer portion of the planet as one plate ... [This movement seems to have taken place] in rapid spurts followed by long pauses.'[27]

If crustal displacements can happen on Mars, why not on earth? And if they don't happen on earth, how do we account for the otherwise awkward fact that not a single one of the ice-caps built up around the world during previous Ice Ages seems to have occurred at—or even near—either of the present poles.[28] On the contrary, land areas bearing the marks of former glaciation are very widely distributed. If we cannot assume crustal shifts, we must find some other way to explain why the ice-caps appear to have reached sea level within the tropics on three continents: Asia, Africa and Australia.[29]

Charles Hapgood's solution to this problem is simple, extremely elegant and does not affront commonsense:

> The only ice age that is adequately explained is the present ice age in Antarctica. This is excellently explained. It exists, quite obviously, because Antarctica is at the pole, and for no other reason. No variation of the sun's heat, no galactic dust, no volcanism, no subcrustal currents, and no arrangements of land elevations or sea > currents account for the fact. We may conclude that the best theory to account for an ice age is that the area concerned was at the pole. We thus account for the Indian and African ice sheets, though the areas once occupied by them are now in the tropics. We account for all ice sheets of continental size in the same way.[30]

The logic is close to inescapable. Either we accept that the Antarctic ice cap is the first continent-sized ice sheet ever to have been situated at a pole—which seems improbable—or we are obliged to suppose that earth-crust displacement, or a similar mechanism, must have been at work.

Memories of the polar dawn?

Our ancestors may have preserved in their most ancient traditions memories of a displacement. We saw some of these memories in Part IV: cataclysm myths that appear to be eyewitness accounts of the series of geological disasters which accompanied the end of the last Ice-Age in the northern hemisphere.[31] There are other myths too, which may have come down to us from that epoch between 15,000 and 10,000 BC. Among these are several which speak of lands of the gods and of former paradises, all of which are described as being in the south (for example, the Ta-Neteru of the Egyptians) and many of which seem to have experienced polar conditions.

The great Indian epic, Mahabaratha, speaks of Mount Meru, the land of the gods:

> At Meru the sun and moon go round from left to right every day, and so do all the stars ... The mountain by its lusture, so overcomes the darkness of night, that the night can hardly be distinguished from the day. ... The day and night are together equal to a year to the residents of the place ...[32]

Similarly, as the reader will recall from Chapter Twenty-five, Airyana Vaejo, the mythical paradise and former homeland of the Avestic Aryans of Iran, seems to have been rendered uninhabitable by the sudden onset of glaciation. In later years it was spoken of as a place in which: 'the stars, the moon and the sun are only once a year seen to rise and set, and a year seems only as a day.'[33]

In the Surya Siddhanta, an ancient Indian text, we read, 'The gods behold the sun, after it has once arisen, for half a year.'[34] The seventh Mandala of the Rigveda contains a number of 'Dawn' hymns. One of these (VII, 76) says that the dawn has raised its banner on the horizon with its usual splendour and reports in Verse 3 that a period of several days elapsed between the first appearance of the dawn and the rising of the sun that followed it.[35] Another passage states, 'many were the days between the first beams of the dawn and actual sunrise'.[36]

Are these eyewitness accounts of polar conditions?

Although we can never be sure, it may be relevant that in Indian tradition the Vedas are believed to be revealed texts, passed down from the time of the gods.[37] It may also be relevant that in describing the processes of transmission, all the traditions refer to the pralayas (cataclysms) which occasionally overtake the world and claim that in each of these the written scriptures are physically destroyed. After each destruction, however, certain Rishis or 'wise men' survive who > repromulgate, at the beginning of the new age, the knowledge inherited by them as a sacred trust from their forefathers in the preceding age ... Each manvantara or age thus has a Veda of its own which differs only in expression and not in sense from the antediluvian Veda.[38]

An epoch of turmoil and darkness

As every schoolboy geographer understands, true north (the North Pole) is not quite the same thing as magnetic north (the direction compass needles point). Indeed the magnetic north pole is presently situated in northern Canada, about 11 degrees from the true North Pole.[39] Recent advances in the study of palaeomagnetism have proved that the earth's magnetic polarity has reversed itself more than 170 times during the past 80 million years ...[40]

What causes these field reversals?

While he was teaching at the University of Cambridge the geologist S. K. Runcorn published an article in Scientific American which made a pertinent point:

> There seems no doubt that the earth's magnetic field is tied up in some way to the rotation of the planet. And this leads to a remarkable finding about the earth's rotation itself ... [The unavoidable conclusion is that] the earth's axis of rotation has changed also. In other words, the planet has rolled about, changing the location of the geographical poles.[41]

Runcorn appears to be envisaging a complete 180-degree flip of the poles, with the earth literally tumbling—although similar palaeomagnetic readings would result from a slippage of the crust over the geographical poles. Either way, the consequences for civilization, and indeed for all life, would be unimaginably dreadful.

Of course, Runcorn may be wrong; perhaps field reversals can occur in the absence of any other upheavals.

But he may also be right.

According to reports published in Nature and New Scientist, the last geomagnetic reversal was completed just 12,400 years ago—during the eleventh millennium BC.[42]

This is of course the very millennium in which the ancient Tiahuanacan civilization in the Andes seems to have been destroyed. The same millennium is signalled by the alignments and design of the great astronomical monuments on the Giza plateau, and by the erosion patterns on the Sphinx. And it was in the eleventh millennium BC that Egypt's 'precocious agricultural experiment' suddenly failed. Likewise it was in the eleventh millennium BC that huge numbers of large mammal species all around the world vanished into extinction. The list could continue: abrupt rises in sea level, hurricane-force winds, electrical storms, volcanic disturbances, and so on.

Scientists expect the next reversal of the earth's magnetic poles to occur around AD 2030.[43]

Is this an intimation of planetary disaster? After 12,500 years of the pendulum, is the hammer about to strike?

Exhibit 11

Yves Rocard, Professor of the Faculty of Sciences at Paris: 'Our modern seismographs are sensitive to the 'noise' of limited agitation at every point in the earth, even in the absence of any seismic wave. One may in this noise discern a man-made vibration (for example, a train four kilometers away, or a big city ten kilometers off) and also an atmospheric effect (from changing pressure of the wind on the soil) and sometimes one registers also the effects of great storms at a distance. Yet there remains a continued rolling noise of cracklings in the earth which owes nothing to any [such] cause ...'[44]

If both these observations were accurate when made, as we have every right to expect in view of the eminence of the scientists involved, then we have here evidence that the lithosphere may be in motion at the present time [and that it is experiencing] a geometrical acceleration of the rate of motion ...[45]

Is it just the ice sheet that is slipping, or is the entire crust of the earth in motion? And was it just an 'unusual interactive education project' that took place on 10 January 1995, or was Elizabeth Felton unknowingly documenting the continued geometrical acceleration of the rate of motion of the crust?

Scientists do not think so. As we shall see in the final chapter, however, the coming century is signalled in a remarkable convergence of ancient prophecies and traditional beliefs as an epoch of unprecedented turmoil and darkness, in which iniquity will be worked in secret, and the Fifth Sun and the Fourth World will come to an end ...

Like a Thief in the Night

There are certain structures in the world, certain ideas, certain intellectual treasures, that are truly mysterious. I am beginning to suspect that the human race may have placed itself in grave jeopardy by failing to consider [the implications of these mysteries.

We have the ability, unique in the animal kingdom, to learn from the experiences of our predecessors. After Hiroshima and Nagasaki, for example, two generations have grown to adulthood in awareness of the horrific destruction that nuclear weapons unleash. Our children will be aware of this too, without experiencing it directly, and they will pass it on to their children. Theoretically, therefore, the knowledge of what atom bombs do has become part of the permanent historical legacy of mankind, whether we choose to benefit from that legacy or not is up to us. Nevertheless the knowledge is there, should we wish to use it, because it has been preserved and transmitted in written records, in film archives, in allegorical paintings, in war memorials, and so on.

Not all testimony from the past is accorded the same stature as the records of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. On the contrary, like the Canonical Bible, the body of knowledge that we call ‘History’ is an edited cultural artefact from which much has been left out. In particular, references to human experiences prior to the invention of writing around 5000 years ago have been omitted in their entirety and myth has become a synonym for delusion.

Suppose it is not delusion?

Suppose that a tremendous cataclysm were to overtake the earth today, obliterating the achievements of our civilization and wiping out almost all of us. Suppose, to paraphrase Plato, that we were forced by this cataclysm ‘to begin again like children, in complete ignorance of what had happened in early times’.[1] Under such circumstances, ten or twelve thousand years from now (with all written records and film archives long since destroyed) what testimony might our descendants still preserve concerning the events at the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945 of the Christian era?

It is easy to imagine how they might speak in mystical terms of explosions that gave off a ‘terrible glare of light’ and ‘immense heat’.[2] Nor would we be too surprised to find that they might have formulated a ‘mythical’ account something like this:

[2] The Bhagavata Purana, Motilal Banardass, Delhi, 1986, Part I, pp. 59, 95.

> The flames of the Brahmastra-charged missiles mingled with each other and surrounded by fiery arrows they covered the earth, heaven and space between and increased the conflagration like the fire and the Sun at the end of the world ... All beings who were scorched by the Brahmastras, and saw the terrible fire of their missiles, felt that it was the fire of Pralaya [the cataclysm] that burns down the world.[3]

And what of the Enola Gay which carried the Hiroshima bomb? How might our descendants remember that strange aircraft and the squadrons of others like it that swarmed through the skies of planet earth during the twentieth century of the Christian era? Isn't it possible, probable even, that they might preserve traditions of 'celestial cars' and 'heavenly chariots' and 'spacious flying machines', and even of 'aerial cities'.[4] If they did, would they perhaps speak of such wonders in mythical terms a little like these:

- 'Oh you, Uparicara Vasu, the spacious aerial flying machine will come to you—and you alone, of all the mortals, seated on that vehicle will look like a deity.'[5]

- 'Visvakarma, the architect among the Gods, built aerial vehicles for the Gods.'[6]

- 'Oh you descendant of the Kurus, that wicked fellow came on that all-traversing automatic flying vehicle known as Saubhapura and pierced me with weapons.'[7]

- 'He entered into the favourite divine palace of Indra and saw thousands of flying vehicles intended for the Gods lying at rest.'[8]

- 'The Gods came in their respective flying vehicles to witness the battle between Kripacarya and Arjuna. Even Indra, the Lord of Heaven, came with a special type of flying vehicle which could accommodate 33 divine beings.'[9]

All these quotations have been taken from the Bhagavata Purana and from the Mahabaratha, two drops in the ocean of the ancient wisdom literature of the Indian subcontinent. And such images are replicated in many other archaic traditions. To give one example (as we saw in Chapter Forty-two), the Pyramid Texts are replete with anachronistic images of flight:

> The King is a flame, moving before the wind to the end of the sky and to the end of the earth ... the King travels the air and traverses the earth ... there is brought to him a way of ascent to the sky ...[10]

Is it possible that the constant references in archaic literatures to something like aviation could be valid historical testimony concerning the achievements of a forgotten and remote technological age?

We will never know unless we try to find out. And so far we haven't tried because our rational, scientific culture regards myths and traditions as 'unhistorical'.

No doubt many are unhistorical. but at the end of the investigation that underlies this book, I am certain that many others are not ...

For the benefit of future generations of mankind

Here is a scenario:

Suppose that we had calculated, on the basis of sound evidence and beyond any shadow of a doubt, that our civilization was soon to be obliterated by a titanic geological cataclysm—a 30° displacement of the earth's crust, for example, or a head-on collision with a ten-mile-wide nickel-iron asteroid travelling towards us at cosmic speed.

Of course there would at first be much panic and despair. Nevertheless—if there were sufficient advance warning—steps would be taken to ensure that there would be some survivors and that some of what was most valuable in our high scientific knowledge would be preserved for the benefit of future generations.

Strangely enough, the Jewish historian Josephus (who wrote during the first century AD) attributes precisely this behaviour to the clever and prosperous inhabitants of the antediluvian world who lived before the Flood 'in a happy condition without any misfortunes falling upon them':[11]

> They also were the inventors of that peculiar sort of wisdom which is concerned with the heavenly bodies, and their order. And that their inventions might not be lost—upon Adam's prediction that the world was to be destroyed at one time by the force of fire, and at another time by the violence and quantity of water—they made two pillars, one of brick, the other of stone: they inscribed their discoveries upon them both, that in case the pillar of brick should be destroyed by the Flood, the pillar of stone might remain and exhibit these discoveries to mankind; and also inform them that there was another pillar of brick erected by them ...[12]

Likewise, when the Oxford astronomer John Greaves visited Egypt in the seventeenth century he collected ancient local traditions which attributed the construction of the three Giza pyramids to a mythical antediluvian king:

[12] Ibid.

> The occasion of this was because he saw in his sleep that the whole earth was turned over, with the inhabitants of it lying upon their faces and the stars falling down and striking one another with a terrible noise ... And he awaked with great feare, and assembled the chief priests of all the provinces of Egypt ... He related the whole matter to them and they took the altitude of the stars, and made their prognostication, and they foretold of a deluge. The king said, will it come to our country? They answered yes, and will destroy it. And there remained a certain number of years to come, and he commanded in the mean space to build the Pyramids ... And he engraved in these Pyramids all things that were told by wise men, as also all profound sciences—the science of Astrology, and of Arithmeticke, and of Geometry, and of Physicke. All this may be interpreted by him that knowes their characters and language ...[13]

Taken at face value, the message of both of these myths seems crystal clear: certain mysterious structures scattered around the world were built to preserve and transmit the knowledge of an advanced civilization of remote antiquity which was destroyed by a terrifying upheaval.

Could this be so? And what are we to make of other strange traditions that have come to us from the dark vault of prehistory?

What are we to make, for example, of the Popol Vuh, which speaks in veiled language about a great secret of the human past: a long-forgotten golden age when everything was possible—a magical time of scientific progress and enlightenment when the ‘First Men’ (who were ‘endowed with intelligence’) not only ‘measured the round face of the earth’ but ‘examined the four points of the arch of the sky’.

As the reader will recall, the gods became jealous at the rapid progress made by these upstart humans who had ‘succeeded in seeing, succeeded in knowing, all that there is in the world.’[14] Divine retribution quickly followed: ‘The Heart of Heaven blew mist into their eyes ... In this way all the wisdom and all the knowledge of the First Men [together with their memory of their] origin and their beginning, were destroyed.’[15]

The secret of what happened was never entirely forgotten because a record of those distant First Times was preserved, until the coming of the Spaniards, in the sacred texts of the original Popol Vuh. The abuses of the conquest made it necessary for that primordial document to be concealed from all but the most highly-initiated sages and replaced with a watered-down substitute written ‘under the law of Christianity’:[16] ‘No longer can be seen the book of Popol Vuh which the kings had in olden times ... The original book, written long ago, existed—but now its sight is hidden to the searcher and to the thinker ...’[17]

On the other side of the world, among the myths and traditions of the Indian subcontinent, there are further tantalizing suggestions of hidden secrets. In the Puranic version of the universal flood story, shortly before the deluge was unleashed, the fish god Vishnu warned his human protégé that he 'should conceal the Sacred Scriptures in a safe place' to preserve the knowledge of the antediluvian races from destruction.[18] Likewise, in Mesopotamia, the Noah figure Utnapishtim was instructed by the god Ea 'to take the beginning, the middle and the end of whatever was consigned to writing and then to bury it in the City of the Sun at Sippara'.[19] After the waters of the flood had gone, survivors were instructed to make their way to the site of the City of the Sun 'to search for the writings', which would be found to contain knowledge of benefit to future generations of mankind.[20]

Strangely enough, it was the City of the Sun in Egypt, Innu, known by the Greeks as Heliopolis—which was regarded throughout the dynastic period as the source and centre of the high wisdom handed down to mortal men from the fabled First Time of the gods. It was at Heliopolis that the Pyramid Texts were collated, and it was the Heliopolitan priesthood—or rather the Heliopolitan cult—that had custody of the monuments of the Giza necropolis.

More than just Kilroy was here

Let us return to our scenario:

1 we know that our late twentieth-century, post-industrial civilization is about to be destroyed by an inescapable cosmic or geological cataclysm;

2 we know—because our science is pretty good—that the destruction is going to be near-total;

3 mobilizing massive technological resources, we put our best minds to work to ensure that at least a remnant of our species will survive the catastrophe, and that the core of our scientific, medical, astronomical, geographical, architectural and mathematical knowledge will be preserved;

4 we are of course aware how slim are our chances of succeeding on both counts; nevertheless, galvanized by the prospect of extinction, we make an almighty effort to build the Arks or Vars or strong enclosures in which the chosen survivors can be protected, and we focus our considerable ingenuity on ways to transmit the essence of the knowledge we have accumulated during the 5000 years of our recorded history.

We start by preparing for the worst. We assume that there will be survivors but that they will be blasted back into the Stone Age by the cataclysm. Realizing that it may take ten or twelve thousand years for a civilization as advanced as our own to rise again like a phoenix from the ashes, one of our top priorities is to find a way to communicate with that postulated future civilization. At the least we would want to say to them: KILROY WAS HERE! and to be sure they got the message no matter what language they spoke or what ethical, religious, ideological, metaphysical or philosophical leanings their society might exhibit.

I'm sure we'd want to say more than just 'Kilroy was here'. We'd want, for example, to tell them—those distant grandchildren of ours—when we had lived in relation to their time.

How would we do that? How would we express, say, AD 2012 of the Christian era in a language universal enough to be worked out and understood twelve thousand years hence by a civilization that would know nothing of the Christian or of any of the other eras by which we express chronology?

One obvious solution would be to make use of the beautiful predictability of the earth's axial precession, which has the effect of slowly and regularly altering the declination of the entire star-field in relation to a viewer at a fixed point, and which equally slowly and regularly revolves the equinoctial point in relation to the twelve zodiacal constellations. From the predictability of this motion it follows that if we could find a way to declare: WE LIVED WHEN THE VERNAL EQUINOX WAS IN THE CONSTELLATION OF PISCES we would provide a means of specifying our epoch to within a single 2160-year period in every grand precessional cycle of 25,920 years.

The only drawback to this scheme would become evident if a civilization equivalent to our own failed to arise within 12,000 or even 20,000 years of the cataclysm, but took much longer—perhaps as much as 30,000 years. In that case, a monument or calendrical device declaring 'we lived when the vernal equinox was in the constellation of Pisces' would no longer be unambiguous. If discovered by a high culture flourishing at the very beginning of a future Age of Sagittarius for example it could be read as meaning 'we lived 4320 years before your time'—that is, two full precessional 'months' prior to the Sagittarian Age (the 2160-year 'months' of Aquarius and Capricorn). But it could also mean 'We lived 30,240 years before your time', that is those two 'months' plus the full previous precessional cycle of 25,920 years. The Sagittarian archaeologists would not only have to use their wits to work out the meaning of the message (i.e. WE LIVED WHEN THE VERNAL EQUINOX WAS IN PISCES), but would need to decide from other clues which Age of Pisces we had lived in: the most recent, or the one in the previous precessional cycle, or perhaps even the cycle before that.

Geology would naturally be of assistance in making such broad judgements ...

The civilizers

If we could find a way of saying WE LIVED IN THE AGE OF PISCES, and could specify the altitude above the horizon of certain identifiable stars in our own epoch (say, the prominent belt stars of the Orion constellation), we would be able to signal our dates to future generations with greater precision. Alternatively we could do as the builders of the Giza pyramids appear to have done and lay out our monuments in a pattern on the ground reflecting exactly the pattern of the stars in the sky in our time.

There would be several other options and combinations of options open to us, depending on our circumstances, on the level of technology available to us, on the extent of the early warning we were given, and on which chronological facts we wanted to transmit.

Suppose, for example, that there was not time to make proper preparations prior to the catastrophe. Suppose that the disaster, like 'the Day of the Lord' in 2 Peter 3, crept up on us unseen 'as a thief in the night?'[21] What prospects might humanity be faced with?

Whether as the result of an asteroid strike or an earth-crust displacement or some other cosmic or geological cause, let us assume:

1. massive devastation all around the world;
2. the survival of only relatively small numbers of people, the majority of whom rapidly revert to barbarism;
3. the presence, among this remnant, of a minority of well-organized visionaries—including master-builders, scientists, engineers, cartographers, mathematicians, medical doctors and the like—who dedicate themselves to salvaging what they can and finding ways to transmit the knowledge to the future for the benefit of those who might eventually understand it.

Let us call these hypothetical visionaries 'the civilisers'. As they banded together—at first to survive, later to teach and to share ideas—they might take on something of the manner and belief systems of a religious cult, developing a clear sense of mission and of shared identity. No doubt they would make use of powerful and easily recognizable symbols to strengthen and express this sense of common purpose: the men might wear distinctive beards, for example, or shave their heads, and certain archetypal imagery like the cross and the serpent and the dog might be used to link the members of the cult together as they set out on their civilizing missions to relight the lamps of knowledge around the world.

I suspect, if the situation were bad enough after the cataclysm, that many of the civilizers would fail, or meet with only limited success. But let us suppose that one small group had the skill and dedication sufficient to create a lasting and stable beach-head, perhaps in a region which had suffered relatively little damage in the disaster. Then let us suppose that some other unexpected disaster were to occur—an aftershock or series of aftershocks from the original catastrophe perhaps—and the beach-head was almost totally annihilated.

What might happen next? What might be salvaged from this wreckage of a wisdom cult which had itself been salvaged from a greater wreck?

Transmitting the essence

If the circumstances were right it seems possible that the essence of the cult might survive, carried forward by a nucleus of determined men and women. I suspect, too, with the proper motivation and indoctrination techniques, plus a means of recruiting new members from among the half-savage local inhabitants, that such a cult might perpetuate itself almost indefinitely. This could happen, however, only if its members (like the Jews awaiting the Messiah) were prepared to bide their time, for thousands and thousands of years, until they felt confident that the moment had come to declare themselves.

If they did that, and if their sacred objective were indeed to preserve and transmit knowledge to some evolved future civilization, it is easy to imagine how the cult members might be described in terms similar to those used for the Egyptian wisdom god Thoth who was said to have > succeeded in understanding the mysteries of the heavens [and to have] revealed them by inscribing them in sacred books which he then hid here on earth, intending that they should be searched for by future generations but found only by the fully worthy ...[22]

What might the mysterious ‘books of Thoth’ have been? Is it necessary to suppose that all the information they were purported to contain should have been transmitted in book form?

Is it not worth wondering, for example, whether Professors de Santillana and von Dechend might have earned their place among the ‘fully worthy’ when they decoded the advanced scientific language embedded in the great universal myths of precession? In so doing, is it not possible that they might have stumbled upon one of the metaphorical ‘books’ of Thoth and read the ancient science inscribed upon its pages?

Likewise, what about Posnansky’s discoveries at Tiahuanaco, and Hapgood’s maps? What about the new understanding that is dawning concerning the geological antiquity of the Sphinx at Giza? What about the questions raised by the gigantic blocks used in the construction of the [22] The Egyptian Hermes, p. 33.

Valley and Mortuary Temples? What about the secrets now being teased, one by one, from the astronomical alignments and dimensions and concealed chambers of the pyramids?

If these, too, are readings from the metaphorical books of Thoth, it would seem that the numbers of the 'fully worthy' are increasing, and that new and even more startling revelations may soon be at hand ...

To return briefly and for the last time to our evolving scenario:

1 at the beginning of the twenty-first century of the Christian era, near the cusp of the Age of Pisces and the Age of Aquarius, civilization as we know it is destroyed;

2 among the devastated survivors a few hundred or a few thousand individuals band together to preserve and transmit the fruits of their culture's scientific knowledge into a distant and uncertain future;

3 these civilizers split into small groups and spread across the globe;

4 by and large they fail, and perish; nevertheless, in certain areas, some do succeed in making a lasting cultural impression;

5 after thousands of years—and perhaps several false starts—a branch of the original wisdom cult influences the emergence of a fully fledged civilization ...

Of course the parallel for this last category is once again to be found in Egypt. I would seriously propose as a hypothesis for further testing that a scientific wisdom cult, made up of the survivors of a great, lost, maritime civilization, could perhaps have established itself in the Nile Valley as early as the fourteenth millennium BC. The cult would have been based at Heliopolis, Giza and Abydos, and perhaps at other centres as well, and would have initiated Egypt's early agricultural revolution. Later, however, beaten down by the huge floods and other disturbances of the earth which took place in the eleventh millennium BC, the cult would have been obliged to cut its losses and withdraw until the turmoil of the Ice Age was over—never knowing whether its message would survive the subsequent dark epochs.

Under such circumstances, the hypothesis suggests that a huge and ambitious building project would have been one way cult members could preserve and transmit scientific information into the future independently of their physical survival. In other words, if the buildings were large enough, capable of enduring through immense spans of time and encoded through and through with the cult's message, there would be hope that the message would be decoded at some future date even if the cult had by then long since ceased to exist.

The hypothesis proposes that this is what the enigmatic structures on the Giza plateau are all about:

1 that the Great Sphinx is indeed, as we have argued in previous chapters, an equinoctial marker for the Age of Leo, indicating a date in our own chronology of between 10,970 BC and 8810 BC;

2 that the three principal pyramids are indeed laid out in relation to the Nile Valley to mimic the precise dispositions of the three stars of Orion's Belt in relation to the course of the Milky Way in 10,450 BC.

This is a pretty effective means of 'specifying' the epoch of the eleventh millennium BC by using the phenomenon of precession, which has been rightly described as the 'only true clock of our planet'.[23] Confusingly, however, we also know that the Great Pyramid incorporates star shafts 'locked in' to Orion's Belt and Sirius at around 2450 BC.[24] The hypothesis resolves the anomaly of the missing years by supposing the star shafts to be merely the later work of the same long-lived cult that originally laid out the Giza ground-plan in 10,450 BC. Naturally, the hypothesis also suggests that it was this same cult, towards the end of those 8000 missing years, that provided the initiating spark for the sudden and 'fully formed' emergence of the literate historical civilization of dynastic Egypt.

What remains to be guessed at are the motives of the pyramid builders, who were presumably the same people as the mysterious cartographers who mapped the globe at the end of the last Ice Age in the northern hemisphere. If so, we might also ask why these highly civilized and technically accomplished architects and navigators were obsessed with charting the gradual glaciation of the enigmatic southern continent of Antarctica from the fourteenth millennium BC—when Hapgood calculates that the source map referred to by Phillipe Buache was drawn up—down to about the end of the fifth millennium BC?

Could they have been making a permanent cartographical record of the slow obliteration of their homeland?

And could their overwhelming desire to transmit a message to the future through a variety of different media—myths, maps, buildings, calendar systems, mathematical harmonies—have been connected to the cataclysms and earth changes that caused this loss?

An urgent mission

The possession of a conscious, articulated history is one of the faculties that distinguishes human beings from animals. Unlike rats, say, or sheep, or cows, or pheasants, we have a past which is separate from ourselves. We therefore have the opportunity, as I have said, to learn from the experiences of our predecessors.

Is it because we are perverse, or misguided, or simply stupid that we refuse to recognize those experiences unless they have come down to us in the form of bona fide 'historical records'? And is it arrogance or ignorance which leads us to draw an arbitrary line separating 'history' from 'prehistory' at about 5000 years before the present—defining the records of 'history' as valid testimony and the records of 'prehistory' as primitive delusions?

At this stage in a continuing investigation, my instinct is that we may have put ourselves in danger by closing our ears for so long to the disturbing ancestral voices which reach us in the form of myths. This is more an intuitive than a rational feeling, but it is by no means unreasonable. My research has filled me with respect for the logical thinking, high science, deep psychological insights, and vast cosmographical knowledge of the ancient geniuses who composed those myths, and who, I am now fully persuaded, descended from the same lost civilization that produced the map-makers, pyramid builders, navigators, astronomers and earth-measurers whose fingerprints we have been following across the continents and oceans of the earth.

Since I have learned to respect those long-forgotten and still only hazily identified Newtons and Shakespeares and Einsteins of the last Ice Age, I think it would be foolish to disregard what they seem to be saying. And what they seem to be saying to us is this: that cyclical, recurrent and near-total destructions of mankind are part and parcel of life on this planet, that such destructions have occurred many times before and that they will certainly occur again.

What, after all, is the remarkable calendrical system of the Mayas if it is not a medium for transmitting exactly this message? What, if not vehicles for the same sort of bad news are the traditions of the four previous 'Suns' (or sometimes of the three previous 'Worlds') passed down in the Americas since time immemorial? By the same token, what might be the function of the great myths of precession which speak not just of previous cataclysms but of cataclysms to come and which (through the metaphor of the cosmic mill) link these earthly disasters to 'disturbances in the heavens'? Last but by no means least, what burning motive impelled the pyramid builders to erect, with such care, the powerful and mysterious edifices on the Giza plateau?

Yes, they were saying, 'Kilroy was here'.

And, yes, they found an ingenious way to tell us when they were here.

Of these things I have no doubt.

I am also impressed by the enormous lengths they went to to provide us with convincing proof that theirs was a serious and scientifically advanced civilization. And I am even more impressed by the sense of urgency—of a vitally important mission—that seems to have enlightened all their works and deeds.

I go on intuition again, not on evidence.

It's my guess that their underlying objective could have been to transmit a warning to the future, and that this warning could be to do with a global cataclysm, perhaps even a recurrence of the same cataclysm that so clearly devastated mankind at the end of the last Ice Age when 'Noah saw that the earth had tilted, and that its destruction was near, and cried out in a bitter voice: "Tell me what is being done on the earth that the earth is so afflicted and shaken ..." '[25] These words are from the Hebrew Book of Enoch, but similar afflictions and shakings have been foretold in all the Central American traditions that speak of the demise of the present epoch of the world—an epoch, as the reader will recall, in which 'the elders say [that] there will be a movement of the earth and from this we shall all perish.'[26]

The reader will also not have forgotten the date calculated by the Ancient Maya calendar for the end of the world:

> The day will be 4 Ahau 3 Kankin [corresponding to 23 December AD 2012], and it will be ruled by the Sun God, the ninth Lord of the Night. The moon will be eight days old, and it will be the third lunation in a series of six ...[27]

In the Mayan scheme of things we are already living in the last days of the earth.

In the Christian scheme of things too, the last days are understood to be upon us. According to the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society of Pennsylvania: 'This world will perish just as surely as did the world before the Flood ... Many things were foretold to occur during the last days, and all of these are being fulfilled. This means that the end of the world is near ...'[28]

Similarly the Christian psychic Edgar Cayce prophesied in 1934 that around the year 2000: 'There will be a shifting of the poles. There will be upheavals in the Arctic and the Antarctic that will make for the eruption of volcanoes in the Torrid areas ... The upper portion of Europe will be changed in the twinkling of an eye. The earth will be broken up in the western portion of America. The greater portion of Japan must go into the sea.'[29]

Curiously the epoch of the year 2000, which figures in these Christian prophecies, also coincides with the Last Time (or highest point) in the great upwards cycle of the belt stars of the Orion constellation, just as the epoch of the eleventh millennium BC coincided with the First Time (or lowest point) of that cycle.

And curiously, also, as we saw in Chapter Twenty-eight:

> A conjunction of five planets that can be expected to have profound gravitational > effects will take place on 5 May in the year 2000, when Neptune, Uranus, Venus, Mercury and Mars will align with the Earth on the other side of the sun, setting up a sort of cosmic tug-of-war ...[30]

Could the recondite influences of gravity, when combined with our planet's precessional wobble, the torsional effects of its axial rotation, and the rapidly growing mass and weight of the Antarctic ice-cap, be enough to spark off a full-scale crustal displacement?

We may never know, one way or another—unless it happens. Meanwhile, I do not think the Egyptian scribe Manetho was being less than literal when he spoke of a harsh and deadly cosmic power at work in the universe:

> Just as iron is likely to be attracted and led after the loadstone, but often turns away and is repelled in the opposite direction, so the salutary, good and rational movement of the world at one time attracts, conciliates and mollifies that harsh power; then again, when the latter has recovered itself, it overthrows the other and reduces it to helplessness ...[31]

In short, through metaphors and allegories, I suspect the ancients may have tried to find many ways to tell us exactly when—and why—the hammer of global destruction is going to strike again. I therefore think, after 12,500 years of the pendulum, that it would only be wise for us to devote more of our resources to studying the signs and messages that have come down to us from that dark and terrifying period of amnesia which our species calls prehistory.

A speeding up of physical research at the Giza plateau would also be highly desirable—not only by Egyptologists determined to resist any threats to the scholarly status quo but by eclectic teams of investigators who could bring some of the newer sciences to bear on the challenges of this most enigmatic and impenetrable of sites. The Chlorine-36 rock-exposure dating technique mentioned in Chapter Six, for example, looks like a particularly promising means of resolving the impasse over the antiquity of the Pyramids and the Sphinx.[32] Likewise, if the will is there, then a way can be found to get through to whatever lies beyond the little door concealed in the Great Pyramid 200 feet up the southern shaft of the Queen's Chamber. At the same time serious efforts should be made to investigate the contents of the large, square-edged and apparently man-made cavity in the bedrock, deep beneath the paws of the Sphinx, that was discovered when a seismic survey was carried out at the site in 1993.[33]

[32] The Chlorine-36 rock-exposure dating technique has been developed by Professor David Bowen of the Department of Earth Sciences at the University of Wales. In The Times of London, 1 December 1994, Brown observed:

'One way of resolving the controversy of the ages of the Sphinx and the Pyramids may be through the application of Chlorine-36 rock-exposure dating. This provides an estimate of the time that has elapsed since a rock was first exposed to the atmosphere. In the case of the Sphinx and the Pyramids this would be when the rocks were first exposed by quarrying activity ...'

In 1994 Bowen ran preliminary tests on the famous 'bluestones' of Stonehenge in England, hitherto believed to date to 2250 BC. What the tests showed was that these 123 four-ton monoliths could have been quarried during the last Ice Age—perhaps as early as 12000 BC. See The Times, London, 5 December.

Last but not least, far away from Giza, I suspect that our efforts might also be repaid if we were to undertake a proper investigation of the subglacial landscapes of Antarctica—much the most likely continent to hide the complete remains of a lost civilization. If we could establish what destroyed that civilization, then we might be in a better position to save ourselves from a similar cataclysmic fate.

In making these latter suggestions I am, of course, fully aware that there are many who will be scornful and will assert the uniformitarian view that 'all things will continue as they have done since the beginning of creation.'[34] But I am also aware that such 'scoffers in the last days'[35] are those who for one reason or another are deaf to the testimony of our forgotten ancestors. As we have seen, this testimony appears to be trying to tell us that a hideous calamity has indeed descended upon mankind from time to time, that on each occasion it has afflicted us suddenly, without warning and without mercy, like a thief in the night, and that it will certainly recur at some point in the future, obliging us—unless we are well prepared—to begin again like orphaned children in complete ignorance of our true heritage.

Hopi Indian Reservation, May 1994: Across the high plains of Arizona, for days and days and days, a desolate wind had been blowing. As we drove across those plains towards the tiny village of Shungopovi, I went over in my mind all I had seen and done in the previous five years: my travels, my research, the false starts and dead-ends I had encountered, the lucky breaks, the moments when everything had come together, the moments when everything seemed about to fall apart.

I had travelled a long road to get here, I realized—far longer than the 300-mile freeway that had whisked us up into these austere badlands from Phoenix, the state capital. Nor did I expect to return with any great degree of enlightenment.

Nevertheless, I had made this journey because the science of prophecy is still believed to be alive among the Hopi: Pueblo Indians, distantly related to the Aztecs of Mexico, whose numbers have been reduced by attrition and misery to barely 10,000.[36] Like the Ancient Maya whose descendants all across the Yucatan are convinced that the end of the world is coming in the year 2000 y pico (and a little),[37] the Hopi believe that we are walking in the last days, with a geological sword of Damocles hanging over us.[38] According to their myths, as we saw in Chapter Twenty-four:

> The first world was destroyed, as a punishment for human misdemeanours, by an all-consuming fire that came from above and below. The second world ended when the terrestrial globe toppled from its axis and everything was covered with ice. The third world ended in a universal flood. The present world is the fourth. Its fate will depend on whether or not its inhabitants behave in accordance with the Creator's plans ...'[39]

I had come to Arizona to see whether the Hopi thought we were behaving in accordance with the Creator's plans ...

The end of the world

The desolate wind, blowing across the high plains, shook and rattled the sides of the trailer-home we sat in. Beside me was Santha, who'd been everywhere with me, sharing the risks and the adventures, sharing the highs and the lows. Sitting across from us was our friend Ed Ponist, a medical-surgical nurse from Lansing, Michigan. A few years previously Ed had worked on the reservation for a while, and it was thanks to his contacts that we were now here. On my right was Paul Sifki, a ninety-six-year-old Hopi elder of the Spider clan, and a leading spokesman of the traditions of his people. Beside him was his grand-daughter Melza Sifki, a handsome middle-aged woman who had offered to translate.

'I have heard,' I said, 'that the Hopi believe the end of the world is coming. Is this true?'

Paul Sifki was a small, wizened man, nut-brown in colour, dressed in jeans and a cambric shirt. Throughout our conversation he never once looked at me, but gazed intently ahead, as though he were searching for a familiar face in a distant crowd.

Melza put my question to him and a moment later translated her grandfather's reply: 'He says, "why do you want to know"?'

I explained that there were many reasons. The most important was that I felt a sense of urgency: 'My research has convinced me that there was an advanced civilization—long, long ago—that was destroyed in a terrible cataclysm. I fear that our own civilization may be destroyed by a similar cataclysm ...'

There followed a long exchange in Hopi, then this translation: ‘He said that when he was a child, in the 1900s, there was a star that exploded—a star that had been up there in the sky for a long while ... And he went to his grandfather and asked him to explain the meaning of this sign. His grandfather replied: “This is the way our own world will end—engulfed in flames ... If people do not change their ways then the spirit that takes care of the world will become so frustrated with us that he will punish the world with flames and it will end just like that star ended.” That was what his grandfather said to him—that the earth would explode just like that exploding star ...’

‘So the feeling is that this world will end in fire ... And having viewed the world for the past ninety years, does he believe that the behaviour of mankind has improved or worsened?’

‘He says it has not improved. We’re getting worse.’

‘So in his opinion, then, the end is coming?’

‘He said that the signs are already there to be seen ... He said that nowadays nothing but the wind blows and that all we do is have a weapon pointed at one another. That shows how far apart we have drifted and how we feel towards each other now. There are no values any more—none at all—and people live any way they want, without morals or laws. These are the signs that the time has come ...’

Melza paused in her translation, then added on her own account: ‘This terrible wind. It dries things out. It brings no moisture. The way we see it, this kind of climate is a consequence of how we’re living today—not just us, but your people as well.’

I noticed that her eyes had filled with tears while she was talking. ‘I have a cornfield,’ she continued, ‘that’s really dry. And I look up into the sky and try to pray for rain, but there is no rain, no clouds even ... When we’re like this we don’t even know who we are.’

There was a long moment of silence and the wind rocked the trailer, blowing hard and steady across the mesa as evening fell around us.

I said quietly, ‘Please ask your grandfather if he thinks that anything can now be done for the Hopi and for the rest of mankind?’

‘The only thing he knows,’ Melza replied when she had heard his answer, ‘is that so long as the Hopi do not abandon their traditions they may be able to help themselves and to help others. They have to hold on to what they believed in the past. They have to preserve their memories. These are the most important things ... But my grandfather wants to tell you also, and for you to understand, that this earth is the work of an intelligent being, a spirit—a creative and intelligent spirit that has designed everything to be the way it is. My grandfather says that nothing is here just by chance, that nothing happens by accident—whether good or bad—and that there is a reason for everything that takes place ...’

At the millstone grinding

When human beings from around the globe, and from many different cultures, share a powerful and overwhelming intuition that a cataclysm is approaching, we are within our rights to ignore them. And when the voices of our distant ancestors, descending to us through myths and sacred architecture, speak to us of the physical obliteration of a great civilization in remote antiquity (and tell us that our own civilization is in jeopardy), we are entitled, if we wish, to stop our ears ...

So it was, the Bible says, in the antediluvian world: ‘For in those days, before the Flood, people were eating, drinking, taking wives, taking husbands, right up to the moment that Noah went into the Ark, and they suspected nothing till the flood came and swept all away.’[40]

In the same manner it has been prophesied that the next global destruction will fall upon us suddenly ‘at an hour we do not suspect, like lightning striking in the east and flashing far into the west ... The sun will be darkened, the moon will lose its brightness, the stars will fall from the sky and the powers of heaven will be shaken ... Then of two men in the fields, one is taken, one left; and of two women at the millstone grinding, one is taken, one left ...’[41]

What has happened before can happen again. What has been done before can be done again.

And perhaps there is, indeed, nothing new under the sun ...

FIRE FROM THE SKY:

Battle of Harvest Moon & True Story of Space Shuttles

PART 1:

As I begin writing this report [1994], the news is telling about a strange USAIR airplane crash in Pennsylvania. Next day a plane crashed in Moscow. CNN told about a fireball that was reported from Bakersfield California, to Medford Oregon. They said it occurred about 6 or 6:15 in the morning on Saturday, September 10 (1994) and was so bright that the light shining through windows woke up some people. They showed a house in San Rafael with a hole in the roof from a piece of something falling from the sky.

An Ariane rocket was launched from French Guyana and was lost, a day before. Several earthquakes have occurred in California, including one that CNN showed on a map, southwest of Lake Tahoe. About 15 minutes later, CNN began telling about the Space Shuttle firing lasers at Earth and showed a view of Earth, with Lake Tahoe in the upper right corner of the screen. If you put the two together, then you see that the Columbia Space Shuttle is firing laser beams at Earth "for environmental purposes," precisely where the earthquakes are occurring. The President went to Camp David , then when the President returned (?), a plane crashed into the White House. Later he gave a speech in a room of the White House, then just after he left a fire broke out in the room. Rosh Hashanah is recently passed (September 6-7, 1994), and Yom Kippur is coming up (September 15, 1994). The President has ordered 8,300 Navy, 1,800 Marine and 4,000 Army personnel along with 15 or 20 warships to [prepare to] invade Haiti.

SECRET WARS BETWEEN POWERS THAT BE

If what you are about to read does not scare the pants off you, then you must not be wearing any. Pay attention and this information may save your life. The purpose of this article is to inform you briefly about some of the secret wars that are going on between the Powers-That-Be that are struggling for control of the world.

In 1978, I was head of a Mensa special interest group called the Doomsday Club News and Intelligence Report. I wrote a newsletter for the Club. In the May, 1978, issue I said:

"WAR is an ever-present danger, much closer than most people realize. Now Russia is testing 'killer satellites' and laser and particle beam weapons, while the U.S. is undertaking a major program to develop counterbeam weapons - a real Star Wars battle is taking shape. War in space is now possible and the likelihood of it grows. A program is now under way to determine the feasibility of using the Space Shuttle for defense purposes." What I did not know at that time, was the fact that the space war had already started. This manuscript will provide more details.

In the same newsletter, I mentioned that Richard Helms of the CIA had been fired by President Carter, and recommended that the reader contact the Security & Intelligence Fund (at address included) for more information. I listed the staff members a s James Angleton, Elbridge Durbrow, Brig Gen. Robert Richardson, Former Secy. of Navy and Treasury Robert Anderson, former Chief of Naval Operations Admiral G. W. Anderson, and other names that become important later in this story.

SHIFTING DEFENSE STRATEGIES

On page 10, I said: "The U.S. is shifting its defense to sub-launched ballistics missiles and air-launched cruise missiles, as silo-based ICBMs become vulnerable to a pre-emptive first strike by the Soviet Union." The B-52, F-14, F-15, and F-16 will be equipped with cruise missiles over the next five years, in the Pacific Region. This posture indicates admission that nothing standing still in the U.S. can be protected - only aircraft and submarines have a chance of surviving a first strike.

"Independent congressional studies already have been completed that show that by 1980 the Russians could conduct a first strike against the Minuteman force with a strong probability of being able to destroy the majority of U.S. ICBMs, and that by as early as 1981 the U.S. will no longer have a sufficient deterrent to preclude a Soviet first strike." I continued with a quote from Aviation Week & Space Technology, (p. 14, Apr. 3, 1978), about the numbers of missiles that we and Russia had. Later on the page I mentioned about Defense Secretary Harold Brown proposing a sharp increase in civil defense spending, including funding a study to plan faster evacuation of cities during threat of a nuclear attack. What was going on? Why was the U.S. shifting its defense strategy, and suddenly emphasizing the importance of civil defense?

In my July issue of the DCN&IR newsletter, I quoted General George S. Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who said: "What the Soviets are doing is unsettling, principally because none of us know why." I said: "General Alexander Haig, Supreme Allied Commander in Europe , warned Washington in March of the fundamental change in the Warsaw Pact Air Arm to "an offensive character." I continued by saying that I felt that Russia was preparing to defend itself from the threat of a rearmed Germany. I mentioned that most of the U.S. nuclear force was on German soil. On page 7 I said that " Japan , for the first time since World War II, has ordered its armed forces to prepare defense plans to protect itself from foreign attack."

On page 10, I quoted Alexander Solzhenitsyn as saying, "No weapons, no matter how powerful, can help the West until it overcomes its loss of willpower. To defend oneself, one must be ready to die."

PARTICLE BEAM TECHNOLOGY RIDICULED

Th cover headline article of my October 1978 issue was NUCLEAR WEAPONS - SOON OBSOLETE! The following is what that article said:

General George Keegan - grad of Harvard, flew 56 combat missions in WWII, earned Distinguished Service Cross in Vietnam , Executive VP of U.S. Strategic Institute, Chief of U.S. Air Force Intelligence. About two years ago he retired from the Air Force, because he saw some critical dangers to the U.S. that he was not allowed to reveal to the public. He tried to warn the Powers in the White House but they laughed at him. So about 19 months ago he made the first public references to secret Russian research on charged-particle beam weapons. Aviation Week & Space Technology magazine followed up on his information and determined that he was essentially correct. However, President Carter and Defense Secretary Harold Brown, both badly briefed by the CIA, ridiculed Keegan.

U.S. scientists at Lawrence Livermore Lab (bicycle riding distance from me) undertook Project See-Saw to determine if the U.S. could build particle beam weapons. The decision was that it was presently impossible to build such a weapon and since we are so far ahead of the Soviets technologically, it was ridiculous to think they were building one. Keegan revealed his findings on Soviet particle beam developments to CIA head William Colby in 1975. Colby convened the Nuclear Intelligence Panel which determined that, since the US could not build such a weapon, it was impossible that the Soviets were doing it. Colby never passed the information from the Air Force intelligence on to the President or Secretary of Defense.

Keegan retired and started making the information public, through the American Security Council (of which I am a member of the National Advisory Board) and other groups. His story was greeted with high-level official sneering, the most acrimonious sneers coming from the self-styled "nuclear engineer" President Jimmy Carter and Defense Secretary Harold Brown (formerly from Lawrence Livermore Lab). "But despite the official denials, the Soviets continued their work, carrying at least eight electron-beam experiments into space on board Cosmos, Soyuz and Salyut spacecraft..." (AW & ST) and conducting tests at Semipalatinsk and Sarova. "At the same time, younger U.S. physicists, uninhibited by the ego problems of their elders, also were making progress on the key techniques required for beam weapons development. □□Now the tide has turned. A full-scale U.S. effort to tackle the technology required to determine the feasibility of beam weapons development is being organized at the highest level in the Pentagon. Even the most stubborn skeptics now acknowledge that leaving this field uncontested to the Soviets is a risk the U.S. cannot afford to take. Because of the extreme public embarrassment this series [of articles] will bring to... President Jimmy Carter, and Defense Secretary Harold Brown, who saw his contemporaries try and fail in Project See-Saw, there is still an attempt to shroud the program in official secrecy" (Aviation Week & Space Technology, Oct. 2, 1978).

The article states, "Experts on Capitol Hill, who have surveyed all the evidence including secret data not available to us, have concluded that Gen. Keegan's assessment was essentially correct..." Edward Teller has informed key senators that Gen. Keegan's analysis was right on the core of the matter."

The Soviets have already successfully tested particle beam weapons (as has France !). " U.S. particle beam weapons experts who have access to U.S. intelligence information and personal contacts with Russian physicists involved in magnetic and plasma physics programs believe the Soviets will field a ground-based proton beam weapon between 1980-1983."

SIPAPU PROJECT

The Pentagon has initiated a program called "Chair Heritage" to field our own system by about 1982. It formerly was mostly a Navy program at the Naval Post-graduate facility in Monterey CA, but is now being combined with the Army SIPAPU project (space beams, as opposed to beams carried on Navy vessels) and others - it seems that now everybody who is anybody is getting involved (Lawrence Livermore Lab, Sandia Corp., Defense Nuclear Agency, CIA, Hughes Aircraft, Lockheed, University of Texas , Austin Research Associates, etc.).

If you remember, Russia beat us into space with Sputnik, then we went into a crash program to get ahead of them. Vannevar Bush once said that it was impossible to build a ballistics missile capable of going 3000 miles, but within 10 years Russia had them and we were just beginning a crash program to catch up.

Now we are once again in a race for strategic superiority, but this time Russia may field their system in 2 years while it appears that we require at least 5 years - but then things can change quickly.

A problem we now have is the top leadership - the President and Secretary of Defense - may hold back progress because they do not like to admit their mistake. In the past, there were several intelligence services, all in competition with each other trying to be the most accurate and when one service goofed, the other pointed it out. Now, Carter has unified the intelligence services under Stansfield Turner and all intelligence reports must be through Turner before they get to the Defense Secretary or President from men such as Gen. Keegan, Gen. Singlaub, etc. It also creates the chance that the President can be considerably misinformed or uninformed. This, in the long run, could be an even greater danger to the U.S. than the particle beam weapon!

PARTICLE BEAM CAPABILITIES

So what is a particle beam weapon? It is similar to a laser, but it is not a laser. Lasers shoot a beam of electromagnetic radiation (light), while particle beam weapons shoot a beam of sub-atomic particles (electrons, protons, ions, etc.). What this means is that NUCLEAR WEAPONS MAY SOON BECOME OBSOLETE.

Whoever puts satellites with particle beam weapons into orbit first (property controlled by complex sensors and computers) can control the world. ANY GUIDED MISSILE OR AIRCRAFT CAN THEN BE ZAPPED OUT OF EXISTENCE IN A FRACTION OF A SECOND AFTER LAUNCH.

Under those conditions, we will still have nuclear bombs, but it would be impossible to deliver them against an enemy who is protected by particle beams.

An editorial in AW & ST said, "For beam weapons offer the promise of reducing strategic nuclear weapons to a negligible factor in the future. If successfully deployed, beam weapons can end the long reign of nuclear terror introduced by the ballistic missile and its thermonuclear warhead. If the Soviets achieve this capability first, it will give them enormous crucial leverage in imposing their political will on the rest of the world. If the U.S. achieves it first, there will be no need for flimsy SALT agreements, and in a dead heat, the citizens of this planet can look forward to a shifting of international tensions from the strategic nuclear area to more conventional and less devastating weapons."

If you want to know what particle beam weapons are like, just watch "Star Wars" or Battlestar Galactica."

This is the end of the quote from my 1978 newsletter. And now, as Paul Harvey would say, for the rest of the story!

Russia launched the Intercosmos 17 octagon space vehicle on September 26, 1977. The Encyclopedia Brittanica says its purpose was for "international scientific research in charged particles and micrometeorites." What, a charged particle satellite? Already in space? What did we just read above? "If the Soviets achieve this capability FIRST, it will give them enormous crucial leverage in imposing their political will on the rest of the world."

WAR IN SPACE

The Battle of the Harvest Moon began on September 17, 1977. Russia began destroying our spy satellites using "killer satellites." On September 27, Russia destroyed our SECRET MOON BASE. On September 29, 1977, Russia launched the Salyut 6 manned space station into orbit.

First, let's explore a little background. The book War In Space by James Canan, 1982, Harper & Row, p. 153 says:

"High-energy weapons, their perils and their promise, began penetrating the congressional consciousness in the late seventies, and it was Major General George J. Keegan USAF - 'crazy George' to his critic, 'brilliant George' to his admirers - who started it all. Keegan undoubtedly harbored one of the very highest IQs ever to grace the military establishment, which is, stereotypes to the contrary, saying quite a lot.

Keegan was in Air Force intelligence for many years, and in charge of it, starting in 1972, for five... By the mid-seventies, Keegan's Air Force intelligence empire, as his critics dubbed it, had a population of about 50,000 and was spending nearly $3 billion a year. Keegan had access to HUMINT sources inside Russia and elsewhere, to all the albums of the photorecce satellites and all the tapes of the ELINT satellites."

P. 155: "In 1972, a young civilian scientist in the employ of Air Force intelligence had come to Keegan with 'evidence of a Soviet effort to develop one of the greatest strategic weapons of all time - a beam weapon of great, high energy that would be used to destroy ballistic missiles in flight for the ultimate defense of the Soviet Union.'

Having spent three years studying nuclear physics at the graduate level, Keegan took it upon himself to team up with that young scientist in the examination of evidence gleaned from unclassified Soviet scientific papers. He concluded that the young man was onto something, and he put his troops to work. With Keegan in direct control, an Air Force intelligence team sifted and collated reports from inside Russia and from satellite photographs and communications intercepts concerning a sprawling complex of buildings, pipes, and what-not at Semipalatinsk in south-central Soviet Asia.

What the Soviets had built there - starting with their underground positioning of two huge spheres in the early 1970s - was a facility for the testing of charged-particle beams... a sizable segment of the U.S. scientific community jumped all over Keegan, accusing him of trafficking in paranoia."

P. 157: "In 1974, two years after General Keegan began sounding off in top-secret circles about the Russian work at Semipalatinsk , particle beams came back into vogue at the Pentagon. A Defense Department document described what happened: the Navy initiated its "Chair Heritage' program involving electron beam development [for] 'application to defense of ships against all forms of attack by aircraft and missiles... The Army also began a separate program to demonstrate the production of high-current ion beams.'

The first Army program, called 'SIPAPU' (an American Indian word for sacred fire) is controlled by the Ballistic Missile Defense Command at Redstone Arsenal, Alabama, and centered at the Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory. Chair Heritage, transferred to DARPA control in 1980, is being conducted by the Lawrence Radiation Laboratory at Livermore..." I trust that some of my readers will take note of that word "Sipapu."

SECRET PROJECTS

Until mid-1979, I worked for Control Data Corporation in Sunnyvale , California, in the "skunk works" division. One of the projects on which I worked was Chair Heritage.

For confirmation for researchers, I will provide the following information: My boss was Phil Myers. Program Managers were JM Moore (TIGS, IOS projects), Jack Crawford, JL Smith, CR Shuler, LH Woodward, WA Osborne, and others.

Some of the projects were code named STC, RFREDA, BRONCO, MARE ISLAND , A4, LATFAC, DALFAC, RKYDSO, etc. It would do you no good to know what these names stood for - TIGS stood for Terminal Integrated Graphics, IOS was Integrated Operating Systems, DALFAC was Dallas Facility, etc.

Just suffice to say that we had the world's most powerful computers (Star 100 which was a Cray computer, etc.) and we were involved in the U.S. 's most secret projects. Our customers included the weather facility at Monterey CA, (weather satellites do more than observe the weather), Cheyenne Mountain in Colorado, DARPA (Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency), NASA, and, oh yes, THE IRS. One of my friends spent all his free time away from the job studying anti-gravity, so it was not too hard to guess what his job concerned.

General Keegan and Carter's Secretary of Defense Harold Brown did not see eye to eye - could the fact that Brown's father was a Russian Jew (I forget his real name) have had anything to do with it? As a military officer, Keegan was forbidden to say anything to the public, so in January 1977 Keegan resigned and set up the civilian American Security Council and began traveling over the country giving speeches to try to awaken everybody. He failed.

Keegan died in March, 1993. His obituary in the New York Times said, "He asserted that the Soviet Union was building a civil-defense system that would ensure a reasonable rate of survival from nuclear exchange. He also believed that the Russians were close to deploying futuristic charged particle-beam weapons." The book Deep Black: Space Espionage and National Security by William E. Burrows, Random House, a history of spy satellites, has more information on Keegan.

SKYLAB MISSIONS

Have you ever REALLY wondered why the U.S. never went to the moon again? Do you remember Skylab? The official story is Skylab was launched May 14, 1973. It was to be America 's manned space station. On 5/25/73 a Saturn rocket carried the first crew (Conrad, Kerwin & Weitz) to Skylab, a mission that lasted nearly a month.

The second crew (Alan Bean, Owen Garriott, and Jack Lousma) was launched 7/28/73, a mission that lasted nearly two months. Both missions were plagued by failures, leaks and other problems.

The third manned Skylab mission began November 14 with Gerald Carr, William Pogue and Edward Gibson. It was said that the mission was delayed six days because of cracks in the Saturn rocket's tail fins.

Russia had launched a space station on April 3, but on April 14 it blew up, what was described as a "catastrophic malfunction."

"BAD LUCK" AT NASA

After the amazing successes of the Apollo missions, for some reason NASA started having all kinds of bad luck. "In the U.S. the success of the first flight of the Space Shuttle orbiter was clouded by two catastrophic failures of previously reliable rocket launch vehicles.

After preliminary taxi test on the runway and flights mated to its Boeing 747 jet carrier plane, the Shuttle orbiter Enterprise was pronounced ready for release from its mother plane. On August 12, at Edwards Air Force Base in California, astronauts Fred W. Haise, Jr., and C. Gordon Fullerton guided the Enterprise to a 'superslick' landing on the floor of Rogers Dry Lake 5 minutes and 23 seconds after being released from the 747.

A second flight, with astronauts Joe H. Engle and Richard H. Truly, on September 13 was equally successful. Haise and Fullerton put the Enterprise through yet another landing ten days later. An ill omen appeared at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida in mid-May, when a small, strap-on solid-propellant booster rocket fell from its bracket on the first stage of a Delta vehicle and damaged it. The booster was being prepared to launch the Orbital Test Satellite for ESA.

The satellite was destroyed on September 13 when its Delta launch vehicle exploded one minute after lift-off, apparently because one of its solid-propellant strap-on rockets detonated. Only 16 days later, a Centaur booster with an Intellsat 4A communications satellite on board also went up in flames only one minute after launch" (Encyclopedia Brittanica Book of the Year, 1978, p. 638.

Friends, it's time you learned the real story. In October, 1977, a newly operational Russian Cosmos Interceptor shot down Skylab. Skylab, along with its crew of five American astronauts secretly aboard, died in a giant fireball over the United States. NASA immediately initiated a prolonged cover-up of what had happened. How do I know? Suffice it to say, I have a very high-up source of information.

PART 2:

NASA wanted everyone to forget about that mysterious headline-making fireball, so they pretended that Skylab was still in orbit but sinking unexpectedly. NASA used stories about the Space Shuttle as part of their Skylab cover-up. They pretended that perhaps the Shuttle would come along in time to save Skylab. This was simply a double lie by NASA. First, Skylab could never be saved because it had already been destroyed. Secondly, the United States was in no position at that time to launch the Shuttle or anything else of a military nature into space. Russia was deploying her secret new Space Triad of advanced manned space weapons.

Russian Cosmos Interceptors had starting sweeping the skies clear of American Spy Satellites, and Russian hovering electrogravitic weapons platforms, the Cosmospheres, were making headlines by creating enormous air booms along the coasts of America , and still do so. All of these things took place just as America's Space Shuttle Program was getting off the ground.

AMERICAN BOLSHEVIKS - MASTERS OF DECEPTION

The result was a complete reorganization of the Shuttle Program. The old plans to bathe it in continuous publicity were tossed. The "Bolsheviks" in our government, who had replaced the Rockefeller cartel in many areas of power, cast a net of secrecy over all the new military plans. We were never told about the capabilities of the training Shuttle Enterprise, and we were never told about the many things which were going on at White Sands in the military Shuttle Program. By keeping these things secret, the Bolsheviks placed themselves in a powerful position to deceive us and the deceit has continued non-stop.

We were never told about the modified NASA 747 which carried a complete replica of the crew quarters and cargo bay of a Shuttle - and still does. We were unaware that that airplane, originally intended for training, was to become a Bolshevik tool of deception against us. When we saw video tapes of astronauts in the simulated Shuttle cockpit, we naturally thought it was the real thing. Seeing a notebook float in mid-air for a few seconds next to the astronauts, we were supposed to think they were weightless because they were in orbit.

We were given no clue that those moments of weightlessness had taken place months earlier in a mock-up. Further, what would you do if you were an astronaut faced with the fact that Russia has just turned the corner and can destroy your nation with one blast? Do you not think that a good patriot would go along with the game? However, that brings us to a serious problem - perhaps the pictures fooled a lot of Americans and the world - they did not fool the new rulers of Russia. They had learned the previous fall what the flight of the * Columbia * was really all about and, when the Columbia was launched on April 12, the Russians were ready and waiting!

LAUNCH OF THE COLUMBIA INTO ODD ORBIT

The real mission plan was for a short mission. The astronauts were supposed to get into orbit and deploy the military satellite from the Columbia's cargo bay very quickly; then they were to return to Earth - not aboard the Shuttle but in a very special re-entry capsule. Two days later they were supposed to land the disguised Shuttle Enterprise at Edwards Air Force Base as the final act in the falsified drama staged for our benefit.

For the first time in three years the Pentagon was hoping to get a Spy Satellite into orbit that could not be shot down immediately by Russia. This attempt was destined to continue by our nerdniks into disaster after disaster.

You must know what happened in the front end to have any idea what continues. If you can think back to American space launches of the past, some may have noticed something very unusual about the launch of the Columbia. In the past, manned space launches from Cape Canaveral were always made toward the southeast, toward the equator, but not so with the Columbia. It was launched to the northeast, away from the equator. The reason for this was the secret space reconnaissance mission of the Columbia.

In its public news releases, NASA told everyone that Columbia was launching into a 44-degree orbit - that is, it would never go farther north or south than 44 degrees above and below the equator. But the actual orbit chosen for the Columbia was a 69-degree orbit. A 69-degree orbit was chosen because it would take the * Columbia , and the Spy Satellite inside it, all the way north to the Arctic Circle and beyond. That is the kind of orbit that is necessary if a spy satellite is to fly reconnaissance over Russia.

The northeast launch of the Columbia was done in order to enable the Spy Satellite to start gathering data over Russia only minutes after the Columbia reached orbit. Time was of the essence in any attempt to spy on Russia. Every American spy satellite launched at Russia during the prior three years had been blinded or shot down before gathering much data.

The secret flight plan for the * Columbia * was completely different from what NASA claimed in public. The plan called for Columbia to be launched on an initial northeast course in the general direction of Bermuda, then roughly 2-1/2 minutes after launch, Columbia was to begin an unorthodox course change - a wide sweeping turn into the north. This unprecedented curving launch was intended as an evasive sneak past any Russian Cosmospheres that might be waiting overhead. Still accelerating on its curving course, the Columbia was supposed to pass about 100 miles east of Cape Hatteras, North Carolina. Roughly 200 miles east of Washington, D.C., the Shuttle's main engines were to cut off. After coasting in silence for a few seconds, the fuel tank was scheduled to cut loose as the *Columbia passed 100 miles east of New Jersey.

For the next two minutes the Shuttle and its fuel tank were to be coasting onward past the east tip of Long Island , over Boston , and onward toward Maine. During that time the Shuttle was supposed to maneuver away from the fuel tank, using small maneuvering jets.

Finally, just as the Columbia passed over New Brunswick, Canada, the flight plan called for the orbital maneuvering engines to be fired. Somewhere over the Labrador Sea, flying upside-down, the Columbia was scheduled to reach Earth orbit. As soon as it did so, the flight plan called for astronauts Young and Crippen to go to work fast.

COLUMBIA'S SPY MISSION

In less than ten minutes time they were supposed to open up the cargo bay doors and turn on the sensors of the Spy Satellite resting inside. As they did these things, the Columbia was to be racing over the south tip of Greenland, out over the middle of the Denmark Strait between Greenland and Iceland, above the Arctic Circle, and then dipping back southward toward northern Norway, Finland, and Russia. According to the flight plan, the * Columbia * was scheduled to cross the Russian border just south of the strategic Kola Peninsula. This would be only some less than 23 minutes after lift-off. At that instant initial reconnaissance over Russia was to be under way. The Spy Satellite inside the cargo bay, even though not yet deployed, would have had a perfect view downward through the open doors of the upside-down shuttle.

The Columbia was intended to fly over a course across Russia that began just west of the strategic White Sea in extreme Northwestern Russia. From there the planned course of the Columbia was to take it southeastward over some 2500 miles of strategic Russian territory. During the first minute alone, the satellite was expected to see parts of the highly sensitive Kola Peninsula , the White Sea , including the super secret submarine yards near Kazan, one of the bases of Russia 's flying ABM system. This system uses charged particle beams carried by supersonic TU-144 Transports.

Toward the end of the first pass over Russia the Spy Satellite was expected to gather data on two more of Russia's four Cosmodromes - those of Baiokonur and Tyuratam. In between, numerous other war targets were also to come under scrutiny. The spy satellite in the * Columbia 's* cargo bay was expected to see all that during its very first pass over Russian territory. It would all take only 8-1/2 minutes. Then the * Columbia * would have crossed the border with Afghanistan , heading toward India. Barely 10 minutes later, the Spy Satellite was to be radioing its data down to the American receivers at Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean.

Now, that WAS the plan. The military planners were confident that their Spy Satellite would get at least this planned first look at Russia. They were sure that * Columbia 's* curving launch and the short time involved would prevent Russia from thwarting the mission. * Columbia * took off from Cape Canaveral at 7:00 A.M. Eastern Time, that Sunday morning. By 7:23 * Columbia * was expected to be over Russia already. By 7:31 * Columbia * was expected to be leaving Russian skies, and by 7:45 that same Sunday morning the military planners expected to have their first reconnaissance data from Russia.

RUSSIANS FOIL PLAN

The plan sounded plausible but the 'planners' were falling victim to the very intelligence gap which they themselves created in America years before. Russian Intelligence agents were able to learn the general outlines of the * Columbia * mission plan some six months prior to launch. It is worse today, for there are more KGB agents in the CIA than there are "loyal" Americans.

Fully a month before the public roll-out of the *Columbia * at the Cape in November of 1980, the Russian Space Command was studying the problem. There was no question about one thing: The * Columbia 's* mission could not be allowed to succeed.

Given even a shred of up-to-date reconnaissance data, the Bolsheviks in America were determined to set off a nuclear war. Even so, there was a question about the best way to spoil the mission. Several possibilities were considered, including sabotage or simply blasting the * Columbia * out of the sky. All were rejected because they shared one weakness. Each alternative would halt one Shuttle mission, but it would not stop the Shuttle Program as a whole, and Russia 's goal was to completely shut down the Space Shuttle Program.

At last they hit upon the solution. What was needed was a Space Age version of the famous U-2 incident of two decades prior. In the waning days of the Eisenhower Administration, Russia had publicly accused the United States of invading its air space with spy flights. That was before the era of Spy Satellites, and invading other countries' air space was a serious charge in the eyes of the world.

American spokesmen tried to diffuse the growing furor while carefully avoiding a definitive denial of the charges; but the Russians kept it up. Finally President Eisenhower became so exasperated that he flatly denied, in public, that America was flying spy planes over Russia.

That was exactly what the Russians were waiting for. The Russians promptly did what American Intelligence specialists thought they could not do - they shot down a high-flying U-2 on a flight over Russia. The name of the CIA pilot, the late Francis Gary Powers, filled the headlines world-wide overnight. The Russians had made a liar of the President of the United States.

A summit had been scheduled between President Eisenhower and Nikita Kruschev, but the Russians icily called it off. In studying the * Columbia * situation, the Russians decided to make the focus of similar nature. After all, all they would need would be to land that Shuttle intact.

Russia protested continuously about the military nature of the Shuttle Program, and perceived they would be able to shock the world with the truth of it by simply proving it. They would put the crashed Shuttle on public display together with its nuclear-powered, laser-firing Spy Satellite. The Kremlin liked the plan, and agreed to it. To further emphasize the parallels with the 1960 U-2 incident, Russia had recently proposed a summit with the United States. The plan was to withdraw the summit proposal in protest after shooting down the * Columbia. *

The Russian Space Command went to work several months earlier to get ready. They were faced with a big order: to bring down the * Columbia * on Russian Territory without totally destroying it. As recently as only a year prior it would have been totally impossible to even consider such a thing. However, the Russians now had a new space tool to do the job. It was the third version of the Russian levitating weapons platform, the Cosmosphere. They were and are called "Super Heavies" by the Russian Space Command.

"SUPER HEAVIES" MAKE READY

The Russian Super Heavy Cosmospheres were still considered experimental in nature but had vast improvements integrated since the early 1980s. Even so, by '80/81 the Russians had already built seven of them. In terms of volume, they are bigger than the Goodyear Blimp, they are even bigger than the biggest dirigibles ("zeppelins") of the '30s. They could carry a payload of more than 50 tons, far more than the Space Shuttle; and they were equipped with powerful electromagnetic propulsion which could take the Cosmosphere all the way to orbital speed. In short, the jumbo Cosmosphere was actually Russia 's Space Shuttle. It was fully operational.

In order to carry out their attack on the Space Shuttle * Columbia ,* Russia 's entire fleet of seven jumbo Cosmospheres were made ready. Five were outfitted with special grappling equipment to enable them to seize a very large object in space. The other two were outfitted with neutron particle beam weapons. These weapons were the same type as were used in the " Battle of the Harvest Moon" in September 1977.

* COLUMBIA * BLASTS OFF

At 7:00 A.M. Sunday morning, April 12, 1981, the rocket engines of the Space Shuttle * Columbia * roared to life. Moments later the giant solid boosters were fired, and the * Columbia * took off. As it climbed, it rolled around and started leaning into the flight path toward space. As we watched on television, it rapidly dwindled off into the northeast. The solid boosters separated and peeled away to each side. Moments later the * Columbia * vanished from the TV screen.

The television scene then shifted to the alleged Mission Control in Houston - all of this had been set up well in advance. Yes, I know you will find this hard to believe!

The NASA computer-controlled map started tracking the alleged course of the Columbia. According to the map, * Columbia * was heading out over the Atlantic toward Bermuda ; but at that moment, free of the solid boosters, * Columbia * was already starting its long sweeping curve to the north. One hundred fifty miles east of Charleston South Carolina, Russia's fleet of 7 jumbo Cosmospheres were hovering high over the ocean as the Space Shuttle approached on its elaborate curving path, upside-down with the huge fuel tank on top.

COSMOSPHERES INTERCEPT SHUTTLE

The two Cosmospheres armed with neutron beams closed in on the * Columbia * from below and a bit to the rear, where they could not be seen by Young or Crippen. The other five jumbo Cosmopheres with their grappling equipment, flew in formation above and well behind the fuel tank to be out of the line of fire. The Cosmopheres pace the Shuttle until it reached a predetermined altitude and speed.

Then the armed Cosmospheres opened up with their neutron beams. Firing at point-blank range, each Cosmosphere fired just two bursts from its beam weapon, "WHOOMP! WHOOMP!" The first salvo flooded the cockpit area and an area near the engines in the rear. Young and Crippen died instantly, the neutron radiation having totally disrupted all activity of their nervous systems, brains, eyes, and hearts.

At the same time the Shuttle's engines shut down. A fraction of a second later, the second salvo flooded neutron radiation into the nose and an area beneath the cargo bay. These shots were calculated to derange and shut down the * Columbia 's* flight computers - that is, all the computers except one. The Russians wanted the backup computer to take over and do its job - that is, make an emergency automatic re-entry and crash landing in Russia. They anticipated that it would do so because the backup computer is heavily shielded against radiation. The shielding is a material more efficient than lead. It is GOLD!

The Russians fully expected that "Gold Computer," as it is known in certain circles, would take over after the engines shut down.

Within some 10 seconds after the engines shut down, the fuel tank, still a third full, was automatically cast loose. The Gold Computer was now flying the Shuttle. The five jumbo Cosmospheres with grappling equipment, fastened onto the fuel tank. Then using their powerful electromagnetic propulsion, they veered away with the tank. From its northeasterly course, the tank was swerved around over the North Atlantic in a great arc until it was heading southeast instead. The Cosmospheres then accelerated to orbital speed and cast the fuel tank loose.

Three years prior to this the First Cosmospheres had sen a message by way of enormous air booms along America 's East Coast. Do you remember hearing the discussion on the news about the mysterious "sonic booms" that were being heard along the coast? Now Russia 's newest Cosmospheres were using the Shuttle fuel tank to send a chilling new message to America 's Bolshevik war planners.

Meanwhile the armed Cosmospheres followed the *Columbia * itself. Having had its engines shut down prematurely, the * Columbia * was well below orbital speed. It was following a ballistic path, just like an ICBM, into the heart of Russia. It looked as though the Russian plan was going to work to perfection - but then the unexpected happened.

A NO-WIN SITUATION

One of * Columbia 's* deranged computers apparently began to function. The brief shut-down had thrown it out of synchronization with the Gold Computer, so the two computers apparently did not communicate with one another. As the * Columbia * passed over the border of Russia , it was flying right-side-up instead of upside-down under control of the Gold Computer.

But the other computer opened up the cargo bay doors right on schedule. As the Shuttle began to re-enter over Russia , hot air flooded the cargo bay. Heat sensors in the Spy Satellite detected the heat build-up, which was programmed into the Satellite's computer as a sign of "attack damage." Finally, the temperature built up to a critical point, activating a self-destruct circuit in the Satellite. The Spy Satellite exploded, blowing the * Columbia * to bits.

The Russians had hoped for a crash landing in recognizable form. Instead, the * Columbia * ended up in wreckage strewn along a line some 85 miles long in central Russia southeast of the City of Kazan and the citizens had to be told a research satellite had fallen out of orbit. As it turned out, neither the American Bolsheviks nor the Russians got what they wanted. But there were destined to be more attempts, each just as foolish as the one before it.

PART 3:

On November 24, 1980, America 's Manned Space Program suddenly started showing signs of life after near death. It was the day when the Space Shuttle * Columbia * was rolled out into public view at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida. It was the first public appearance by the Shuttle in almost two years. The Shuttle arrived at Cape Canaveral two years prior, in March of 1979.

From then until November of 1980 the Shuttle * Columbia * remained in hiding in a very large metal cocoon called the "Orbiter Processing Facility," but on November 24 suddenly the cocoon opened up and out popped the Space Shuttle.

It was not a very long trip set for that day - about 300 yards to the nearby Vehicle Assembly Building, where it disappeared once again as if by magic. For the first time in nearly six years the United States was committing itself in public to manned missions into space. The roll-out of the * Columbia * took almost everyone by surprise.

America 's Space Shuttle Program was a full three years behind schedule. Since late in 1977 we heard about nothing but problems, delays, and more problems with the Space Shuttle. In fact, just five days before, Dr. George Low, former director of the Apollo Moon Program, summarized it all in total disgust when he said, "Today I wonder whether we could start another Apollo, much less accomplish it."

The Apollo moon landing program was another program filled with lies, smoke and mirrors, but I will save that story for some other time. For now, the centerfold of Spotlight newspaper for September 5, 1994, will give you some hint of the lies involved.

POST-LUNAR "QUARANTINE" FARCE

Another recent source of information on this subject was an article called "The Great Lunar Quarantine" in Air & Space magazine for February/March 1994. If you remember, when the moon-landing astronauts came back they had to be quarantined for three weeks. Thinking minds questioned the reasons for this.

On page 39, the article states: "The problem was that [the quarantine] was all show," says Gerald Wasserburg, John D. MacArthur professor of geology and geophysics at the California Institute of Technology, who is still fuming 25 years later. "It really didn't prevent contamination. The people from Fort Detrick [the Army's biological warfare facility], who really knew how to contain pathogens, though it was ludicrous. It was all part of a fraud, but it couldn't be stopped because it was coming from such a high political level. Do you suppose there was some other reason for the debriefing, er, quarantining?

SPACE SHUTTLE COUNTDOWN TO NUCLEAR WAR

After three years on hold, the countdown was under way. There was a total air of urgency about it. Corners were being cut, safety precautions were being overstepped, unheard of risks were being taken; and when reporters asked why these things were being done, they received only double talk instead of answers.

The Space Shuttle was the most complex American spacecraft built to that point. There were more things to go wrong than ever before, and the entire future of America 's Manned Space Program depended on the shuttle. In fact, we were told that within a few years the Shuttle would be launching practically all American satellites.

As far as we were told, America had put all its eggs in one basket. The old NASA would have proceeded step by step with the greatest of care. Every manned spacecraft had made its first trip or two into space without astronauts to insure no loss of life in case of problems.

INVISIBLE FACTIONS AT WAR

In 1981 things were done in a very strange manner indeed. The facts were, our American Bolsheviks were getting ready for nuclear war, and a wartime rush mentality dominated. They wanted to take out the Russians before they got any stronger. It was a case of certain Russian and American forces at war with other Russian and American forces! The very first Shuttle was to be manned and was to go all the way into high orbit. There was no regard for the safety of the astronauts; however, we did not know that they had been training in the Enterprise. Remember the Enterprise ? Whatever happened to it, do you know? I was telling people at that time that something fishy was going on.

For all intents and purposes, the new rocket engines of the Space Shuttle were radically untested, as far as anyone was aware. There were three main engines called SSMEs by NASA. Those engines had never flown into space prior to that time; in fact, they had never so much as been fired all together until just eight days prior to the flight.

On that day, the three engines were fired for only 20 seconds on the pad at the Cape. NASA did not run the risk of running them longer even though those engines were supposed to be reusable, launch after launch. Instead, based on a mere twenty-second test, NASA would have two astronauts risk their lives on the engines and, in the actual launch into space, the engines would have to operate full-bore for a minimum of nine minutes.

NASA knowingly gambled that the three fresh engines on * Columbia * would last long enough to get into orbit. The engines were only one example of NASA's unexplained haste because if * Columbia * didn't reach orbit, the next question was: Could it return? NASA didn't have the foggiest notion.

The recent launching of the Hubble telescope smacks of the same subterfuge for the "duplicate" scope which was launched was truly another attempt to fool the Russians and again the attempt was total disaster as only an evil empire can create.

HUMPTY-DUMPTY TILES

In 1980 the new Thermo Protection Systems was radically new. All of the previous spacecraft had "heat shields" which carried away heat by burning away during re-entry, therefore they could be used only once. But the Shuttle was supposed to be reusable over and over, so it required a different kind of shield. They developed a lightweight ceramic, broken up into more than 30,000 small pieces called "tiles." Strange thing, they said a "few" fell off each time but not to worry, it was OK. How could it be OK? The heat would have burned a hole where the tile was missing. I remember they said they could not fly the * Enterprise * because they "forgot" to put heat shields on it, then the * Enterprise * just sort of faded from the picture. Then the * Columbia * flew with heat shields dropping off of it? Remember? Did you notice? Did you smell a rat? I did!

For at least two years before the original launch we had been hearing tales about problems with tiles. It began when the Shuttle * Columbia * arrived at Cape Canaveral in March of 1979 on the back of a jumbo jet. Many tiles had been lost or damaged during the flight and the *Columbia * looked like it had smallpox - and that was just from riding piggyback in the atmosphere.

GROUNDED BY THE BEAR

The tile controversy made a perfect cover story to explain away the 3-year grounding of the Space Shuttle. The real reason was that America had been locked out of military space missions since late 1977. In August of 1977 the first pre-flight tests of the Space Shuttle took place. A Shuttle was carried aloft aboard a jumbo jet and cut loose and guided to a landing by the astronauts. It seemed that the age of the space shuttle was about to dawn.

RUSSIAN COSMONAUTS IN SPACE

Russia 's space program seemed completely silent. What we didn't know was that Russia had been deploying her secret particle beam weapons in space, and on September 17, 1977, Russia started smashing our spy satellites in what was called the Battle of the Harvest Moon. They launched their Salyut-6 Space Station into orbit on September 29, 1977, and thus began a steady stream of Russian cosmonauts back and forth into space. They even took cosmonauts from at least seven other countries including Cuba and Vietnam into space with them, while we just wrung our hands.

RUSSIAN BOLSHEVIKS FLOCK TO AMERICA

The Bolsheviks had been kicked out of power in Russia , and the American Bolsheviks had been waiting long and watching for a moment of weakness among their enemies - the secret new rulers of Russia. The Bolsheviks wanted desperately to regain their former positions of power in Russia ; but for years, Russia 's new rulers had been expelling the Bolsheviks, who then flocked mostly to the United States.

The Bolsheviks had originally been put into power in Russia by the Rockefeller Cartel in November 1917. They were called Communists but were merely sadistic dictators and later had been kicked out of the Kremlin. By the last half of 1980, they began to regain power in Russia so the decision was made to go ahead with the space shuttle mission.

A top secret American spy satellite had been developed by the National Reconnaissance Office, a secret project that Control Date worked on (I did the paperwork for the people who programmed the satellite computer).

OVERT FIRST-STRIKE BY U.S. - ALMOST

Russia destroyed an American spy satellite on September 20, 1977, and a week later put our secret Moon Base out of action. Seven months later, Russia finished destroying all our spy and early warning satellites. Since then, we have tried several times to deploy spy satellites to get targeting information to launch a nuclear war, a war we have come very close to starting several times. All we found out was the Russia had moved the targets around and we dared not launch (although some wanted to anyway).

BOLSHEVIKS PLAN NUCLEAR FIRST STRIKE AGAINST RUSSIA

Yes, there was a full-blown plan for the U.S. to launch a first-strike nuclear war against Russia. The nuclear first strike against Russia relied heavily on missiles, including America 's secret Minuteman TX mobile missile (not the MX that the media talked about), but it could not succeed without up-to-date information on the targets in Russia. The American Bolsheviks were doing all they could to get us into a nuclear war, while they had survival shelters for themselves (but not the rest of us!). Russia had and has extensive survival shelters, working civil defense plans, and great storage facilities full of wheat, corn, oats and other supplies we gave to them (we "sold" the supplies to them, knowing they would not pay us back).

U.S. CITIZENRY TOTALLY EXPENDABLE

In the book Deep Black: Space Espionage and National Security General George Keegan tells of the Russian civil defense shelters. He found that every factory in Russia had a shelter. The city of Moscow had 75 underground command post/shelters, each one the size of the Pentagon. Yes, that's what he said. They were each covered with 100 feet of reinforced concrete and four hundred feet of dirt. He said they were each 2 or 3 times as strong as Hoover Dam.

Every military city in Russia and most other cities had them. Keegan said that it would take five hundred billion dollars to build just one. I typed that right, billion with a "B," read it again. He said they were plush, they even had railroad trains going into them. They have shelters along the road from the airport into downtown Moscow.

Russia is fully committed if necessary to fighting a nuclear war and surviving. The United States , however, has no civil defense system at all - except for a very exclusive system for the Elite. Our program was officially called MAD, "Mutually Assured Destruction." However, we would have been the only ones destroyed. If you had 20 minutes warning that hydrogen bombs were about to be dropped all across America , WHAT WOULD YOU DO?

I know what many of you will say. "I don't worry about it, whatever is God's will, will be." That type of brainwashing has gotten us into this mess. God's will, is for us to have free will. If you want to step in front of a railroad train, God will let you. He will not stop you! And if you do nothing about the mess you/we are in, God will let you die! If the Russians want to attack this country, or if we want to attack them, God will allow it - He allows free will to all sides!

The American Bolsheviks were doing all they could to get set for nuclear war, so they were desperate for new, up-to-date reconnaissance data from Russia. Russia knew this, that is why they finished perfecting a survival plan. We, however, were totally expendable, then and now. We filled their silos with survival supplies and emptied ours.

The elite Bolsheviks had, by this time, developed a satellite which they believed could survive in orbit for a while if they launched it in secret and took devious routes of flight.

Remember Sputnik? I first saw it one day as I was out in the field choppin' cotten (it pains me to realize that some of my readers will not even know what choppin' cotten is). Sputnik I was a 184 pound ball launched by an SS-6 ICBM by Russia at 9:36 P.M. on October 4, 1957. It was highly polished to make it easier to see, and carried a radio transmitting at a frequency that made it easy for ham radio operators to track. Our government made fun of the rocket, contemptuously calling by the code name Sapwood. The MIT humor magazine Voodoo had a cartoon of a cutaway Sputnik with a bearded Russian inside saying, "Beep...beep...beep."

A month later Russia launched the Sputnik 2, which weighed 1,119 pounds which was in the warhead range. Although we still made fun of Russia (the Senate majority leader said we were going to launch a better satellite, with chrome trim and windshield wipers), President Eisenhower took special note of the missile. Russia had leap-frogged our expensive bomber system and was becoming able to deliver warheads with their ICBMs. Between 1956 and 1960 Ike sent over 20 U-2 flights over Russia to try to learn Russia 's missile capabilities. Every U-2 flight was monitored by radar by Russia. Our Air Force reported that Russia would have a thousand ICBMs by 1961.

Two years after Sputnik we launched our Discoverer satellite, which had a camera and did a lot more than beep. We had a program called Pied Piper which did become SAMOS (Satellite and Missile Observation System). The first SAMOS launch was October 11, 1960, which failed, and SAMOS 2 was launched into orbit on January 31, 1961. The final SAMOS 30 was November 27, 1963, although officially the final Discoverer was 38 launched on February 27, 1962. At this point the program was changed and some of the satellites were back-named. The new program was KeyHole, and the satellites were called KH-1s (Discoverers were renamed KH-4s).

One of the most secret branches of the government was/is the National Reconnaissance Office, established officially on August 25, 1960. I believe that one reason for its establishment had to do with flying saucers, but that is another story. NRO developed the KH-11 (By a man named Kennan) spy (photo [and other]-reconnaissance) satellite in 1972. One of the projects I worked on at Control Data involved the KH-11. The KH-11 was used for such things as finding where the hostages were held in the Iranian Embassy and supposedly for observing the heat shield tiles on the Shuttle. It is obvious to me that they were also used to observe flying saucers, but then we all know flying saucers "do not exist* so I must be wrong, right?

America knew that Russia 's orbital fleet of manned Cosmos Interceptors would destroy the Shuttle, but planners hoped that before this happened the satellite would be able to radio back enough targeting information for a nuclear missile first strike. The first mission was a frantic rush job, and had to be manned because of the secret cargo.

If the Shuttle reached orbit, the astronauts were to be required to deploy the military satellite inside the cargo bay. The satellite was basically a spy satellite, but it was also much more. In order to do its job, it was designed to fend off Russian space weapons for as long as possible. As a result, it would be nothing less than a robot battle station in space. It was a "hardened satellite" able to withstand an attack without being easily destroyed, or so they hoped. It was equipped with active defenses, it could "shoot back."

All the components of the satellite were crammed into the cargo bay of the Shuttle Columbia. They were already there when the * Columbia * was rolled out the prior November. Once in orbit, the job of the astronauts, John Young and Robert Crippen, would be to assemble it and to get it operating, and rapidly.

TUNGSTEN SATELLITE POSES THREAT TO COSMOSPHERES

Once it would be assembled and floating in space, the satellite would look like a giant rotating tin can perhaps 30 feet long and 20 feet in diameter, but on closer inspection it would seem to be made more like a wooden barrel except that the barrel staves are all made of tungsten.

Inside the outermost tungsten barrel was another smaller barrel and inside that was a still smaller barrel. At the very center was the heart of the satellite itself. The tungsten barrels were separated from one another by a foot or more of space. There was also considerable space between the innermost barrel and the core satellite. The tungsten barrels constitute the passive defense of the satellite. If a Charged Particle Beam blast would strike the outermost barrel, it would vaporize a spot on the barrel but in the process it would absorb energy and diffuse the beam. In theory, that would greatly reduce the damage done to the second barrel and do no damage whatsoever to the innermost barrel. Tungsten has the highest melting point of any workable metal in service at the time, so this system of particle beam shields was expected to last through a number of battles.

The three-layer tungsten shield system was also instrumented. When a blast would strike it, the blast pattern would be sensed as an initial indication of from which direction came the attack. A computer within the core satellite would then activate a secret new target acquisition system called LADAR (Laser Direction And Ranging). The removable barrel stave sections of the rotating tungsten shields would be opened. LADAR would peek out through the openings as they rotated past in ultra-fast scanning.

In the black void of space, LADAR was expected to be much more efficient than radar, picking up the Russian attacker very quickly, and the moment it would do so, the American robot battle station would open fire. When it did so, it would pose a major threat even to a Russian Cosmos Interceptor because the American satellite would be armed with a giant carbon dioxide gas dynamic blaser (CDDB).

The CDDB was a more compact version of the laser, which was successfully tested aboard a modified KC-135 jet tanker. It produced intense infrared radiation with a power of over one megawatt - which is 1,000,000 watts. An industrial 10,000 satellite laser was 100 times more powerful. I was not as powerful as the Russian Charged Particle Beam, but it was powerful enough that it should be able to cripple or destroy the Russian attacker. All this hinged, of course, on actually getting the Shuttle and payload deployed.

According to the plan, the * Columbia * was intended to lift off on a sunny morning in mid-April, 1981. Millions would be watching on television as Young and Crippen roared upward into the sky and into orbit. Then the scene would shift to the standard coverage of Young and Crippen in their cockpit, and for a little over two days the coverage would continue off and on. There would be cockpit scenes, scenes in Mission Control, and so on, and there would be some seemingly unexpected problems, nothing serious but just enough to add a touch of spice to the story and the real stuff. Television viewers would have no suspicion that they were only watching excerpts from numerous simulations of the flight. In its cover-up of the SKYLAB fiasco, NASA learned well the techniques of deception.

Meanwhile, there would be no television coverage at all of the real flight except for the initial lift-off. Instead, when Young and Crippen reached orbit, they would go to work instantly. They would depressurize the cabin, open the cargo hatch, and move the robot spy satellite component away from the Columbia. They would also remove a Gemini-type two-man space capsule from the Columbia cargo bay. After moving these things several hundred yards away from the Columbia, the two astronauts would close the cargo bay by remote control.

They would maneuver down underneath the * Columbia * for a quick visual inspection of the condition of the thermal tiles, but the urgency of setting up the robot satellite would leave no time for any attempt to repair any tiles. If the astronauts were to do that, they would lose precious time both in setting up the satellite and in making good their own escape in the Gemini capsule. This is why NASA refused to include a tile repair kit on the first Shuttle mission. As NASA administrator, Robert Forsch, said in a news conference, "I felt in the end that it would be likely to increase risk, perhaps not risk with regard to the tile system but risk with regard to the safety of the whole flight."

After a very brief inspection, the astronauts would turn over control of the * Columbia * to NASA in Houston with the words: "Okay for retrofire." Then they would float away from the Columbia and set to work immediately on assembling the robot spy satellite. It was expected that they would complete the job within about four orbits. As soon as the robot satellite would be assembled and operating, Young and Crippen would board their Gemini-type space capsule.

If all went according to plan, they would drop out of orbit and splash down in the Pacific Ocean. It would only be the evening of the same day of launch, but on television the falsified NASA coverage would still be showing tapes of Young and Crippen in the simulated cockpit of the Columbia. Young and Crippen would be then picked up at sea after their secret splashdown. From there they were to be transported to Edwards Air Force Base in California to await further events and orders.

Some 12 hours after the launch from Cape Canaveral , Houston would send a retrofire signal to the now unmanned Columbia. The Shuttle's engines would fire. Somewhere over the Indian Ocean the Space Shuttle would enter the atmosphere. It would be the first complete test of the Shuttle's thermo-tiles. If they worked, Columbia would survive re-entry. Then at lower altitude, piloting of the * Columbia * would be taken over by remote control. If all went well, the Columbia would touch down in the great sandy desert of western Australia.

For years I used an HP-41CX hand held calculator until I wore out the keys. When I bought it, the ads said that the Shuttle astronauts carried one of these in orbit so that it would take over and land the Shuttle in case the on-board computer failed. I probably still have that literature around somewhere. The point is, the Shuttle can easily be landed (launched and flown, for that matter) by computer.

It was planned that all of these things would take place during the first day of the supposed 54-hour mission of Young and Crippen. Then for the final act of the charade, we would be told on television that the *Columbia was re-entering over the Pacific Ocean; and finally, lo and behold the Space Shuttle would glide into view. Everyone would watch in awe and fascination as the Shuttle dipped lower and lower over Edwards Air Force Base, California, to the resounding double boom of the shock waves giving physical proof of the journey. The fact that everything passing through the sound barrier in flight would give a boom would be totally overlooked in the intrigue and relief of the moment.

Finally the craft would touch down on the dry lake bed and gradually brake to a stop, and out would climb Young and Crippen. Everyone would assume that they were climbing out of the * Columbia ,* HOWEVER THEY WOULD ACTUALLY BE DISEMBARKING FROM THE ENTERPRISE. It was the Enterprise which we saw in those landing tests in August of 1977, and it would be the familiar Enterprise which we would see making another perfect landing. The craft would have been touched a bit to appear that it had come from space, but that was intentional fraud.

This was, of course, a desperate gamble. However, if the mission worked, it would carry off a major deceit pattern for privacy to the program, but it would also bring the entire world much closer to thermonuclear war. Although failure was anticipated and carefully covered, and as it turned out was necessary, we would be on the road to one incredible hoax following another in ever-increasing magnitude. This, of course, has been the subsequent course of events. April 12, 1981, was the 20th anniversary of the first manned flight into space. It was the anniversary of the first orbital flight by Russian cosmonaut Yuri Gagarin. It also became a day of total confusion and disarray among the Bolshevik masters of America 's Space Shuttle program.

Less than eight minutes after launch that Sunday morning, they knew something had happened to the Columbia. We were still hearing the sound effects of a seemingly successful flight, courtesy of the NASA tape recording from Houston. But the military controllers at White Sands who were following the real flight were hearing nothing at all. * Columbia * had failed to arrive over the Indian Ocean on schedule.

More bad news came: NORAD was tracking the fuel tank of the Shuttle. It was not supposed to be in orbit at all - but there it was, in orbit. That looked impossible, to say the least.

That evening, Sunday, April 12, the Shuttle's fuel tank re-entered over the Gulf of Mexico just south of Louisiana. The tank had ruptured but there was still a sizable amount of liquid hydrogen and oxygen inside. When the tank re-entered, it heated up and set off an enormous explosion and also created a giant cloud at the fringes of space.

Goldplating, which is used extensively in the Shuttle fuel tank because of its heat transfer properties, was vaporized and scattered through the clouds which was interesting in itself and gave a wondrous show. The result was the same as when gold is added in tiny quantities to stained window glass - a brilliant pinkish-red color. The giant pink cloud, with chunks of ruined fuel tank flashing in the sun, created headlines as it passed to the northeast over Louisiana and Mississippi. Meanwhile our "good old boys" poo-poohed it all as, "a natural phenomenon."

The American elite Bolsheviks were not quite sure what had happened to the Columbia, but they did know that as far as Space was concerned, the Shuttle Program was their only hope. They had three more orbital Shuttles hidden away at White Sands and they intended to launch them all, no matter what the odds might be, so the NASA cover-up of the * Columbia * disaster went right on according to plan.

GENETIC REPLICAS OF HUMANS

In the late part of the 1970s the existence of man-made genetic replicas of human beings was made public. The revealers were locked away instantly and the key tossed. It was disbelieved although motion pictures were made as sci-fi and the subject buried under threat of penalty of death to disclosers. They, however, did (and do) exist and were pressed into service right before our eyes. We didn't even blink at them - no sir, we just gobbled up the lie, chewed it and swallowed it in total.

If I have not lost you yet, this will probably do it. Genetic replicas? Human robots? You can't be serious! you will say. Call them look-alike stand-ins if that will make it easier for you to believe, but they were in fact GENETIC COPIES. You need to study what is going on in such places as Dulce New Mexico! The Bible says that at the end time it will be like it was at the time of Noah, and records show that at the time of Noah, genetic manipulation was going on!

Using stand-ins is a common procedure. For instance, the book The Strange Death of Franklin D. Roosevelt by Emmanuel M. Josephson, copyright 1948, said in the chapter titled "Roosevelt's Odd Ailments and His Strange Death" that both Roosevelt and Churchill were poisoned at the Teheran conference with Stalin. "At Teheran Roosevelt and Churchill met with Stalin to confirm the division of the World between them. During the conference, Roosevelt had been prevailed upon by the Russians to stay at the Russian Embassy because, the Russians said, the American Embassy was not safe.

At the Russian Embassy, it is reported, a special courtesy was extended to the guests. They were assigned a special waiter who served them exclusively. It was later discovered that the waiter was a physician who specialized in the science of poisoning, toxicology. The use of doctors under Russia 's state medical system in disposing of persons whom the powers-that-be wished out of the way, by poisoning them, has been attested to in the Moscow purge trials. Dr. Levine testified that he had been ordered by his superiors to poison Maxim Gorki and had done so.

"Shortly after their departure, Winston Churchill became extremely ill. He was hurried TO EGYPT where he was so sick that his death was expected momentarily. But his life was saved by a protege of his, Sir Arthur Fleming, the discoverer of penicillin."

" Roosevelt also was extremely ill on his return. He was unable to walk or stand unassisted, and never recovered his strength." Friends, the man who was elected as President for the 4th term was NOT ROOSEVELT ! When he died, "Admiral McIntyre, FDR's physician, is reported to have said that Roosevelt 's body was not embalmed; that in less than four hours after death, it had turned black, a reaction that occurs among other cases, in event of arsenic poisoning" (p. 285).

On page 286, it says, "A careful study of the few photographs of Roosevelt released in 1944 raised the question of whether they are really photographs of Roosevelt or of a stand-in. It was widely known that there were a number of stand-ins who resembled Roosevelt so closely that they appeared for him on occasions. If the suspicions raised by the photographs are well founded, the mystery deepens. What did happen to Roosevelt? Who was it that campaigned and was re-elected in 1944?"

Who indeed? Remember, that book was written in 1948. On page 287 it says evidence indicated that Roosevelt had killed himself with a "small silver pistol." It says, "His burial without autopsy was a criminal act and a flagrant violation of the law. There is more in this situation than meets the eye." Ah, so! He ends the chapter by saying, "The deception perpetrated on the public in regard to Roosevelt 's health is characteristic of that which prevailed in all matters during his Administration." The situation is much worse, NOW, friends!

SYNTHETICS

Tuesday morning, April 14, genetic replicas called "Synthetics" of the then late astronauts, Young and Crippen, were readied at White Sands. They were programmed to take a computerized ride on the training Shuttle Enterprise. The Young and Crippen entities boarded the * Enterprise * which was mounted on top of the launched 747. After rocket fuel was loaded for the Shuttle, the 747 took off and headed west, avoiding commercial air traffic. The launched 747 headed out over the Pacific until it was several hundred miles west of Los Angeles. Then it turned back east toward the California coast. On television we were told that the non-existent * Columbia * was re-entering from orbit.

Meanwhile the * Enterprise ,* re-labeled * Columbia ,* was cut loose from the 747 and fired its rockets. It sped up to a speed of nearly 6,000 miles per hour, then we watched it as it made that dramatic race in from the sea to a precise computer landing at Edwards Air Force Base. It was all timed to agree as closely as possible with the official NASA timetable to further convince us of the security and efficiency of the system.

Even so, a technical mistake was made that morning and as a result we were told that the Shuttle would land six minutes early. Think about it, six minutes in orbit corresponds to nearly a 2,000 mile error in the location of the Shuttle, but on TV nobody bothered to so much as question it. Everyone just smiled and said how lovely a day to watch a Shuttle land.

Following the dramatic landing, former astronaut Gene Cernan expressed surprise on ABC television. He said the Shuttle simply did not look scorched enough for a ship that had re-entered from orbit. Likewise, when the synthetics called Young and Crippen emerged, they did not act like men who had been weightless for two days.

Instead they bounded down the access steps and pranced around with restless energy but no one questioned it in the least. After all, we had all seen that Shuttle landing for ourselves and hundreds had been first-hand witnesses to the landing at Edwards; we had also heard and felt those sonic booms. Surely the government would not lie to us.

IDENTICAL SHUTTLES WAITING

Three more identical Shuttles like the * Columbia * were waiting their turn in the desert at White Sands. Each would have the same label, "* Columbia ,*" painted on its side. The first * Columbia * was now quite dead along with its crew, but thanks to "doubles" the *Columbia * would continue to live on as the astronauts would be removed from public view except on rare and "distant" occasions when appearance would be inevitable and actors would be able to carry out the assignments.

On April 28, 1981, we were all tuned in to our TV boxes to watch President Reagan's address. The speech was to gain and build support for the Administration's budget, but most people were interested because it was the first speech by the President since the assassination attempt nearly a month earlier. People were too absorbed in the dramatic re-appearance of a wounded President to pay much attention to anything else. No one cared very much that the Space Shuttle "* Columbia *" supposedly arrived back in Florida that day - on the back of its transport ship. The *Columbia * was a great success as far as the citizens knew - we had seen EVERYTHING OURSELVES ON TELEVISION.

END OF PART 5.

PART 6:

SPACE SUPERIORITY TOUTED

Based on that ONE Space Shuttle flight, we were then being told on all sides that we were once again on top in space. We were told that now we were five to ten years ahead of those poor, stupid Russians.

The Shuttle which we all saw land at Edwards Air Force Base in California was the training Shuttle Enterprise. I had simply been relabeled with the name " Columbia " on the side. When the Shuttle landed in California April 14, we were initially told that it would be flown immediately back to Florida, but as the days went by, the Shuttle just stayed in California. NASA created one excuse after another to explain away the delays to the public.

Meanwhile, frantic meetings were going on, involving key, joint military and NASA personnel. Things had not gone according to plan, and they were not sure what to do next. One faction insisted that NASA should go ahead according to the original plan. That plan called for a switch in Shuttles between California and Florida. On Day One a modified "747" would take off from Edwards Air Force Base, California, with the Shuttle * Enterprise * riding piggyback. News cameras would be on hand to record the take-off. The * Enterprise * would then be flown to its home base at White Sands, New Mexico. Meanwhile the public would be told that the "747" with the Shuttle had made an overnight stopover. Then on Day Two another modified "747" carrying a different Shuttle, would take off from White Sands and fly to Florida.

Once again, reporters would be on hand to watch the landing at Cape Canaveral. The new Shuttle, of course, would have the name " Columbia " on the side just as the * Enterprise * did. In that way the training Shuttle, * Enterprise ,* was to be returned to home base and a fresh orbital-only Shuttle sent to Florida. The switch would be made without the public suspecting a thing, and, after all, it is only the American public from which the above top secret secrets are maintained. The participants, by accident, believe the cover-up is in national security to prevent acceleration of the obvious war under way. Who is going to tell?

In those meetings behind closed doors about the situation, others protested that it would be foolish to go ahead as originally planned without more information. It was obvious that somehow the Russians had destroyed the * Columbia ,* but the question was: "How?" The military Shuttle planning group agreed that they needed the answer to that question, otherwise there would be no way to devise countermeasures to give the next Shuttle flight a better chance. You see, they never considered telling the truth and shutting down the upcoming plans.

Finally, it was agreed all around that the first urgent need was to buy time, so NASA spokesmen were told to give the press a series of stalling stories about the post-flight Shuttle procedures in California. Meanwhile, every available avenue of Intelligence world-wide was pressed to come up with an answer to that crucial question: "What happened to the Space Shuttle, Columbia?"

Day by day we saw well orchestrated brief new reports about the postflight checkouts of the Shuttle at Edwards Air Base. The Shuttle was then lifted onto the back of the "747," by the take-off kept being pushed back one day after another. The military shuttle planning group was drawing a blank from their intelligence sweep about the * Columbia. *

The Shuttle stayed on the ground a week longer than originally planned, and still no answer came about the Columbia. You see, if by chance the Russians turned up with the Columbia in tow the fallout would be worse than disastrous because, for the first day or so, the exchange could not be explained away as "preventing public panic."

NASA ran out of excuses for further stalling without raising unwelcome questions. The secret Shuttle planning team was still in no position to prepare for a second orbital mission, and yet appearances had to be maintained at all costs and every passing day became more critical.

The U.S. Government was crowing loudly about the supposed stunning success of the Shuttle because it was the only hope left for America in space. The Space Shuttle was the only program, other than Defense, which was given increased funding by the Reagan Administration. There was also the incredible fear that if the Russians did, in fact, have the Shuttle intact, the entire cover-up would be exposed world-wide. The Russians, on the other hand, had no proof and couldn't come forward with actions which would have caused all-out war.

WHITE SANDS CHOICES

Before the Shuttle * Enterprise * left California aboard its "747," the Shuttle planning group had to make a decision: Should they, or should they not, make the planned switch between Shuttles at White Sands? There were three more orbital-rated Shuttles at White Sands, and a specific mission was planned for each one.

One of the planners summed up the dilemma in these words: "How can we send an orbital bird to the Cape ?" STS-2, 3, and 4 may require major modifications in order to get past the Russians. We won't know what those modifications are until we get the missing feedback on STS-1. I say send the Enterprise. We can keep it sub-orbital by faking an abort - shut-down one engine before Press-to-MECO and let * Enterprise * return to Kennedy. That will keep * Enterprise * out of danger from 'Ivan.' It will also keep the ball rolling while giving us more time to set up a successful orbital shot."

Someone else asked: "What about the public relations impact? One thing we don't need is to abort a mission this early in the program."

The reply: "Would you rather lose another orbital bird to Ivan? Besides, if we do it right, we could end up with even more public support. You know what I mean - the idea that the Shuttle is safe even if something does go wrong, and so on."

There was a very long silence, followed by more discussion, but finally the suggestion was adopted.

On Monday, April 27, the "747" bearing the Shuttle * Enterprise * took off from Edwards Air Force Base, California. The following day we were shown the same Shuttle, the training Shuttle * Enterprise ,* landing in Florida. There was no switch made.

The secret Shuttle planners were still feeling their way and they left open an avenue for plan changes. Therefore, it would be the training Shuttle * Enterprise * that would later roll off the launch pad in Florida, that summer. It would look just like the * Columbia * did before its April launch, mated to a giant fuel tank and huge solid-rocket boosters.

WILL THE REAL PLAYERS AND PROPS STAND UP, PLEASE

NASA was then shooting for the very early launch date of September 30, 1981. According to the plans the launch would proceed smoothly for the first few minutes. Unlike the * Columbia ,* the * Enterprise * would not veer north toward the kind of orbit forbidden by Russia.

Then, one engine would shut down prematurely. It would be earlier in the flight than the point at which contact with * Columbia * was lost in April. Then, as we were still watching on television, the * Enterprise * would return for its alleged "emergency" landing at Kennedy.

By that time, the * Enterprise * had made so many computerized landings that NASA had confidence that the landing would be made safely. If other plans could be substituted as the summer progressed, so could the "flight" sequence be changed, even to aborting the launch at the pad.

There would, of course, be an uproar about the aborted space flight, but it would not last long because no citizen would risk the lives of astronauts to a possible accident. The entire scenario of an abortion would "only prove the efficiency of the computer check system and safety measures."

The hopes were, of course, to buy time and gain information regarding the first launch.

BACK TO AIR-BLASTS

Let's go back to December of 1978 when air blasts at sea began shaking homes and frightening thousands along America 's East Coast. For a while government spokesmen tried to ignore them; but the booms, now known and recognized as Air Quakes, would not go away. In fact, they steadily increased in number and were also soon experienced on the West Coast and inland U.S. , as well.

As no explanations could be offered, they were next ridiculed in the controlled major media, but that tactic quickly changed, too, because too many people were hearing them to accept it all as a big joke. Then the tactic was to simply report them, promising follow-up and then simply never following up.

The news projectors never move from the scripts given them and there would be practically no fear of slip-ups. NOte this for yourselves during prime time newscasts; flip channels and you will hear the verbatim new items being read from the master script.

After these quakes had been going on unexplained for several months, the government tried to explain it all away by blaming the whole thing on freak weather conditions. Alleged experts were trotted out to impress the public with the mumbo jumbo about unusually cold air layers, ozone depletion, northern lights, electrical disturbances, and so on, ad nauseum.

Waving their arms about in master performances, other experts were touting that the booms were due to military aircraft, perhaps a hundred miles out to sea since nothing showed up on any radar screens.

Others managed to actually keep a straight face as they told you that the booms were caused by the Concorde supersonic transport and all but grounded the Concorde forever. They told you that the shock waves from that plane were striking America 's East Coast more than an hour ahead of the plane itself, and with incredible force, having "built up incredible sonic force as it traveled."

Explanations like these were ridiculous on their face; yet most Americans, eager to be pacified, accepted these insults to their intelligence at face value and even marched to stop the Concorde from landing in the U.S. Facts are that most of the quakes taking place nationwide were kept out of the press, and people calmed down.

For instance, there are almost daily Air Quakes in areas around an Air Force Base where you might find sophisticated aircraft capable of supersonic speeds. Usually, the later seen jet craft are not the cause of the blasts but are the INSPECTION TEAMS CHECKING OUT THE LOCATION OF THE BLAST.

Those of you who do not believe such a thing could be, had better think back to some unexplained booms you have noted and the media could give no explanation. As the phenomenon continued, people simply returned to sleep and ignored the interruption in their thoughts - simply no longer caring one way or another.

As early as December of 1977 it was told publicly, and suppressed governmentally, that the quakes were caused from newly operational Russian Cosmospheres firing their Particle Beam weapons in a defocused mode into the air over the Atlantic Ocean - and later over the Pacific. This information came forth right out of our top intelligence systems.

In 1977, there were some seven Cosmospheres hovering over the U.S. , but in the months that followed the numbers grew into the hundreds worldwide. Now you can find out more if you can get your hands on the materials from the Mitre Corporation because the government sponsored a study done by them. The material was quietly released and then faded into oblivion.

The report listed 594 air quakes of major impact between December 1977 and the following June. By June, of course, those alleged "freak cold air layers" had to be long gone. The study did its best to blame the booms on aircraft noises, anyway, but 181 air quakes were impossible to link to anything, even artificially, or to any acceptable excuse, so the report lamely concluded that they must be of some natural origin, and yet the government and military were fully aware of the origin.

The Cosmospheres are Russia 's version of the Hovering Weapons Platforms of which the late General Thomas Power tried in vain to give a warning over 15 years ago. General Power was former head of Air Force Research and Development and then of the Strategic Air Command. He knew what he was talking about and made every effort possible to alert the American people over the ensuing years but his efforts were suppressed and went ignored.

As the numbers of Cosmospheres multiplied worldwide during the following year, UFO sightings likewise mushroomed. Is it any wonder that the U.S. officially does not recognize UFOs and calls them weather balloons or swamp gas?

SPACE ALIENS?

The "panic" which the government is trying to keep from us is not from "aliens;" if aliens were the problem then we would have been conquered long ago. The problems come from very Earth-oriented, physical humans at the controls.

Most UFO sightings are in fact Identified Flying Objects; they are Russian Cosmospheres. This is not to say that alien flying saucers do not exist, for the same intelligence that identifies and tracks the Soviet Cosmospheres has confirmed the existence of craft that are not from Earth.

Every astronaut of our moon landing programs has said they were followed by flying saucers, before Russia developed their Flying Platforms. Does this give you a hint as to the REAL reason why the astronauts were quarantined after they came back from the "moon?"

They had to undergo "debriefing" - they had to be taught how to keep their mouths shut about what they saw. Neil Armstrong said that when he stepped onto the moon, there were at least two "flying saucers" already sitting there watching him. He later had a mental breakdown. However, some of the moon program was also "smoke and mirrors."

IT'S ONLY A PAPER MOON...

The Center spread of the September 5, 1994, issue of Spotlight newspaper has an article by a man who points out some of the obvious problems with the moon program. The author, who used the name R. Ren_, has written a book called IT'S ONLY A PAPER MOON (PUBLISHED TITLE IS NASA MOONED AMERICA) in which he points out some scientific facts such as the space ships and space suits do not provide enough radiation protection for the astronauts to accomplish what they claim to have done (if the suits work, why don't they use them with nuclear reactor accidents?). He says that "the landings were faked and that the Apollo program was a very successful and expensive government hoax - a hoax that is about to be repeated using Mars as the new 'celestial' target." The Hubble Telescope is another NASA hoax - try reading THE HUBBLE WARS by Eric Chaisson.

WHY ALL THE AID TO RUSSIA ?

Why does our government give massive aid in money, food and technology to Russia ? Could it be to keep those Cosmospheres stationed in appropriate orbit to take out every major dam, fault line, populated city and military base in our nation? The International Banker Elite know what is going on and have situated themselves to take advantage of the destruction of five out of every six persons on earth (according to their OWN PLANS). The only reason it has not happened already is that "They" have held off until they could finish gold-plating their commode handles and stocking their underground warehouses.

THOSE UNDERGROUND FACILITIES

On this subject, here are some hints for UFO researchers. There are sonic quakes over Southern California that have been traced to an Aurora aircraft and OTHER CRAFT going to Groom Lake Nevada. If you plot that course backwards, you come to Australia. Check out the underground facilities at Pine Gap, Australia, if you want to know more about one of the hideouts of the "Elite." The research shows that one of these craft flies over 4,000 miles per hour, but one who should know says they can fly over 8,000 miles an hour. That craft can get to Australia quicker than I can get home from work.

UFOs have always been attracted by aircraft, rockets, and spacecraft, especially when those are new or experimental. The Cosmospheres are not exception to this rule. Wherever Cosmospheres are congregated UFOs will always show up and there is no exception to this rule. The "alien" craft observe and monitor the human craft.

ALIEN CRAFT MONITORING

A good example of this monitoring was witnessed in New Zealand as the secret bases there were under surveillance by the Russians. On December 30, 1978, an Australian television news crew made headlines worldwide by filming what they called UFOs from an airplane over New Zealand. The film, some seven minutes long, was purchased by the BBC and by the CBS TV Network. On January 2, CBS showed less than 50 SECONDS of the film which showed a glowing spherical object, and most of the objects sighted that evening by the camera crew and other observers were described as spheres of LIGHT.

However, as the film clip was shown, a soundtrack was played. The Australian newsman described a different object. He said it looked like a flying saucer. Walter Cronkite did not say whether or not the soundtrack had been recorded simultaneously with the film clip that was being shown.

In any case, the spherical object in the film was a Russian Cosmosphere, but the attempts to discredit the film were an echo of the ridiculous government stories about the air quakes the prior year. On the evening of January 25 Walter Cronkite of CBS News reminded viewers of the New Zealand UFOs; then he went on: "Well, the New Zealand Air Force reported today that freak atmospheric conditions, not visitors from outer space, were responsible. Investigators said one definite cause was an unusually bright "Venus" rising in the eastern sky."

PAY ATTENTION - THIS IS FROM "EARTH"

The "friendly" "alien" craft will show strobing "COLORED" lights of red, green, yellow, blue. They are stationed in non orbiting sequence in strategic placements. The Cosmospheres do not strobe, and are stationed to appear as stars and planets. This is the real reason that there is a lot of hocus pocus involved with the Hubble Telescope, they cannot afford to let us see what that can see.

END OF PART 6.

PART 7:

RUSSIAN SPHERES AND PLATFORMS, AND HELP FROM ALIENS

The Russian craft are not always visible; actually they are almost never visible and from an orbiting standpoint they are as any other satellite which would be too small to be seen by the eye alone. They are shielded by a very sophisticated stealth shielding system. The "aliens" sometimes neutralize the Russian systems in hope that we will see them and wake up to what is happening, but we are too brainwashed to accept the truth.

You may ask, if the aliens are benevolent, why don't they help us? Who would they help? Which side is the "good guys?" We have to first ask for their help, then we have to accept their help and follow their rules. Instead, both the American and Russian (and other) governments have tried to shoot them down.

The flurries of UFO sightings over Australia and New Zealand were actually due to Cosmospheres with monitoring alien craft along with some of our own monitoring craft with sufficient speed capability.

The U.S. in the 1970s decided to outflank Russia by deploying Minuteman and other nuclear missiles all over the world, since our main bases such as Edwards, White Sands, etc., were all monitored by Russian Cosmospheres. We believed that we could disable the Cosmospheres long enough to launch a missile attack against Russia. We came very close to doing just that several times, but each time we were defeated by the Cosmospheres which saved the world from nuclear nightmare. Who are the "Good guys," friends?

COBALT ION BOMS AND LASERS

It is well known to U.S. scientific intelligence analysts that the Cosmospheres hover by floating in the earth's electro-static field. They also presume that the Russians use the same techniques we would use in order to aim their Particle-beam weapons - that is, a combination of infrared detection and radar. They reasoned that if the Cosmospheres can be disturbed from their hovering positions and if their sensing systems can be blinded, their particle-bam weapons would do no good - even if they fired they would be aimed wildly and miss our rockets as they would be launched.

The solution devised was called a Cobalt Ionization Bomb. Unlike a normal cobalt bomb, such a device is not designed to create a tremendous blast; its primary purpose, instead, is to create tremendous quantities of totally ionized cobalt atoms stripped of all their electrons, leaving bare nuclei. The plan is to detonate these at various locations in the upper fringes of the atmosphere, as high as possible, but below the hovering altitude of the Cosmospheres.

The result will be an enormous storm of electrons, spreading horizontally in the Earth's magnetic field to pass underneath the Cosmospheres. When you hear in the news that we have recently launched a satellite that "illuminates the electrostatic/magnetic field," does that make more sense now? And do you remember that the launch was considered to be a secret military mission? It would also disrupt the infrared and radar systems used to watch the missiles below; and while the Cosmospheres are briefly incapacitated in this manner, our rulers planned to launch our ICBMs right past them.

Meanwhile, ground-based high-power lasers would be used in the effort to shoot down the Cosmospheres. But, my friends, your masters fell victim to the very intelligence gap which they themselves brought about years past, which I wrote about in my newsletters in 1978, because the Russians well understand the importance of surprise, including technological surprise. And so, while they have allowed their space triad to become known in intelligence circles because of it deployment, they still have a master secret weapon in reserve for the war itself.

This weapon is a system to protect the Achilles' heel of their beam-weapons - the ability to aim them accurately. It is called "Psychoenergetic Range Finding" or PRF. PRF does not rely on conventional radiations like infrared or radar - instead, it is based upon detection of the actual atomic signature of the target, and normal jamming techniques have no effect whatsoever on PRF. Therefore, when the American cobalt ionization bombs explode, the Cosmospheres would be able to aim right through the electron storms to blast our missiles or ANYTHING ELSE in the target.

In November an alternate plan for the second launch was presented. This plan would be an abbreviated orbital mission. So, the second Space Shuttle launch took place from Cape Canaveral Florida, on November 12, 1981, seven months after the first launch.

Some seven hours after launch it was announced that the flight was going to be cut short. Therefore, the secret plan for an abbreviated mission was verified and under way. As an excuse, NASA pretended that a faulty fuel cell was responsible for shortening the mission.

The abbreviated Space Shuttle mission in November was the legacy of the total disaster which engulfed the first Shuttle launch in April. In November, just as the prior April, no part of the real Shuttle flight was heard other than the Florida take-off. The identical theatrical techniques that were used to fool the public in April were again utilized, including some of the same taped segments - no one noticed, not even when the story did not match the sound or pictures.

Remember, we watched the Columbia take off but it was the Enterprise that landed in California.

The Enterprise was a very specially designed Shuttle, unlike the Columbia or the three other Shuttles which secretly existed at White Sands. The Enterprise was a training Shuttle with its cargo bay filled with rocket fuel tanks. Launched from the top of an airborne 747, the Enterprise was able to make short suborbital flights into space, but due to its fuel tanks it could carry no payload in its cargo bay.

In the wake of the secret Space Shuttle disaster in April, the military Shuttle planners sent the Enterprise to Florida.

Originally, they were simply trying to buy time. But time was going by quickly because the American Bolsheviks were on an accelerated timetable to bring about WAR! Arguments broke out among the military Shuttle planners over the original plan to throw away a launch just to keep up appearances.

A scheme was finally constructed to use the Enterprise itself in November for a military mission.

COMPUTER SCAPEGOATS

Just as computers are handy for helping with the workloads of people, they also make handy scapegoats to cover a massive multitude of errors and omissions. This time a computer problem would be the important factor in deliberately shortening the second Shuttle flight - as information to be lied forth to the public. So, on the evening before the launch, there was a sudden flurry of activity at Cape Canaveral.

Supposedly a data processing module aboard the Shuttle - that is, part of its computer system - "was misbehaving." We were told that a replacement was flown in, and we saw workmen rushing to install something aboard the Shuttle. It was all going on, literally, at the very last minute, just before the large external tanks started being loaded with rocket fuel.

The last minute rush at Pad 39-A that evening on November 11 was not to load a computer module as we were told - and shown. Instead, special photo reconnaissance equipment was installed in the rear deck of the crew compartment. It was arranged to look out of the two overhead windows. The * Enterprise * was unable to carry a spy satellite in its cargo bay as mentioned earlier, so instead the * Enterprise * itself was turned into a spy satellite.

The makeshift spy apparatus installed in the crew compartment rear deck was not as good as that of a regular spy satellite, but the military planners were desperate. By the way, you can fool your friends quite easily but you can rarely fool your enemy for they are watching most closely and the Russians knew, moment by moment, what was happening.

It would soon be four years since Russia finished destroying all of the American spy satellites with her fleet of Killer Satellites. The military Shuttle team was hoping to use "surprise" in order to get at least a little bit of reconnaissance over Russia. It was hoped that the Russians would consider the Enterprise to be no threat since it could not carry anything in its cargo bay.

NASA, also, did everything it could to convince the Russians that a non-threatening orbit would be used. Finally, the launch time was shifted by about 2-1/2 hours on the morning of November 12th. That was intended to make it harder for the Russian Cosmos INTERCEPTORS to readjust their orbits to attack the * Enterprise. *

The last item reflects a deadly intelligence error made by the United States military Shuttle team. They knew about Russia 's orbital cosmos interceptors, the Killer Satellites. They also knew about the first generation Cosmospheres, Russia's Levitating Weapons Platforms. Both were first deployed some four years prior. The American planners knew that the Space Shuttle COULD probably outrun the "first-generation" Cosmospheres, therefore they believed that the orbiting cosmos interceptors were the main threat to the Shuttle.

WHAT THEY DID NOT KNOW - BUT DID SUSPECT - WAS THAT RUSSIA HAD DEVELOPED AND DEPLOYED A SMALL FLEET OF SEMI-EXPERIMENTAL SECOND GENERATION COSMOSPHERES. In April there had been seven in operation - by November there were at least eight or nine. The new Cosmospheres were called "Super Heavies, or "Jumbos," and could outrun and outlift anything America had, including the Shuttle. The Russians even gave NASA pointed information about them as far back as the April launch.

There were some in America 's intelligence community who correctly interpreted what happened and informed the planners. But the American Bolsheviks who controlled America 's military space program were refusing to accept it. They were explaining away the fragments of intelligence about the new Russian Jumbo Cosmospheres and thereby guaranteeing their own failure.

When the * Enterprise * took off there were no human pilots aboard. It was a known suicide mission. The * Enterprise * followed an evasive, curving launch, just as the * Columbia * had done in April. It headed toward the north which would indicate a near polar orbit. When it passed over Russia the * Enterprise * was to be upside down with its spy camera staring downward through the crew compartment windows.

Five nice bit fat Jumbo Cosmospheres were right on hand and kept pace along with quite a good number of "alien" craft, as it climbed toward orbit. Moscow was instantly notified of the course it was taking - but the Russians were told not to fire on the Shuttle. Instead the Russian Ballistic Missile Defense Forces were alerted. The Russians knew war was coming and the decided to use the approach of the Shuttle as a good test drill.

PROTECTION SYSTEMS

It had been known for two years that Russia had been preparing to deploy a new anti-ballistic missile system and underground shelter systems were improved and renovated along with new shelters being installed and totally updated for the population security. Our government did nothing for us good tax-paying citizens. The new missile system was based on charged particle beam weapons fired from modified supersonic TU-144s Jet Transports. On November 12 a squadron of TU-144s were scrambled to intercept and shoot down the * Enterprise. *

The Jumbo Cosmospheres continued pacing the Shuttle from a distance as a backup if the TU-144s should fail - but they, of course, did not fail. THE * ENTERPRISE * SWEPT DOWNWARD FROM THE NORTH ACROSS THEIR STRATEGIC KOLA PENINSULA. AS IT CROSSED OVER THE WHITE SEA THE BIG JETS BEGAN FIRING UPWARD WITH THEIR BEAM WEAPONS AT THE SHUTTLE FAR ABOVE. THE THIRD BEAM BLAST TORE THROUGH THE MID-SECTION OF THE SHUTTLE AND IT BROKE IN HALF JUST BEHIND THE CREW COMPARTMENT AND DISINTEGRATED.

NASA went ahead with its made-for-television space movies and followed the preplanned script for a shortened mission. They knew within the hour after launch that the * Enterprise * had been destroyed. Having learned about Russia 's plans, in April, to create an international incident with the crashed Shuttle, they wanted to complete the flight, in the world's eyes, quickly.

The Shuttle landing at Edwards Air Force Base, California, on November 14th was a replay of the Shuttle we saw the previous April. Literally, those long distance telephoto shots of the Shuttle swooping in from the stratosphere were the very same ones that were shown in April. NASA merely fed videotapes of the long distance scenes from April to the networks and added a fresh narrative to them. The only part of the landing that was live in November was the terminal portion which could be seen from the ground.

The Shuttle we were shown landing was one of the new Shuttles from White Sands. It had been carried aloft by the launch aircraft, boosted to a modest speed and altitude by a pair of solid fuel booster rockets - enough to produce sonic resonance, and then it swooped down to the delight of the attending crowd.

Since we all witnessed how well that second Shuttle worked out the next launch was already set for March, just three months from that perfect landing. It was planned to launch the third Shuttle right on schedule. Well, * Enterprise * would no longer be an embarrassing problem to NASA.

We now had a new Shuttle, the third we were shown with " Columbia " on it and it awaited at Cape Canaveral. Its cargo bay awaited a NEW secret military pay load. That particular Shuttle had really been modified and ARMED FOR BATTLE in space. Our idiot Bolshevik military planners continued and still continue to refuse to understand what they are really up against - and thusly, another tragedy was already in the final stages of being made.

OVERVIEW OF WORLD EVENTS

To give an overview of the world events coincidental to the Shuttle launches, we need to go back to the attempted assassination of Reagan, March 30. That news flashed myriads of questions around the world instantly as old concerns were triggered. Would some other country try to take advantage in some way? Most of all, would Russia decide to invade Poland ? At that time headlines were telling us that an invasion might be imminent. As it turned out then, our worries about that were unfounded but we had no way to know.

Instead of "invading," the Russians were in the process of cooling down the latest "Solidarity" labor crisis. Likewise, other nations around the world generally acted with restraint following news of the shooting and literally, without much surprise or reaction, for the planners know the plans. That is, all except one - the lone exception was ISRAEL ! You may want to look closely at the next bits of information and see what you can discern.

ISRAEL

The timing could not have been more precise, if it had been planned in advance. As the first shocking bulletins of the shooting flashed across America , Israeli war planes were starting their engines. As White House spokesmen were gathering to brief the press, ISRAELI FIGHTER BOMBERS WERE GATHERING OVER LEBANON.

Through that afternoon and evening Americans huddled around their television sets for the latest word from George Washington University Hospital, completely transfixed on the happenings of our own day and totally distracted from anything else which might be occurring in the world.

Meanwhile, Lebanese villagers were huddling in basements and bombed-out shelters as Israeli missiles and bombs exploded all around them. On the BBS World Service and other short-wave radio news reports around the world, the sudden new Israeli raids on Lebanon that day were very big news indeed. But not so in America.

News of the presidential shooting and its aftermath drowned out everything else just exactly as it was supposed to do and you will never be told what REALLY happened with that shooting incident - but it didn't go exactly or precisely as planned but it did its job - after all, we ALL saw it, didn't we?

It was not until Syrian troops began making moves in response to the Israeli raids that Lebanon began to enter our consciousness in America. Day by day, the Israelis and Syrians lashed out at one another more and more, directly and through surrogates in Lebanon.

On April 28, Israeli jets shot down two Syrian helicopters over Lebanon. It was tremendous news overseas, but in the U.S. it was completely ignored in favor of an all-networks coverage of the President's speech to Congress the same evening. It was not until the following day, April 29, that the Lebanon crisis received billing in the American controlled major media.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

The Syrians had moved Russian SAM-6 anti-aircraft missiles into the Beka Valley of Lebanon. This was Syria 's answer to Israel 's shooting down of two of her helicopters the day prior over Zahle. Thus, the Middle East missile crisis was born.

END OF PART 7.

PART 8:

U.S. - JAPAN FEUD

Another looming crisis was the growing FEUD between the U.S. and Japan. It seemed as if Washington couldn't do anything right toward the Japanese. On the morning of April 10, 1981, the first attempt to launch the Space Shuttle * Columbia * took place at Cape Canaveral. It ended in failure due to a computer problem, but it was the top story that day in America. It all but buried the news story that was tops that day in Japan.

The prior day, an American submarine had sunk a small Japanese freighter, supposedly by ramming it. Then the submarine had left the scene without making any attempt to rescue survivors. Worse yet, because the U.S. had not even admitted the incident to Japanese authorities until some 36 hours after the incident, the episode raised more and more questions in Japanese minds.

NAVY HAS DIFFERENT STORY - AS USUAL

The U.S. Navy issued a report about it which differs drastically from the testimony of the 13 Japanese survivors. The Navy report even put the location of the collision 3-1/2 miles away from where it actually happened. The Japanese wanted to know WHY!

The Japanese began demanding answers to that and many other puzzling questions about the incident. The supposedly "accidental" sinking of the Japanese freighter was only the opening gun in the Washington-Tokyo feud.

One shock after another from America rocked Japan. American naval vessels sailed through Japanese fishing fleets, cutting fishing nets to ribbons. Suddenly, there were revelations that American ships with nuclear weapons aboard were using Japanese ports regularly, in secret.

Secretary of State Haig canceled a visit to Japan. Even the visit of Prime Minister Suzuki to Washington recently had backfired on him. He agreed to language in a joint communique that led to accusations in Japan that Suzuki was making a secret military alliance with the United States. The irony of it all was that Suzuki's troubles were due to the fact that he was resisting any such military alliance.

The facts, of course, were that an attempt was being made to pressure the Japanese because of the massive amounts of counterfeit money from South America and the Antarctic. In addition, the Bolsheviks in the U.S. wanted Japan to re-arm, to become the policemen of the Western Pacific. Suzuki's predecessor, Prime Minister Ohira, was ready to go along with America 's Bolsheviks despite stern warnings from Russia not to.

Then, surprise of surprises, Ohira died suddenly and Suzuki replaced him. Suzuki didn't want to re-arm Japan , and so America 's Bolsheviks wanted him out of office. Japan had endured all kinds of shocks in those particular months, but they all had one common denominator: they all involved loss of face for Japan as a whole and especially for Prime Minister Suzuki, and that is most painful for such an Oriental people.

In Asia , loss of face is a very, very serious matter. By using it as a political weapon, America 's Bolsheviks believed they could bring down the Suzuki government. Whoever would follow Suzuki would have to talk "peace" for domestic consumption, but he wold have to prepare for war if he was to get along with Washington.

OTHER PLACES

Elsewhere in Asia , Red China and Vietnam had recently engaged in very heavy border fighting with many casualties. Meanwhile, the so-called Reagan Administration was preparing to declare openly that it would sell America 's most sophisticated weapons to Red China. Might you agree that the cancer eating away at America had caused total insanity? Do you think it has improved in the years since? Well, it surely has gotten far worse. You have no idea what kind of a decade the 1980s really was.

In Europe , too, there was turmoil at the hands of Bolshevik agents. The government of Italy had just been brought down in a tremendous scandal involving a massive conspiracy of many of the country's leading citizens. In West Germany , Chancellor Helmut Schmidt was under fire from forces who wanted to undo the balance he had struck between East and West.

And in France the Bolsheviks won a tremendous victory in the election. Until then, France had enjoyed a special relationship with Russia as well as with the West. The relationship was one of trust built up laboriously beginning with the former President Charles de Gaulle; but the new French President, Mitterrand, was working as fast as possible to change that. Mitterrand would try to bring France into the anti-Russian camp, headed by the American Bolsheviks. Note his current presence at every open meeting and secret meeting and put your own puzzle pieces in place.

At the time, crises large and small were multiplying and compounding all around us, and by and large they were not accidental. They were part and parcel of the deliberate war build-up strategy of the Bolsheviks in America. By turning the world into a cauldron of crises, they were setting the stage for NUCLEAR WAR NO. ONE. The entire world was filled with unrest just like the uneasy Balkans just prior to World War I. Has the confusion lessened?

World War I was set off, seemingly by accident, by the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand of Austria by terrorists.

When the Space Shuttle * Columbia * took off on its ill-fated flight on April 12, 1981, a fleet of special airplanes were aloft to help track it. The U.S. was depending heavily on its fleet of advanced range-instrumentation aircraft. These were flying radar and communications stations known as "Froop Snoots" for their huge bulbous nose.

This special airplane was a modified military Boeing 707, designated EC-135N. When they were not involved in space shots, the EC-135Ns also have many other uses, including the tracking of Russian satellites. There were only a few of these EC-135ns, so they were all very important. When the Space Shuttle * Columbia * took off in April, there were only eight of them.

The Space Shuttle Program was an indispensable key to the underway war plans of the Bolsheviks, and the EC-135Ns were crucial to the Shuttle Program. On May 6, 1981, an EC-135N, nicknamed the "Boss Hog," took off from its base in Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio. It headed east on what was to be a routine training flight. As the modified 707 flew eastward, it was heading for an unexpected rendezvous.

Hovering high over the rolling hills of western Maryland, a lone Cosmosphere was waiting for the Boss Hog. At 10:51 A.M. Eastern Time the pilot of the jet radioed the words "Flight level 29" to controllers on the ground. The plane was at 29,000 feet.

Moments later the Cosmosphere fired its Charged Particle Beam weapon downward at the jet plane passing miles below it. The beam blasted a hole through the top of the fuselage and another out through the bottom. Explosive decompression emptied the cabin of its air. The blast also set off a secondary explosion, turning the jet into a ball of flames.

At the same time control cables through the tail were destroyed, and the jet turned violently nose down. Instead of gliding to a crash many miles away, the ruined airplane dropped like a rock, almost straight down.

Radar traffic controllers were startled to see the plane disappear suddenly from their screens, but it was all documented. It was all over before they even knew anything had happened, however.

On the ground, eyewitnesses heard a boom-boom-boom, and moments later a giant ball of fire came screaming downward out of the clouds. For at least ten minutes small pieces of debris from the plane kept settling earthward for miles around.

In any air disaster as violent as that one, the investigation usually extends over a period of months - but not this one. On Friday May 29, just over three weeks after the crash, the Air Force quietly announced that its investigation was already over and there had been "some type of pilot error" doing something to the whatchit which engaged the wrong whichit and poo! The Air Force knew what had blown their radar plane out of the air, but they also declared that "for the time being the results would not be made public."

While the Air Force was still reeling from the crash of the valuable EC-135N, it became the Navy's turn to have some fun. Is any of this beginning to allow you to piece together what "probably" happened to all those naval excursions? How about gun turret blow-outs, etc.?

The particle beams ARE SO EXACTING THAT THEY CAN BE SHOT RIGHT INTO A JET TURBINE - IN FLIGHT. Once again Russia 's target was a highly sophisticated electronic warfare jet. The plane involved was an EA-6B Prowler based on the nuclear supercarrier, USS Nimitz.

On the night of Tuesday, May 26 (1981) the Nimitz was engaged in night-landing exercises just off the East Coast. Carrier landings are always dangerous, and night landings especially so; but the EA-6B has a special advantage. It is equipped with an Automatic Carrier Landing System to permit safe landings even in conditions of zero visibility.

Partly as a result, the Prowlers are known as some of the safest of all carrier aircraft; but on the night of May 26 one of Russia 's new Jumbo Cosmospheres was hovering high above the Nimitz. It was one of the two which are armed with a Neutron Particle Beam Weapon.

As the EA-6B approached the Nimitz to land, the Cosmosphere waited. At a critical moment of the final approach, the Cosmosphere fired. The invisible neutron beam instantly killed the crew of three and temporarily deranged the airplane's electronic systems.

Being suddenly without guidance, the jet veered to the right and crashed into a deck full of airplanes. The toll: 14 dead, 48 injured, and 20 aircraft destroyed or damaged. It was the Navy's worst flight-deck disaster since the early 1950s.

U.S. TAUNTS RUSSIA

During those times there was a lot of hocus pocus about "national security." What did that mean? Could there be any such thing as National Security without National Survival?

Funny thing - our leaders kept telling us that the threat to our security was Russia. Then, while we were not looking, they turned right around and TAUNTED THE RUSSIANS. Here is an example.

The supercarrier Nimitz entered port only very briefly after the fiery crash of the EA-6B. It entered port on May 28 and left again just two days later, May 30. The official story was that it was heading for the Caribbean for continued exercises.

The Nimitz, however, was ordered to the north, not to the south. In a drastic departure from normal procedure, an American carrier group was ordered into the Norwegian and Barents Seas , right on the doorstep of Russia. The deployment was expected to be brief, but it was indeed most dangerous to say the very least. It was in insane act of bravado by the American Bolsheviks, like walking up to a bully and throwing salt into an open wound.

The Russians had had their day and felt no need to push their advantage but undoubtedly there would come a time when the push would go too far.

LIES: BIG THEN AND BIG NOW

The lie of National Security was as big a lie then as it is now. The more we pretend to spend on National Security the less security we can achieve. Those who secretly control America 's destiny (and thus the world) cannot stand the truth and this is why only the truth can begin to loosen our bonds.

There was so much going on at this time that I do not have time to even begin to mention is all, in Iran , Central America, Israel, etc. In January, 1982, Russia renewed geophysical warfare involving weather modification and artificial earthquakes - something which is going on now more than ever. Parts of Canada suffered such extreme blizzard conditions that a "National Emergency" was declared.

For over four years Russian electrogravitic weapons platforms called Cosmospheres had been hovering high over the U.S. They first announced their presence by creating giant air booms along the coasts. Their number continued to multiply and they patrolled continuously over all types of American strategic target areas.

Our American Bolshevik planners planned to shoot down as many Cosmospheres as possible using high-power lasers, when war came. Until late 1981, it was all but impossible for us to even detect the presence of the Cosmospheres floating overhead.

They were invisible to normal radar, except at very close range, but by late 1981 one crash weapons program had come up with a system that could sometimes detect the spheres and allow laser aiming. The new technique was called "Computer-Enhanced Infrared." It was an extremely sensitive means of detecting the heat radiation given off by Cosmospheres. It was recognized by the acronym CEIR (pronounced seer).

On the evening of January 12, 1982, a complete operational test was carried out against a Cosmosphere which was patrolling high over central New Jersey. CEIR was used to aim a ground-based high-power laser at the Cosmosphere, then the laser was fired. A section of the Cosmosphere erupted into blue-green flames.

As the flames started to spread, the crew accelerated the Cosmosphere toward the coast because all Cosmospheres are under very strict orders to make certain that their craft NEVER fall into non-Russian hands, and they were making for the sea post haste. The stricken Cosmosphere, trailing blue-green flames, was seen over a very large area of eastern Pennsylvania and central New Jersey.

It had been hovering at an altitude of more than 40 miles, but it came down fast. Its semi-rigid shell started crumpling. It passed over Atlantic City at low altitude and plunged into the water just a few miles off shore. Many witnesses watched as the remains of the Cosmosphere burned, floating on the surface of the water for some ten minutes. The whole incident created a sensation in the local region, but official Government spokesmen treated it all as a usual non-event!

The first downing of a Cosmosphere created shock waves in the Kremlin. It was decided very quickly that a clear message would be sent to the Pentagon that they would pay dearly if the incident should be repeated.

The Russians knew that a laser had shot down their Cosmosphere so the very next day (January 13) an Air Florida

Boeing 737 jetliner Flight 90 with laser warfare specialists aboard was caused to crash in Washington D.C. The plane crashed into a crowded bridge, broke into pieces, and sank into the river moments after takeoff from National Airport during a snowstorm. The crash claimed the life of 74 of the 79 persons on the plane and 4 others in vehicles on the bridge. Perhaps you remember seeing some of the rescue attempts.

Isn't war fun?

FOLLOW-ON CRASHES

Then followed a string of crashed and near-crashes - all of them supposedly unexplainable. All four Air Force Thunderbird demonstration jets were made to crash. A Boeing 737 in California dropped far below its flight path, seemingly without cause, and narrowly missed disaster as it clipped some power lines.

And strangest of all, a Japan Air Lines DC-8 crashed into Tokyo Bay on February 9th during the final moments of its landing approach. It was a perfect flying day, clear and sunny. The DC-8 was only 1000 yards from touchdown, flying in a gentle glide. There were no mechanical problems.

Suddenly, the pilot acted as if he were dazed. Reportedly he reached over and reversed thrust on two of the four jet engines. The big jet nosed downward; it smashed into light stanchions marking the approach path and crashed into the shallow water; 24 persons were killed and some 150 others were injured.

Later, in the hospital, the pilot said he had blacked out. The co-pilot reportedly said he, too, suddenly felt woozy, but fought it and remained conscious.

Suddenly there was a release of information regarding UFOs and cover-ups of alien visitors and thus and so.

NEUTRON BEAMS

Neutron beams disrupt electronic instruments and also the mental and nervous systems of people. The Russians were saying to the American Bolshevik Pentagon in effect: "If you shoot down any more Cosmospheres, there would be no place to hide."

In February of 1982, there were three main Power Factions struggling to become king-of-the-hill. One faction was that of the Rockefeller cartel - the multinational complex of Big Oil, Big Banking, and Big Business.

Another faction was the Bolshevik-Zionist Axis with headquarters shared between New York City and Jerusalem.

The third faction was that of the NEW rulers of Russia who had expelled most of the Bolsheviks formerly in power there.

ROCKEFELLER-RUSSIAN CARTEL

A new operational relationship was in the works between Russia 's new ruler and the Rockefeller cartel. The arrangement, however fell far short of the prior closeness.

The new arrangement was one of, basically an agreement not to damage one another as a matter of deliberate policy. The prime objective was to free both of them (the Russians and the Rockefeller cartel) to deal with their now mutual enemy, the American Bolsheviks who had infiltrated key policy-making government positions in Washington.

The main area in which the Rockefeller cartel could be helpful to the Russians was in the economic sphere. The American Bolshevik-dominated foreign policy in the U.S. was a policy of economic starvation against Russia and her satellites. The Rockefeller cartel was in a position to partially blunt those policies by cooperating with Russia in the East-West trade.

American Bolshevik economic warfare against the Soviet bloc was most apparent right then in the plight of Poland. The American Bolsheviks were finally succeeding in using the Solidarity Labor Union to push Poland into martial law. Martial Law was being used as an excuse to make the Polish people suffer even more at America 's hands. A thinly disguised food embargo was in place by the U.S. against Poland. Even chicken feed was being held back in order to create disaster for Poland 's own chicken farms. Everything possible was being done to drive the Polish people to such desperation that open revolt would erupt.

The collapse of Poland posed a military threat to Russia and was an economic drain as well. Russia 's new rulers were working with an unwieldy, centralized economy left behind by the expelled Bolsheviks. It could not be changed overnight so the Russians were vulnerable to economic warfare. In order to avoid economic disaster, the Russians were pushing hard for new ways to raise hard Western currency. One such move was a major coup in U.S. Treasury securities but, for the long term, the Russians wanted to establish more stable and mutually beneficial economic ties with the West.

SIBERIAN GAS PIPELINE

The centerpiece of Russia 's economic drive became the Siberian gas pipeline for Western Europe. It was a 25 billion dollar project, the biggest ever between the Soviet Union and the West. It would be completed in 1984.

The Bolsheviks were trying to completely stop the pipeline project, but the Rockefeller oil and business cartel was working diligently to assist the go-ahead of the project. In mid-February the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a long-time Rockefeller public relations organ, went public about the pipeline. It called the Reagan embargo against pipeline equipment a strategy of economic warfare against Russia.

The "Joint Economic Committee" of Congress endorsed the pipeline project and in Europe , American multinational oil companies were lining up in support of the gas pipeline - all of them, that is, except one, Mobil Oil. Unlike the other members of the Rockefeller Big Oil cartel, Mobil Oil in West Germany had been publicly opposing the gas pipeline which, of course, was most interesting in itself.

To the Russians the gas pipeline was a matter of economic survival and, with all-out war on the horizon, the Kremlin had no patience with those who said one thing and did another. The Russians regarded Mobil's position against the pipeline as a double cross, in effect siding with the Bolsheviks in America. Russia 's rulers decided to give Mobil Oil strong reasons to rethink their position, and fast.

On Thursday, February 11, the Russian container ship, Mekhanik Tarasov, departed from a port in Quebec, Canada, bound for Leningrad. It headed northeast up the St. Lawrence River , then out through the Gulf of St. Lawrence into the Atlantic.

After skirting the south coast of Newfoundland, the Tarasov set course east by northeast. Its course was chosen to take it very close to the world's largest semisubmersible oil rig, passing it on the south. Guess what? - the rig was the Ocean Ranger, operated by none other than Mobil Oil. It was supposedly unsinkable - just like the Titanic.

The Tarasov, like many other Russian merchant ships, possessed a military capability that was not admitted. As it neared the giant oil rig in a mounting storm, it launched a homing torpedo with a low-yield nuclear warhead toward the rig.

Just before 1:00 A.M. Monday morning, February 15, the torpedo reached its target, one of the giant underwater pontoons. Nuclear explosions under water are far more confined than those in the air, and this one was well hidden by the hurricane-force winds and pounding waves. A hole was blasted in the pontoon, and the Ocean Ranger started settling toward the side.

The crew gave a trouble call by radio; half an hour later they reported that they were manning the lifeboats. But the Japanese-built Ocean Ranger was designed to be the world's most unsinkable oil rig! A corner of the upper platform dipped into the water and then stopped. The rig stayed afloat, listing at a crazy angle.

The roughnecks stopped boarding the lifeboats, hoping the boats would not be needed, after all. Then a Cosmosphere hovering above the rig took aim at the corner of the rig which had dipped into the water. A powerful blast from its charged particle beam weapon blew a hole in the partially submerged corner.

Immediately, the Ocean Ranger heeled over and sank. It went down so fast that it was too late for lifeboats to be launched successfully, and all hands were lost.

The freighter Tarasov continued on course after sinking the oil rig. The Russians expected that the freighter would be long gone before anyone figured out what had happened - but they miscalculated!

At around 2:00 P.M. that same afternoon, Monday, February 15th, an American attack submarine was closing in on the Tarasov. The sub fired a single torpedo at the Tarasov, hitting it broadside. Water surged in through a giant hole below the waterline, and the freighter started sinking.

Like the crew of the Cosmosphere that was shot down over New Jersey, the crew of the Tarasov had strict orders to protect the secrets of their ship, and so the Russian captain refused assistance from a nearby Danish freighter as his ship sank with its secrets.

Well, Mobil Oil certainly got the message and, just two days later, Mobil Oil shut down the other two oil rigs which had been nearby and towed them ashore.

I recommend you take a second look at all the "oil spill" accidents that have been happening.

PART 9:

RUSSIAN COMMAND OF SPACE AND THE MOON

On February 5, 1982, Vice President Bush made himself conspicuous by a trip to Cape Canaveral Florida. He was photographed with astronauts inside the European-orbital science laboratory called "Space Lab." It was planned to place Space Lab into orbit by Space Shuttle in late 1983. Bush also announced that Space Shuttle flight No. 3 was scheduled for March 22, 1982. It was supposed to be a week in duration.

For public consumption, NASA spokesmen were continuing to pretend that the Shuttle was merely carrying out leisurely test flights. We were told that the Space Shuttle Program was basically a peaceful civilian program in spite of the all-military crews flying the Shuttles. But the peaceful image of the Space Shuttle Program was a total lie. The fact was that the Space Shuttle flights under way were a part of a crash, er, sorry about that, program by the U.S. to regain a military toe-hold in space.

The United States had been virtually locked out of the military use of space by the Russians since late 1977. Russia 's domination of space for those prior four years and longer had been highlighted by numerous manned space flights. Those included cosmonauts from nine countries other than Russia.

Meanwhile, the U.S. went more than five years without admitting to any manned space flight attempts. The Russian, long-duration space spectaculars in Earth orbit were sufficient to build Russia 's prestige in the public eye but the Soviet Space Program involved more than was revealed publicly.

Since mid-October 1977, the Moon had been a Russian outpost. There were seven manned long-range particle beam installations on the near side and at least one large base on the far side. In the past, regular missions were flown to and from the Moon in order to resupply the bases and rotate crews, and slowly but surely, the Kremlin was inching its way toward breaking the news about its control of the Moon.

They were already beginning to drop hints about it as in the example of a publication circulated in the U.S. called Soviet Life in February, 1982. It stated: "Today spaceships shuttle between the Earth and the Moon with greater frequency than did the first voyages to the New World."

At the top of the page was a nighttime photo of a moonship ready to blast off from a Russian Cosmodrome. Below was a picture of the Earth as seen from space, and in between was a statement in bold type designed to give another hint about the moon flights which stated, "From a distance of 70,000 kilometers above the Earth, the planet looks peaceful and even defenseless. The common goal is to protect our blue and green home."

Friends, "satellites" are not used at altitudes of 70,000 kilometers. The highest orbit that is generally useful for Earth satellites is the geosynchronous orbit for stationary satellites over the equator. Seventy-thousand kilometers is almost twice that far from the Earth. The only time a spacecraft reaches that far from the Earth is when it is on its way to or from the Moon or another planet.

Russia 's interest in space extended far beyond military factors. The plans of Russia's new rulers were for the colonization of the solar system. Those plans were moving ahead steadily; in fact, at that time there were two Russian spacecraft approaching the planet Venus and sending back a steady stream of reports from the men aboard.

The Russians settled on Venus first, not Mars. It was the first target beyond the Moon for experimental colonization. Now do you better understand the inability of our government to allow a "Hubble Telescope" into space? The Russians first started landing unmanned craft on Venus in 1975! They learned some key facts that were yet unknown to the U.S. in 1982 when the Shuttle Program was starting up.

In 1978 the Russians began a series of increasing long-duration manned orbital space flights which were widely publicized. Those were gradually extended to six months and more to learn how well crews would stand up to interplanetary space travel. Late in 1981 those long-duration orbital flights were completed. The Russians had learned everything they really needed to know.

On October 30 and November 4, 1981, two Russian spaceships blasted off for Venus. Both ships were manned by Russian Cosmonauts, and both were prepared to land on Venus by early February (the first week) of 1982.

The comparison between the space program of the U.S. and Russia was a study in tragic ironies. Americans were being told that the Space Shuttle was primarily a civilian-oriented project, but it was actually military. We were being told that it was the world's first reusable spacecraft, but a Shuttle was actually being lost on every flight.

We were being told that the Space Shuttle had put us years ahead of Russia , but we had actually slipped years behind. We were often told that our Rulers wanted only peaceful activities in space, but they were shutting down almost all of the entire civilian scientific space program. Funding was continuing for one or two peaceful projects which were too visible to cancel without an uproar, such as the space telescope. The follow-up on projects to explore the solar system were being lopped off and discarded because they contributed nothing to our leaders' plans for war.

We were told that the Russians had nothing but war and conquest on their minds; but it was the Russians, not the Americans, who at that moment had two teams of spacemen ready to land on Venus. They were going there for reasons which had nothing to do with war.

The Russians were exploring the land of Venus. They were going there to explore the solar system simply because it was "out there." Russia's new rulers believed that it was man's destiny to move into space. The urge to explore that motivated their Viking ancestors of old was alive and well in the Russian Space Program. The only real prayer of equality for the U.S. was to somehow bring Russia to her knees economically and hence the orchestrated civil wars.

I know you will find this hard or impossible to believe. It is time for the truth to come forth. Why don't you try to prove me WRONG? Or better still, why don't you decide to seriously find out for yourself what is going on?

You might try reading SOMEBODY ELSE IS ON THE MOON by George Leonard, Little, Brown & Co. Publishers Weekly said of the book, "Leonard has been clued by a pseudonymous ex-NASA scientist (his book's Deep Throat), and his photos from the 'haunted photo tub of NASA,' are truly mind-boggling when one begins to see what he sees: immense 'rigs' apparently 'mining' the moon; strange 'geometricities,' markings, symbols; lights, evidences of change and movement."

Or obtain Richard Hoagland's tapes and books such as Hoagland's Mars, Vol. 3, The Moon-Mars Connection (...our latest findings on the Moon").

On February 16, 1982, the Space Shuttle was moved out to the launch pad at Cape Canaveral , five days ahead of schedule. This would be America 's third Shuttle that was being used. The first, of course, was the real * Columbia * and was destroyed in the prior April. It was replaced by the training Shuttle * Enterprise * which landed at Edwards Air Force Base and was taken to Florida. The * Enterprise * flight in the previous November was simply a stop-gap measure while a third Shuttle could be extensively modified.

The new Shuttle at Cape Canaveral was one of the three secret Shuttles from White Sands. It had undergone extensive modification since the first Shuttle disaster ten months prior. It looked the same as the original * Columbia ,* at least from a distance, but the Shuttle was actually far, far different.

The Shuttle sitting on the pad was armed "to the teeth" for battle. The basic mission of the third Shuttle was the same as that of the first Shuttle's almost a year earlier. Its payload was a heavily armored laser-firing robot battle station designed for space reconnaissance over Russia. Russian space weapons finished destroying all of America 's Spy Satellites nearly four years prior.

That meant America 's war planners would be shooting almost blind at Russia if they began a war without somehow acquiring new reconnaissance date. The Space Shuttle was trying to solve that problem by getting a new hardened satellite into orbit. That was what the Space Shuttle flights were all about - attempts at reconnaissance so that nuclear war could be launched.

After each Shuttle would take off from Florida it followed a long, swooping curved launch into the north in order to immediately fly over Russia. The American Bolshevik military planners believed that if they could once get their new superspy satellite into orbit, it would do the job. They were confident that it could survive any attacks by Russian space weapons long enough to radio back large amounts of reconnaissance data and once they had that information, the Pentagon would be ready to take America to war.

In the spring of 1981, the * Columbia * was destroyed before the Spy Satellite could be deployed. Likewise, the makeshift * Enterprise * mission in November 1981 was a failure, but the military Shuttle planners believed it would be a different story with their Shuttle No. 3 preparing for launch.

In the cargo bay of this Shuttle there was a new robot reconnaissance battle station like the one previously described. There was also an additional laser mounted in the forward end of the cargo bay just behind the crew compartment. It was a hydrogen fluoride gas dynamic laser mounted vertically, aimed upward. It was equipped with a swiveling head consisting of mirrors that could aim the beam around a wide range of angles. The hydrogen fluoride laser in the cargo bay was intended mainly to protect the Shuttle while it climbed toward orbit.

The * Columbia * had come under fire shortly prior to reaching orbit. Intelligence analysts in the U.S. had eventually obtained enough information about what happened to decide on installing the cargo bay laser.

As a Shuttle climbs, the air grows thinner and thinner, dwindling to almost nothing long before rocket engines shut off. At the earliest possible moment, the modified cargo bay doors which had no hinges on the third Shuttle, would be blown off by special explosives. As the cargo bay doors would flutter away from the Shuttle, it would leave the upper half of the bay open. The cargo bay laser would be ready to fire from that moment onward. It was equipped with the same system called CEIR as previously described.

Since a laser thusly equipped successfully shot down a Cosmosphere in January (1982), the Shuttle planners believed the Shuttle would reach orbit safely. Once in orbit planners believed that the main threats to the Shuttle would be Russia 's orbiting Cosmos Interceptors. Those manned killer satellites were responsible for sweeping the skies clear of American Spy Satellites. In order to deal with that threat, there were truly radical modifications to the third Shuttle.

Whenever the space Shuttle was discussed, it was always emphasized that Shuttle astronauts could work in their shirt sleeves - no need for space suits because riding in a Shuttle was almost like riding in an airliner. Not so this time.

When Col. Jack Lousma and Col. C. Gordon Fullerton would lift off in this Shuttle, they would be in spacesuits. What's more, they would be depending on their spacesuits because their crew cabin would not be pressurized. The whole lower front portion of their ship below the flight deck had been turned into a weapons bay. As soon as the Shuttle would reach orbit, the nose would open up to the vacuum of space, the nose would fold downward and back, somewhat like certain cargo aircraft whose noses fold upward to load and unload.

As soon as the nose opened up, a complex laser system would emerge. The system had five tubular sections aimed up, down, to each side, and straight ahead. Each laser tube had a swiveling mirrorhead for beam aiming like that of the cargo bay laser mentioned earlier. Once deployed, the Nose Laser System would be able to fire in almost any direction, the only exception would be a narrow corridor to the rear of the Shuttle.

The Nose Laser System was described as a nuclear punt helium plasma laser with five resonators. The nuclear power pack could fire any one of the five laser tubes at a given time. It was not so powerful as the cargo bay laser but, unlike the cargo bay laser, the Nose Laser System could operate for a long time on an intermittent basis and the Shuttle planners believed it would be powerful enough to disable the manned Russian killer Satellites.

Under the protection of the Nose Laser System, Lousma and Fullerton were to deploy the robot Spy Satellite. As soon as it was deployed, they were to return to Earth in a small Gemini-type re-entry capsule. That part of the plan was the same as previously pointed out for the first flight. Meanwhile, the Shuttle would remain in orbit.

The Nose Laser System was programmed to keep right on zapping any Russian Cosmos Interceptors that would come within range. It would continue doing so until it would be destroyed or the nuclear laser ran down, which could be a very long time. It would constitute a very dangerous nuisance in space, and the Russians would have little choice but to destroy it. The American Bolsheviks hoped the Russians would lost a lot of spaceships and men before they succeeded in doing so.

NUCLEAR WAR NUMBER ONE

If the military Shuttle planners were right in their calculation, the third Shuttle mission could turn into a battle royal in space. If they were wrong, they planned to try again. The fourth Shuttle mission was already scheduled for the Fourth of July. After that, no matter what happened with the Space Shuttle, they were planning to go ahead anyway in setting off Nuclear War Number One.

During the holiday season of 1981 from around Thanksgiving into 1982, Three major crises had besieged us. First, there were stories about the alleged Libyan "hit men" bent on assassinating top leaders of the U.S. Government; secondly, there was the military crackdown in Poland ; and thirdly, as soon as world eyes were riveted on Poland , came ISRAEL 'S ILLEGAL ANNEXATION of the Syrian Golan Heights.

On the surface these three crises might appear to have been unrelated, but they were all closely related indeed, and were certainly not what they appeared to be. Each was a consequence of the complex secret war plan for the joint military junta of the United States and Israel !

Ever since early spring of the year 1981 this war plan was reported to us, the public, but the big cover-up would sweep over us and it would be buried for no one would listen AND THE BRINGERS OF TRUTH WERE INCARCERATED, PUT UP FOR RIDICULE OR SIMPLY KILLED AND NONE OF THE CITIZENS SEEMED TO NOTICE - WORSE, WE DIDN'T CARE IN THE LEAST TO GET RID OF THOSE "WARMONGERS."

The conflicts were intended to gradually escalate until the time would be ripe. Then an American nuclear first strike would be launched against Russia. Nuclear war would break out in such a way that it would appear to be accidental. America 's nuclear forces would not realize that they were firing the first shots of nuclear war. Instead, they would be given false information that would trigger all-out retaliation against a non-existent Russian attack!

The prelude to all-out nuclear war was planned to include war in the Middle East. In the joint war plan of the American Bolsheviks and the Israeli military planners, the Middle East war was the responsibility of Israel. This was making Israel the eye of a growing hurricane of violence.

The crises continued to expand and grow outward without seeming control. Close to Israel , the top priority was to do everything possible to destroy the Camp David Peace Accords, so called. That is why President Sadat of Egypt was assassinated a few weeks prior (Oct. 6).

By early December we were being told that a group of three to six "hit men" were thought to be in the United States. It was claimed that they were gunning for the President and several other top Government officials. The U.S. shot down two Libyan jets and killed a child of Khadafy, trying to program him to behave like a madman. These plans were well laid to try to create situations to push us closer to nuclear war.

The old Bolsheviks from Russia who had gained control of America 's military policies had been trying to trigger revolution in Poland. They first attempted to do so by subverting the Roman Catholic Church and already turmoil was stewing in the Vatican. About three years earlier an attempt was made to turn the Catholic Church strongly anti-Russian in its policies. On September 28, 1978, thirty-three days after his election, the newly-elected pope, John Paul II, was murdered by poisoning and yet we are told he died in his sleep.

In my February, 1979, issue of Doomsday Club News & Intelligence Report newsletter, I said that there was evidence that Pope John Paul I had been murdered and that the Pope who took his place was a KGB agent! Malachi Martin wrote a popular book about the new Pope, THE KEYS OF THIS BLOOD, but what you did not know was that Martin was a Jew using a fake name, and THE NEW POPE WAS NOT WHAT HE SEEMED TO BE, EITHER! A book called IN GOD'S NAME by David Yallop came out in 1984 with proof of the murder of the previous Pope, and Lawrence Patterson in his newsletter revealed the Jew hoaxer using the name Malachi Martin.

For those of you who still have a copy of my newsletter, why don't you check up on me: On page 6 of the February 1979 issue I said, "The present Pope (Pope John Paul II) will not last very long. I will go on record and emphasize it - THE PRESENT POPE WILL LAST PROBABLY LESS THAN FIVE TO SEVEN YEARS" (emphasis copied). Ah, I goofed, you will say, because he is still there. But let me quote from a book called BLOOD AND ASHES, a Phoenix Journal, which on page 133 says: "The Bolsheviks within the Vatican who engineered his election wanted only his potentially anti-Russian image, not the man himself and so he, too, WAS DONE AWAY WITH BY POISONING AND REPLACED BY A 'DOUBLE' ON NOVEMBER 21, 1978. THE NEW 'ACTOR POPE' THEN BEGAN ISSUING A STEADY STREAM OF STIFF STATEMENTS AGAINST ALLEGED RUSSIAN REPRESSION OF POLAND.

"The American Bolsheviks fully planned to use their power in the Vatican to set off what would be known as the 'Pope's Revolution' in Poland... Russian Intelligence was able to replace the Bolshevik actor Pope with their own 'double'."

Yallop, in his book on page 301, says: "Many millions of words have been written since the election of Karol Wojtyla in attempts to analyze and understand what kind of man he is. As can be seen, he is the kind of man who could allow men like Villot, Cody, Marcinkus, Mennini, de Strobel, de Bonis, and Poletti to remain in office. There can be no defense on the grounds of ignorance. Marcinkus is directly answerable to the Pope, and it is inconceivable that the Pope could be unaware of the degree of guilt that clings to Marcinkus." Marcinkus, my friends, was a member of the Jewish Mafia in Cicero Illinois who eventually gained control of the Vatican 's BILLIONS (that's dollars) (see book by that name, for instance) and killed the previous pope. Don't you just love religion and preachers?

END OF PART 9.

PART 10:

THE FAKE POPE

The fake pope was scheduled to visit Poland to set off a revolution, but Russian Intelligence was able to stop it. Having had their Vatican intrigue spoiled for the moment, the Bolshevik planners in American started down a different route.

Their agents within Poland started agitation for an independent labor union to be known as Solidarity. Solidarity was created solely for the purpose of making conditions steadily worse in Poland until an unavoidable confrontation would be created with the government. Eventually they were successful and martial law was declared.

The news of martial law in Poland reached the West early Sunday, December 13th (1981). The very next day the Begin government in Israel launched the third Christmas crisis. On that day the Israeli government announced its surprise decision to annex the Golan Heights.

The Golan Heights is along the northeast corner of Israel 's border with Syria , and is Syrian territory. They have been occupied by Israeli troops ever since the 1967 war and then by Israeli civilian settlements, but under every rule of international law the Golan Heights belongs to Syria.

As always, the Begin government defended its actions in arrogantly self-righteous terms as it made a mockery of the rule of law!

World-wide, the reaction was universal condemnation of Israel , and within Israel itself there was also bitter criticism. The U.S. was in a most difficult position of what face to show publicly. Time slipped by while urgent secret decisions were made about how to handle the situation publicly.

Then, on December 18, the United States half-heartedly announced that it would suspend "indefinitely" the allegedly new strategic cooperation agreement with Israel. In response Israel canceled altogether the new agreement with America.

BY MUTUAL AGREEMENT BEHIND CLOSED DOORS, THE U.S. AND ISRAEL STRUCK AN ARM'S-LENGTH POSE FOR PUBLIC CONSUMPTION. This was specifically for the purpose of freeing Israel 's hands to act without restraint later on.

Israel Prime Minister Rabin summed it up with the words, quote: "Annexing the Golan Heights is the beginning of the end of ' Camp David '."

Well, at that time all the plans of the American Bolsheviks and the Zionists in Israel were still on track. They were shooting for Middle East war to break out before the end of the summer of 1982. From there, step by step, they planned to make the conflict escalate with other crises continuing to multiply world-wide.

On July 6, 1982 the "ISRAELI" government announced that American troops would be sent to Lebanon , if necessary. Hours later, Reagan announced that, "Yes, in principle, he was prepared to send in the Marines as part of a 'truce agreement'."

DIRTY POOL

For public consumption, assurances were given that this would be done under certain comforting conditions. Supposedly, if the Marines are sent in it will only be temporary to police a truce, not fight, and only if all sides agree to their presence.

Doesn't if sound like a rerun - "We are just there to insure Iraq doesn't invade our little brother, Saudi Arabia ," and, "We are in Haiti only to preserve Democracy." Iraq had no intention of invading Saudi Arabia - then or later. Saddam Hussein was 'called in' to Kuwait to protect the interests of the Kuwaitis from being absorbed by the U.S. interests and a collapse brought on by calling of notes following default by the Kuwaitis, to the bankers. Dirty pool.

The following day a letter of warning against sending in the Marines was delivered to Reagan from Soviet President Brezhnev. It was a cryptic warning containing no specific threats. In diplomatic language it simply said, "Don't do it."

Anti-war warnings from Moscow were becoming increasingly urgent and frequent. On July 7 the Brezhnev warning against sending U.S. Marines into Lebanon was issued, and only six days later the Ustinov warning against an American nuclear first strike was issued. Does this surprise you? Don't you remember that little tidbit of news?

Russia's anti-war warnings included not only words but also deeds, my friends. The Kremlin was run by men who knew that words without deeds were useless against the American Bolsheviks. That is why we were given warnings a month prior to this that Russian preemptive measures must be expected to start taking place. Those pre-preemptive measures got under way promptly, in the form of warning strikes to send a clear, clean message.

The first of those warning strikes took place on Sunday morning, June 27 (1982). Millions of Americans watched the launch of Space Shuttle No. 4 that morning on television. You watched until the two solid rocket boosters separated and fell away from the Shuttle. Moments later a Jumbo Cosmosphere, which was pacing the Shuttle from a distance, fired two quick blasts at the falling boosters which were no longer visible on television.

The Cosmosphere's beam weapon blew a hole in the side of each $18,000,000 booster shell. An Air Force C-130 airplane was tracking the boosters and saw their parachutes open, but when the spent boosters hit the water they just kept right on sinking. Thanks to the holes which had been neatly blown into their sides - they certainly didn't float. Recovery teams watched helplessly as $36,000,000 worth of space hardware sank in several thousand feet of water.

Embarrassed NASA officials tried to explain away the loss of the two Shuttle boosters with the lie that the parachutes did not open (on both of them?). The odds are astronomical against the parachutes failing that way on TWO BOOSTERS, but they had no other excuse that they dared make public.

WARNINGS!

The Encyclopedia Brittanica Book of the Year says of this incident: "* Columbia 's* fourth launch from Kennedy Space Center was on June 27, with astronauts Thomas K. Mattingly and Henry W. Hartsfield, Jr. Fittingly enough, it landed on July 4 at Edwards Air Force Base in California, greeted by Pres. Ronald Reagan and an estimated 500,000 fellow citizens. A major problem occurred when the two booster rockets plunged into the Atlantic , apparently because of parachute failures. There was no danger to the * Columbia ,* however. Experiments included the first one to be developed by a private company. It was designed to produce certain pharmaceuticals continuously with high purity. The astronauts also helped save the first 'getaway special' when a defective circuit prevented power from reaching the canister."

Meanwhile, the Russian message was indeed clear. Had they cared to, the Russians could have destroyed the Shuttle itself on nationwide television, no less, instead of only the boosters. They were saving our government"s "face" to use more advantageously during the ensuing years. They certainly have managed to do that very nicely, at our expense.

Next came the Aeroflot crash in Moscow followed by the reprisal on July 9 against the Pan Am jet in New Orleans (a Pan American World Airways Boeing 747 jet carrying 145 persons crashed in Kenner, LA, shortly after taking off from New Orleans, exploded, and plowed through four residential streets; the accident, which killed 153 persons including 8 on the ground, was the second worst air disaster in U.S. history involving a single plane.) Both events were acts of war - the secret war which both sides were beginning to mention openly in public. The Russian message to the American Bolsheviks here was: "You are not as secure as you pretend you are."

Six days later the Russians reminded the Bolsheviks in the U.S. of their combined capabilities in geophysical warfare, a widespread sabotage here. As far back as 1977 we had been warned that the Russians were on a campaign of planting nuclear mines where they could destroy countless dams around the United States. Those devices are still there, waiting for use at the press of a button from a detonator trigger well out of our reach or ability to control.

How could subversive workers get within our boundaries without our knowing? They can't There are as many Russian KGB agents in our CIA as Americans. Our government thought, at the time, the mines were a big bluff because it was the Russians themselves who announced their presence to our government.

On July 15, 1982, the Kremlin said, "Think again" to the Bolshevik pentagon. That day northern Colorado was reeling from incredible rainstorms, the product of Russian weather modification. Dams in the area were straining to hold back the onslaught of water. Then a low-yield underwater mine was detonated at the base of the Lawn Lake Dam. The dam blew open, and the flood waters rampaged down the canyon and through the resort town of Estes Park. The government frantically tried to cover its tracks by saying they had been worried about that dam, but the disaster actually came with absolutely no warning because the dam was ruined instantly by the explosion.

MORE WARNINGS

The very next day there was still another Russian warning shot. This time it was couched in the centuries-old language of naval warfare, updated to the Space Age.

When confrontations take place at sea there are times when a warship will fire a shot across the bow of another ship. The shot is aimed to barely miss the ship, whistling past just in front of it. A shot across the bow is perhaps the most unmistakable military message on the face of the Earth. It means: "Halt immediately or you will be destroyed."

On July 16 a United Airlines DC-10 took off from Boston bound for Los Angeles. Among the passengers of the big jet were certain key members of the Bolshevik ruling group here in America.

For a while the flight progressed without incident but as the jet flew westward at 39,000 feet a Russian Cosmosphere was stationing itself to intercept it. The Cosmosphere hovered several miles off to one side of the jet's flight path and a few hundred feet above it. The charged particle beam weapon of the Cosmosphere was aimed horizontally to fire a shot across the bow of the speeding DC-10.

As the jet approached, the Cosmosphere crew charged up the beam weapon for a maximum energy blast in a defocused mode. This produces a violent air blast like those heard that winter along America 's East Coast and elsewhere. At precisely the right instant the Cosmosphere fired its shot across the bow of the oncoming DC-10.

The tremendous air blast just above the DC-10's altitude created a huge shock wave of downward-racing air. An instant later the DC-10 flew into it. Passengers later told reporters that they heard a big bang, then the whole plane shook as it was squashed downward as if by a giant hand. Everyone not wearing a seat belt was thrown to the ceiling, which is a long way on a DC-10. Many people were hurt, several seriously; then the episode was over as quickly as it had started.

The jet flew on to Los Angeles without further incident - but to certain individuals on the plane, the airborne shot across the bow was meant as a clear warning! It certainly meant something to the military and government personnel because they had been warned it would happen. It clearly said, "Halt now in your war plans or you will be destroyed."

The next warning shot took place on July 22. This was aimed squarely at the weapons specialists among the American Bolsheviks in the U.S. That day the first full-range test flight of the Army's new Pershing-2 missile took place at Cape Canaveral. The Pershing-2 is the nuclear missile which the Reagan Administration wanted to place in Europe where it could attack Russia. Europe would be used as a launching pad.

A few seconds after the Pershing-2 lifted off from Cape Canaveral it was bathed in neutron radiation from a Russian Cosmosphere high above. Remember, neutron radiation totally deranges all kinds of electronic equipment. As a result, the Pershing-2's guiding system went crazy.

The climbing missile flopped over on its side, then started cartwheeling through the lovely Florida skies. Seventeen seconds after lift-off, the Range Safety Officer pushed the self-destruct button and the missile blew up.

The Russian message to the Bolsheviks in the U.S. was very plain indeed. The plans to use missiles to help destroy Russia would not succeed. The attempt to do so would only rain destruction on America itself.

NUCLEAR WAR ONE

The Reagan-Begin Axis of Bolsheviks and Zionists intended to manipulate those crises, and more to come, to pave the way for war. Suddenly, certain crises would combine to trigger a chain of events leading to Nuclear War One. The joint military junta of the United States Pentagon and Israel were working on a fast timetable for all of this. They were aiming for deadline time of midsummer 1982 for the final war sequence to begin; fulfillment of the plan was set for September.

This would involve regional conflicts in the Middle East and elsewhere which gradually would escalate to engulf the superpowers. The whole thing was being set up to make nuclear war appear unavoidable. At last all-out nuclear war itself would break out between the United States and Russia. It would be made to appear accidental, but as we have detailed in the past, Nuclear War One would actually begin with an AMERICAN FIRST STRIKE AGAINST RUSSIA.

Up to that point, the secret war planners in the U.S. had been expecting that it would take many months for the final war buildup to run its course. For example, a Mideast war might be triggered by the summer of 1982, but it could take until the spring of 1983 for the resulting nuclear war to actually erupt. That plan had actually been changed and by winter 1982 drastic changes took place in the secret war planning under way in America.

The timetable for Nuclear War One was speeded up by many months in order to render the oncoming winter an ally. This was when the target date was set for mid-September 1982. That was little more than six months from the third Shuttle launch and thus the desperate need for intelligence surveillance information regarding the Soviet Union. Well, then a major intelligence coup was scored by the American Bolsheviks which would allow for fairly accurate targeting.

Two high-ranking soviet generals were spirited out of Russia and brought to Washington. Those two men were Bolsheviks whom Russia's new non-Bolshevik rulers failed to detect and weed out. In Intelligence parlance, they remained as "moles" in Russia's military apparatus.

Now they had been brought to America, and they brought with them a wealth of data about Russia 's current military posture. Thanks to those two former Bolshevik Soviet generals the secret war planners in the U.S. now had enough information.

If they could get more data from Space Shuttle flights Nos. 3 and 4, so much the better, but if neither of those two flights was successful, the war planners intended to wait no longer and go with ground intelligence. They wanted to make use of the intelligence obtained from the Soviet generals while it was still fresh and changes could not be made in the Soviet Union who would suspect treason. Therefore, the deadline to attack the Russians was rescheduled.

If the U.S. had realized and listened, we would have all realized that the fourth launch was a crossing line to countdown to war.

COUNTDOWN TO NUCLEAR WAR I

In early 1982 there was a tremendous hidden struggle for power that was dividing the U.S. government. On one side were the American Bolsheviks whose chief government operative was Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger. On the other side was the Rockefeller cartel whose chief government spokesman was Secretary of State Alexander Haig. Weinberger and Haig were constantly at each other's throats in the news, and worse, in private. Caught in the middle was the puppet, President Reagan.

Reagan was installed by the Rockefeller cartel but came to be largely under Bolshevik control after the assassination "attempt" in March of 1981. By February of 1982 the American military was dominated by the Bolsheviks, but that had not always been so.

By 1982 a plan for a Rockefeller cartel-backed military coup was being set in motion (again) and this time it was a crash program. The Rockefeller cartel could not afford to let their Bolshevik enemies succeed in setting off nuclear war; therefore, the military coup must take place before the American Bolshevik surprise attack against Russia. If possible, the coup would be carried out before the fourth Space Shuttle flight planned for the summer of 1982, because the war was scheduled immediately following that flight.

The man who was in charge of the military coup preparations was a four-star Army General who was also Secretary of State - General Alexander Haig. If you remember the Falkland Islands War occurred about this time and the Bolsheviks foiled the coup. Haig was fired and Bolshevik George P. Shultz took his place, on June 25th.

FALKLANDS WAR

You need to know the facts behind the Falkland Islands War, the shooting of the U.S.S. Liberty by the Israelis, the turmoil in Central America, developments towards the Iran-Iraq war, Libya's Kadhafi, Afghanistan, Poland, etc. Things were and are not as you think they are, friends!

I have mentioned about doubles. For example, on March 6 the BBC quoted a London Times article questioning whether or not Khomeini was still alive. The article expressed suspicions that fake pictures were being used showing the "double" for Khomeini.

HOW MANY FINGERS DO YOU SEE?

I remember, I believe, the article was in Reader's Digest, an article that said that when Khomeini went into exile to Paris, he was missing a finger. When he later returned to Iran , Khomeini was not missing any fingers. Khomeini was quite a miracle worker, don't you think? Or could somebody be pulling a fast one?

The Reagan-Begin Axis, in cahoots with their Zionist partners in Israel , were going all out to try to start a nuclear war.

The Manhattan Project went from a decision to make the bomb (on the day before Pearl Harbor in December 1941), to a working bomb exploded on Hiroshima in August, 1945. And this was before computers.

In 1982, a new program was started similar to the Manhattan Project. It was called the "Stealth" program, and, surprise, surprise, it succeeded the same year! It succeeded because of the immense computing power of the Control Data Corporation Star 100 and Cray computers (an offshoot of Control Data).

The most secret branch of the Stealth Program was developing aircraft that would be invisible to more than just radar. They must be invisible even to the eye. These invisible "Phantom" war planes would carry special electromagnetic gear.

You see, there was already the capability, for Russia had the know-how to cause the Cosmos Interceptors and Cosmospheres to be invisible. All that was really needed was to get defectors and most defectors had a "price" under which they will bargain.

The equipment included superconducting magnets which were maintained at temperatures close to absolute zero. The cryogenic equipment creates an enormously powerful electromagnetic field around the aircraft. The field is designed according to the principles of Einstein's "Unified Field Theory."

Einstein never completely finished his Field Theory, but it was studied by numerical techniques using the Star 100 and Cray computers and others and integration became a simple game. By this method, enough could be learned, coupled with stolen information, to apply the Unified Field Theory to the new "Phantom" war planes.

Think of the magnificent possibilities. Time is a function of the measurement of movement of "things" - atoms, matter, and stuff. At absolute zero, atoms stop moving. Time stops. When atoms speed up in relation to surroundings, time speeds up. Frequency is everything.

When you understand the rules, wondrous things are possible. For hints of the possibilities, study the Philadelphia Experiment and Project Montauk. Read A BRIEF HISTORY OF TIME by Stephen Hawking or HYPERSPACE, A SCIENTIFIC ODYSSEY THROUGH PARALLEL UNIVERSE, TIME WARPS, AND THE 10TH DIMENSION by Michio Kaku.

This is why the government must keep the Stealth aircraft a "national security" secret. They have revealed the part of the secret telling that the shape of the surfaces affects the radar signature, to explain the strikes in Iraq and so on, but they don't want you to know the rest of the secrets. By revealing this much, they kept the Stealth program from being scuttled by Congress.

Under this program they can send 22 planes into battle, and 22 planes return. Mission accomplished! You do not see all the others that also went into battle, and those that are lost are made up for so that you see the same number return.

When the invisibility field would be turned on, a "Phantom" war plane would be encased in a sort of electromagnetic bubble. Light that strikes the field from any direction divides, passes around the plane, comes together again on the other side, and goes on. The effect is like a boulder in a stream - water flowing toward the boulder divides, goes around it and then comes together again on the other side.

When you "see" something, light bounces off the object and strikes your eyes. Your eyes then recognize the pattern. If something comes between you and the object, you can no longer see it. But if the light from the object goes around the obstruction, you see the original object, but not the obstruction. This is how Phantom planes work, although up close they can be dimly detected, while farther away they are totally invisible. Do you now understand why so many "UFO" sightings are blurry?

Radar behaves the same way as light, it just has a different wavelength, so Phantom planes are invisible to both light and radar, unless they turn off their fields. This explains some of the reported sonic booms where there was no visible airplane.

The Russians, however, can see through these fields using sophisticated infrared beam detectors.

Phantom war planes are totally immune to lasers because a laser is just a beam of intense light. An invisibility field also would give protection against the Russian Particle Beam system in tracking ability but the plan backfired because the Russians had already developed anti-invisible shield technology. Ordinarily, charged particles are far easier to deflect than light, so the charged particle beam is no match for the light-deflecting shield. Ah, but when you get into pulsed neutron beams - you have a real handful of troubles.

And so that leaves only neutron beam weapons. Russia's neutron beam would penetrate the invisibility shield, but ways were thought to have been found to shield against neutron radiation well enough to make neutron beams ineffective in stopping a Phantom war plane. This was conceived as true because extremely effective shielding would be part of the basic design of the Phantom war plane whereby the plane would have to first be "located" in order to be fired upon. The basic design would require such sophisticated shielding in order to prevent derangement of the electronic instruments as well as the crew, if it were a manned craft.

So the result of the program would be craft which would be undetectable by conventional means, and it was believed to be invulnerable to all of Russia's beam weapons. Those beam weapons had been the key to Russia's military superiority since late 1977, so the Phantom war plane was the hope-for weapon to attack Russia in the upcoming planned nuclear strike.

The Phantom war plane had one recognized major drawback. In a way, its greatest strength would also be its greatest weakness. When the invisibility field would be turned on, incoming light waves would not strike the plane; instead, the light flows around the plane. That is what makes the plane invisible to observers at a distance but, at the same time, the field prevents light waves from the outside world from reaching the cockpit of the plane. In other words, the pilot cannot see anything outside the invisibility field. He is required by physical law to fly blind.

There was only one technique known in the West by which a Phantom war plane could be navigated. It is called "Inertial Guidance," a technique used for ICBMs. In Inertial Guidance, a computerized system keeps track of all the forces and maneuvers experienced by the vehicle. By adding these up over time, the system calculates where it is without reference to the outside world. For a Phantom war plane, the Inertial Guidance problem is very difficult. The guidance system must operate for as long as several hours while the plane flies to its target. That gives lots of time for errors to build up which would send the plane off course, but the problem was thought to be solved sufficiently to utilize the Phantom planes in the attack.

New Inertial Guidance technology had been developed using lasers in place of the old mechanical gyros used in ICBMs, and so the supersecret Phantom war plane project had basically succeeded in concept - and, for all intents and purposes, we now had a new superweapon. It was revolutionary, prototypes were flying and a rush production program was already under way by the early 1980s. The secret war planners expected to have an operational fleet ready by summer, 1982. This was the "pacing item" in the short war timetable.

Because of inertial guidance, absolutely accurate reconnaissance data on Russian targets was totally critical to the war planning. When Phantom war planes would take off to attack Russia, they would have to know ahead of time exactly where the target would be. Therefore, for a year the Space Shuttle had been making a desperate attempt to obtain the needed target information from space. It would be the first new data since Russia destroyed our Spy Satellites in 1978. The first two Shuttle flights were NOT successful in their secret military mission, but in February, 1982, Shuttle No. 3 was more successful. The war planners now obtained the most crucial target data needed for a Phantom war plane attack against Russia. As a result, a whole new war plan was being prepared for the coming planned nuclear war.

America 's war strategists were eager for war because they believed they could achieve victory over Russia - the concept of victory, however, DID NOT INCLUDE THE AMERICAN PEOPLE. THE SECRET WAR STRATEGISTS WERE PREPARING TO SACRIFICE AMERICA AND MOST OF HER PEOPLE ON THE ALTAR OF WORLD DOMINATION - AND ONLY THE TIME AND PLACE HAS CHANGED.

END OF PART 11.

PART 12:

WAR STRATEGY

The radically new Phantom war plane caused an equally radical revision of the master war strategy of the U.S. Elements of several past strategies were being blended together to create a new and grander plan. It was the new grand master strategy which America 's war planners were counting on to bring them victory in Nuclear War One, and they planned to use the war plan very quickly - by Autumn of 1982, with or without the proper surveillance hoped for by Shuttle flight No. 3.

Strategic nuclear war planning in Washington was being carried out under the code name "Project Z." The letter "Z" was chosen because it is the final letter of the alphabet. The war planners were confident that this would be the last war plan they would need against Russia. War planning under Project Z was so secret that it was not being done at the Pentagon itself; instead, an elite group of war strategists were assembled at a special war room in downtown Washington. The war room was hidden away in a building which would never be suspected for the purpose. It was practically within the shadow of the White House.

The elite war planners for Nuclear War One were a very small group. Their job was to think in terms of the big overall picture. They had at their fingertips computer terminals with which they could access any information they needed from other government computers (using PROMIS software stolen from Inslaw, for instance). This included not only Pentagon data banks but also the computer files of all other government agencies.

By May the Project Z planners had already arrived at the broad outlines for their master war plan. Countless details and refinements still lay ahead, but the basic strategy was already decided. That strategy bears looking at herein.

The Project Z strategy for Nuclear War One was a three-phase plan - that is, the war planners intended for the war to proceed in three distinct phases known as: Phase 1 - Initiation; Phase 2 - Attrition; and Phase 3 - Domination.

The major process was based on ever-increasing world crises, like those that led up to World War I. We were seeing that process in full swing all around us. It was planned that these crises escalate for about six additional months and finally the spark would be set off. The Project Z war planners were concerned with the military acts from that initial spark onward.

Phase Number One: In their plan, the Initiation Phase would begin with an American surprise attack against Russia. The surprise attack would use the new Phantom war planes. They would be the key to the outcome of the rest of the war.

In the summer of 1978 America had begun major shifting to a first-strike nuclear strategy against Russia. It would be a first strike. It would be to knock out the Earth bases for Russia 's space triad of strategic weapons. If that could be done, Russia 's overwhelming military power in space would soon wither and perish.

That would leave the U.S. and Russia on more equal terms for the rest of the war. The plan was to use a combination of Subcraft and Unmanned Aircraft called RPVs for the initial attack. That plan was actually attempted some two years prior but ended in total failure because Subcraft of RPVs were no match for Russia 's Cosmospheres with their beam weapons, but the new Phantom war planes were almost ready and the plan was being revived in updated form.

Phantom war planes were intended to be based in at least three countries on Russia's doorstep. These basing areas were: northern Norway; eastern Turkey; and most critical of all, Sinkiang Province in northwestern China. Now you know why Reagan and others became so cozy with China! Already, high-powered lasers were being moved into those areas. They were equipped with the new aiming device called CEIR (see-er). Those lasers had the proven ability to shoot down Cosmospheres. They would be used to protect the Phantom war planes from destruction on the ground by Cosmospheres.

The Phantom war planes which would be used were unmanned. They were equipped with robot pilots which would be programmed for a one-way trip. The invisible robot pilot and aircraft would fly through Russian air space, invulnerable to any beam-weapon attacks. Anti-aircraft missiles fired at them would be unable to home in on them, and so the Project Z planners believed that the robot Phantom planes would reach their targets.

Those targets were Russia's four Cosmodromes for rockets plus several Cosmosphere installations in central Siberia. The invisible robot planes would crash like kamikazes into their targets. Seemingly out of the clear blue sky, all of Russia 's space bases would suddenly vanish in thermonuclear fireballs.

In addition to Russia's space bases, the Phantom war plane assault would also be directed at one other category of prime targets. These were the bases for Russia's flying Anti-missile System. The system consisted of a fleet of TU-144 Supersonic Transports equipped with particle-beam weapons. They were supposed to provide Russia's final line of defense against incoming missile warheads. American Phantom war planes would be programmed to destroy the TU-144 bases.

Phase #1 was continuing on a very tight timetable by May, 1982. If the invisible war plane attack would succeed, a furious counterattack by Russia was guaranteed. Project Z called for the U.S. to beat Russia to the punch. The entire U.S. nuclear arsenal was to be fired at Russia.

It would be done by creating the false indication that America was under nuclear attack. The method which would be employed was known as Electromagnetic Pulse or EMP. EMP is a phenomenon associated with nuclear blasts at the fringes of space. The strategic forces were programmed to consider an EMP episode to be positive proof of a Russian attack. Under those circumstances, they were instructed to counterattack against Russia without waiting for any further orders.

In the Project Z timetable, the Phantom was plane explosions in Russia would be followed moments later by nuclear detonations over North America. These would be the warheads of American high-speed missiles called ACMs. They would be launched into the sky from various locations around the U.S. to create a violent EMP episode. The Strategic/Nuclear Forces, obeying orders, would launch what they would believe to be a retaliation against Russia.

As the American ACMs would be launched into the sky over our heads, still another event was to be underway. Keep in mind the episode of January, 1982, whereby a Russian Cosmosphere had been shot down for the fist time - over New Jersey. In the same way, high-power lasers located in many places around the U.S. would be shooting down as many Cosmospheres as possible.

By the time our ICBMs were launched a few minutes later, it could be expected that many of the threatening Cosmospheres overhead would have been destroyed. They would be unable to blast all of our missiles as they were launched, and many would survive to be on their way to Russia. Thanks to the initial Phantom war plane attack, Russia 's flying ABM system would also be out of action. Stripped of all her defenses against missile attack, the Soviet Union would soon be aflame with a sea of nuclear firestorms.

In the Project Z war plan, the arrival of American ICBMs on Russian targets would mark the end of Phase #1, the Initiation Phase.

PHASE TWO: THE ATTRITION PHASE

Phase Number Two: This is the Attrition Phase. During Phase #2 the war planners envisioned extreme damage to both the U.S. and to Russia , with the war gradually running down. First there would be a rain of Russian missile warheads on the U.S. There would also be missile attacks on certain other targets around the world where American Military Forces were located, but the real destruction would be right in the U.S. itself.

The Project Z war planners did not expect America , as you know it, to survive a nuclear exchange. Unlike Russia , the U.S. has no Civil Defense worthy of the name, let alone hardened blast shelters and, because of the need for total surprise in the attack against Russia 's space bases, the ensuing nuclear exchanges would come without warning. Vacationers would be on beaches, businessmen would be making deals, housewives would be in supermarkets, children would be at play, etc.

In my July 1978 newsletter I warned that it was the policy of the U.S. to NOT warn its population. Suddenly air raid sirens might start to blare, as they would do so on a summer day in Hiroshima years ago, but it would be too late. The America you know and love would die in a thousand Hiroshimas. The war schemers have planned for all that and have only updated the plans to suit changes in happenings TODAY.

While you and your children vanish from the face of the Earth, they fully intended and still intend to be riding out any attack they have caused, inside Government war bunkers build with your taxpayer money, at Camp David, Mount Weather , Pine Gap, China Lake and DOZENS of other locations. Do you have your passes to these places? I thought not.

4 OF 5 AMERICANS TO DIE

Gradually, over a period of many months, they fully expected the conflict between Russia and the U.S. to sputter out. Both sides would be exhausted and ruined; both would lose the capacity to carry the war any further.

In Russia , the wound would be grievous - up to 50 million dead and millions more injured and dying. BUT IN THE U.S. THE WOUND WOULD BE MORTAL. The Project Z war planners had figured it out on their computers. If we were lucky, from 40 to 50 million Americans might survive at the end of the war. All the rest would have been killed outright in the nuclear attacks or would have died of injuries and disease. Nuclear War One would leave medical care virtually nonexistent in what would be left of America.

The American Bolsheviks intended to ride out the war after setting it off. They would wait until the stalemate point would be reached with both sides unable to fight any longer. That would mark the end of Phase #2, the Attrition Phase.

PHASE THREE: FINAL

Phase Number Three: Finally, the Project Z war plan would move into the third and final phase. That phase, of course, would be world domination by the SATANIC BOLSHEVIKS/ZIONISTS (PARASITES) who already controlled and control the U.S. military.

In the final phase as planned for 1982, the Bolsheviks/Zionists in America would be taking advantage of secret preparations which began long, long prior.

One arm of the prior plan had been strategy which required the U.S. to give the impression that it was growing steadily weaker, disarming unilaterally, closing military bases, and so on, but that was only for public consumption. The secret side of the strategy involved an actual buildup of armaments, in secret. This necessitated a secret government, which was set up by Jimmy Carter, Oliver North, George Bush, et al., under the smokescreen of FEMA - the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

When the Bolsheviks/Zionists in the U.S. seized power from the Rockefellers, they continued the stockpiling of secret reserves of armaments world-wide, and especially in Israel. It was well planned that as the war began to sputter, all these armaments would be brought into the open.

Even if the entire populations of the U.S. and Russia were destroyed, that would still leave 95% of the world's population alive, and under total domination of the "Elite." Both the Bolsheviks and the Zionists despise and loathe both the Russians and the Americans and world domination could only come to the bankers and global cartel through massive damage and/or destruction to both major powers.

Where does all this leave our ally Great Britain ? Could it be they plan to survive free and clear in domination of the world?

On March 30, 1982, one day behind schedule, we got to see a Shuttle landing at the White Sands Missile Range New Mexico. White Sands is the true nerve center of the Space Shuttle Program, regardless of what the media tells you otherwise.

The third Shuttle flight, regardless of which Shuttle did what, represented another "first" and that one was not visible on television. For the first time a Space Shuttle had succeeded in its secret military mission. By so doing, another barrier was removed in the path to nuclear war.

The third Shuttle mission took place nearly a year after the first flight of April, 1981. A comparison between the first and third flights is a study in ironies.

In the April fiasco, publicity about the first flight was designed to give the impression that it was unnaturally perfect. Meanwhile, the secret military mission - which you did not see - was a disaster. With the third flight, it was the other way around.

>From start to finish the publicity emanating from NASA gave the impression that the Shuttle was plagued with problems. NASA wanted to be able to explain it away if disaster should strike again but, as it turned out, the military mission in space, hidden from our eyes, was a success and the loss of one more Shuttle was not so detrimental to the program as a whole.

TROUBLES

Space Shuttle No. 3 was supposed to orbit a special new Spy Satellite. It was hardened against attack from Russia 's space weapons and armed with a robot-controlled laser that could shoot back. In addition, the Shuttle itself was armed with lasers on this third try.

The public image of a troubled, plagued Shuttle flight actually got underway several days prior to launch, thanks to the weather. Drenching rainstorms turned Edwards Air Force Base in California, used for the prior two landings, into a wet bog. The tight military schedule of the Shuttle Program required that the flight take off on schedule anyway, so for public consumption a 23-car railroad train loaded with equipment was sent from California to New Mexico.

Ostensibly, NASA was setting up a spur-of-the-moment landing site at the White Sands Missile Range. This was done so that the central role of White Sands Missile Range in the Shuttle Program would not be suspected by the public and would also delete the need for substitute Shuttles in the landing itself because it is publicly closed.

Space Shuttle No. 3 lifted off from Cape Canaveral only an hour behind schedule on Monday morning, March 22nd. Beginning at the moment of liftoff, NASA started laying the basis for a cover-up story should the military mission fail.

First you heard the pre-recorded voice of Shuttle Commander Jack Lousma saying unexplained white flakes were flying past the windshield. Later, after the Shuttle was out of sight, we were told that one of the power packs called an APU was not functioning. These initial hints of possible trouble had been pre-recorded for broadcast during the launch - for a reason. There was fear that the Shuttle might be destroyed by Russian space weapons before reaching orbit altitude.

Had that happened, the Shuttle managers wanted to be able to initiate a cover-up which would not reveal the military situation; but as it turned out, the preparations paid off and, through the radical new maneuver already discussed, the Shuttle did at least reach proper altitude.

When the Shuttle No. 3 took off, it headed into the northeast. Long-distance cameras followed it until the two solid rockets separated and fell away. Then, as the Shuttle disappeared from sight, it started its long sweeping turn into the north. It was heading toward a near-polar orbit so that it would pass over Russia. This much of the flight plan was the same as in the past, but this time a critical new feature was added.

Less than 30 seconds after the Shuttle disappeared from TV cameras, the cargo-bay doors were blasted completely off. This opened up a field of fire for the defensive laser at the front of the cargo bay. Then the Shuttle and its giant external tanks started rotating slowly in a space-age version of a barrel-roll.

In World War II, fighter pilots made use of the barrel roll to avoid bullets from enemy airplanes. Likewise, the Space Shuttle used a barrel roll to protect itself against probable attack from Russian Cosmospheres. By rotating like a corkscrew, the Shuttle made it impossible for a Cosmosphere to approach safely from any direction. The barrel roll maneuver was a very risky one, however, for the Shuttle. The Shuttle and tank were not designed with "aerobatics" in mind but calculations showed that it should survive a slow roll, and somehow it did.

One of the biggest questions about the barrel roll stunt was what it would do to the astronauts Lousma and Fullerton. They were required to withstand these dizzying gyrations for about six minutes. At the same time, the Shuttle was still accelerating with up to three times the force of gravity; and because of the peculiar design of the Shuttle and fuel tank, the gyrations were sickening indeed.

Military space doctors knew that at best Lousma and Fullerton would be very sick for some time after reaching this low orbit. Their wild, bruising, spinning ride would end abruptly in weightlessness. That is a combination guaranteed to derange the equilibrium of even the toughest astronaut. Nothing remotely like it has ever been done. Doctors were rightly worried that even if the two survived the mission and returned to Earth, there could be permanent damage to their equilibrium.

When orbit was reached, they did indeed become violently ill. That is why you heard those reports about nausea striking both men. NASA wanted to pave the way for a plausible public explanation if they should not appear well when they returned to Earth. At the same time, the Shuttle planners knew perfectly well why they were sick. That is why NASA spokesmen acted so unconcerned when discussing the space sickness with reporters. When they called it "motion sickness," they were making a gross understatement.

Lousma and Fullerton were to begin work immediately upon reaching proper orbit - sick or not. Their extensively modified crew compartment was to be depressurized already - automatically - with the two men depending upon their space suits. This plan had to be modified slightly when the barrel roll was added to the flight plan.

HARD ON THE CREW

When the Shuttle reached orbit the astronauts were in space suits, but the cabin was still pressurized. They were allowed several minutes to get from the flight deck to the Gemini-type escape capsule stored below. Once inside the escape capsule they then depressurized the cabin; then the Nose Laser System deployed automatically to protect the Shuttle against any attacks by Russian space weapons. This allowed Lousma and Fullerton to recover from space sickness while inside the capsule.

For the ensuing two days or so, getting well was their main task. It was a period of total vulnerability, of depending on the untried Automatic Laser System for protection. The Shuttle planners wanted to have the excuse ready later should the Shuttle be attacked and destroyed. So the day after the launch you were shown TV pictures of missing tiles on the nose of the Shuttle. According to those pictures at least a dozen tiles in the black area were lost.

If that had really happened, it would have been cause for extreme alarm. Later a NASA spokesman downplayed it, saying the tiles were noncritical. But there is no such thing as a noncritical black tile. The black tiles supposedly lost are to withstand temperatures above 1500 degrees Fahrenheit. Under th tile there is nothing but a piece of felt called a "strain isolation pad" which would not last five seconds in those temperatures, and under the felt is the metal skin of the Shuttle. It is made of aluminum, which loses its strength above 350 degrees. If exposes to 1500 degree heat by a few missing tiles, the Shuttle could not possibly avoid very severe, crippling damage or destruction by rupturing.

PRE-RECORDED HOAX

The nice NASA space movies we saw on TV were a pre-recorded hoax to provide an excuse if something went wrong, but it didn't. The astronauts recovered, went to work, and deployed the new military satellite. Meanwhile, NASA spokesmen waved aside the alleged tile problem as minor. It had served its purpose and was no longer needed.

Throughout the remainder of the week we heard about one problem after another. Supposedly the cargo bay doors would not close and I guess not, since they were blown completely away, the toilet would not work, three out of four communications channels went out, one of the three crucial data display screens in the cockpit failed, etc. None of these stories was true; all were devised to provide blather material and cover story for possible problems with the secret military mission. But in the end none of them was needed and so NASA spokesmen just waved them aside as unimportant.

The secret military mission was a success, so the pretended mission which was cooked up for TV was declared an overwhelming success, also.

PART 13:

Late Friday night, March 26th (1982), Lousma and Fullerton finished deploying the new Superspy Satellite. It had taken longer than planned, but it was done. The Shuttle was left in orbit. The astronauts re-entered their Gemini-type escape capsule, fired its retrorockets, and dropped out of orbit to an Indian Ocean splashdown. From there they were flown nonstop to the White Sands Missile Range, New Mexico.

The Shuttle directors took advantage of a sandstorm at White Sands to delay the public landing for an extra day while the astronauts recuperated. Then the next morning they boarded one of the two remaining secret Shuttles at White Sands. The Shuttle took off from the north end of the immense White Sands Range, using small solid rockets. Just moments before 11:00 A.M. it made its appearance on TV. They swooped in from the north, dropped down over the mountains, and touched down in a cloud of white dust. Finally, after a respectable wait, out stepped Lousma and Fullerton all rested and refreshed.

On Memorial Day, May 30, 1982, Richard Halloran leaked the existence of Project Z in an article in the New York Times. The article said: "PENTAGON DRAWS UP FIRST STRATEGY FOR FIGHTING A LONG NUCLEAR WAR. Defense Department policy makers in a new five-year defense plan have accepted the premise that nuclear conflict with the Soviet Union could be protracted, and have drawn up their first strategy for fighting such a war."

It did not say, however, that the plans were to launch the war in three months. The article went on to mention that the plan was laid out in an unpublished document of 125 pages. It was drafted for approval by a man who served Satan directly, Secretary of Defense, Caspar Weinberger.

Caspar Weinberger is a most interesting guy, but his story is so mind-boggling that I will have to save it for some other time. The U.S. Pentagon was controlled by the Bolsheviks who formerly controlled Russia. Weinberger was the highest visible agent of the Bolsheviks in the U.S. government at that time.

BITTER RIVALS: WHY ROCKEFELLERS HAD TO BE TAKEN OUT

The nuclear war plan of the Bolsheviks was moving most quickly, but the U.S. Government was a house divided. The Bolsheviks were opposed by their bitter rivals, the Rockefeller cartel. Their top visible operative in the federal government at the time was Secretary of State Alexander Haig. The often visible feuding between Haig and Weinberger was only a pale shadow of that deadly power struggle behind the scenes. Unlike the Bolsheviks, the Rockefeller factions did not want nuclear war. In a word, they couldn't "afford" it. They would lose everything, and so the Rockefeller faction was working feverishly to head off the Bolshevik nuclear war plan.

The new anti-Bolshevik rulers of Russia were also against nuclear war. The anti-Bolshevik, anti-nuclear war attitudes of the Rockefeller cartel and the Kremlin led to a limited coalition between them. The most spectacular result from this Rockefeller-Russian coalition was the Falklands War raging between Argentina and Britain.

The Falklands was the visible aftermath to cover warfare which took place during April, 1982. The Rockefeller cartel and the Russians joined forces to destroy certain military installations and weapons reserves. These were key ingredients in the final phase of the Project Z war plan.

The whole operation began at South Georgia Island on April 3. With the help of Argentina a joint Rockefeller-Russian commando team was able to knock out the giant hidden naval base there. The base, built during the 1960s, was originally controlled through the U.S. Government by the Rockefeller cartel but the Bolsheviks acquired control of the bases in the late 1970s when they also seized control of the American Pentagon.

The major base was contained within a giant man-made cavern hollowed out inside a mountain near the water. With the camouflaged ship entrances sealed, the base was bombproof, but the joint Rockefeller-Russian commando team succeeded in attacking the base by drilling a shaft through the mountain. Then a compact Russian neutron bomb was inserted through the shaft and detonated inside the cavernous naval base. The process took several weeks. The Thatcher government which - like the U.S. government - was Bolshevik controlled, dispatched the Royal Navy.

First, it was supposed to dislodge the heavily-armed Rockefeller-Russian military force before it could destroy the naval base, then it was to move on to the Falklands for the publicly-admitted fighting. The Royal Navy arrived several days too late to save the secret base on South Georgia Island. But by that time the panicking Thatcher government had already committed some two-thirds of the Royal Navy to the South Atlantic. On top of that, at least one British ship had already been sunk by Russia in connection with the secret South Georgia operation. That left the Thatcher government with no choice but to engage Argentina in battle, otherwise it would have been impossible to explain away Britain's huge deployment to the South Atlantic, much less the heavy losses which had been sustained.

On April 30 the British blockade of the Falklands was just beginning. Later that day President Reagan announced that the U.S. was actively siding with Britain. The announcement was a victory for the Pentagon war faction. Right away warfare around the Falklands started heating up quickly.

On May 1, the British launched bombing raids against the airport at Port Stanley, and on May 2 a British submarine torpedoed Argentina's second largest ship, the cruiser General Belgrano. It sank within 24 hours, leaving a death toll of more than 300 Argentine sailors. The sinking of the Belgrano was expected to demoralize the Argentines, but instead it enraged them. The Belgrano had been sunk at a time when it was not threatening the British forces. The Argentines decided it was time to start playing their ace-in-the-hole against the British.

Argentina had been given certain promises in return for making the secret South Georgia operation possible. One of these was the promise of covert military assistance by Russia against Britain. Specifically, it was pledged that the Russians would intervene in parallel with Argentine air and naval operations in ways designed to even the odds. In this way Argentina's military leaders could take full credit for both their own and covert Russian attacks on the British. At the same time, the procedure was designed to keep Russia's role in the fighting quite obscure.

I simply do not have time to go into what the real truth was about the Falklands War, just suffice to say that what you were told was worlds away from the truth.

On August 24, 1982, another Cosmosphere was blasted out of the sky over the New York City vicinity, to be sure the New Jersey shot event could be duplicated. It created a high-speed fireball, described in the New York Times as a possible asteroid burning up.

When the American Phantom war planes would be launched into Russia on Z-Day, they would be swarming toward only six primary and about a dozen secondary targets. The six primary targets were the Russian Space bases, four Cosmodromes at Baikonur, Tyuratam, Plesetsk, and Kaspusin Yar, and two Cosmosphere facilities at Semipalatinsk and Novosibirsk.

As for the dozen or so secondary targets, those were the complex of Russian flying ABM bases. The system consisted of anti-missile particle beam weapons carried aboard converted TU-144 Supersonic Transports. The Transports were mysteriously removed from service in June 1978 for conversion to anti-missile defense but by September 1982 the system was fully operational. The intent was to knock them all out, if possible, to make the American follow-up attack more devastating.

Some other "stuff" came down about then, also. It was determined that if the strike against those bases failed, the war plan was doomed. There was only one satisfactory geographic location from which to launch a strike against the Russian Cosmosphere areas and that location was Sinkiang Province, China. The Bolsheviks must have access to Sinkiang Province at all costs it was decided - so - the Carter Administration unexpectedly dumped Taiwan on December 15, 1978, and suddenly announced full diplomatic relations with Peking.

END OF THE WORLD PLANNED FOR

THE "END OF THE WORLD" WAS SET FOR 3:00 P.M. E.D.T., FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1982. This was the second date set to launch Nuclear War One (the first in late January of 1980 had been postponed). This date, by the way, WAS THE "FEAST OF TRUMPETS."

At EXACTLY 3:01 P.M. E.D.T. all of Russia would be in darkness. When the Indian Ocean Satellite signal would arrive confirming the attack, it would be followed within a minute or so by the EMP episode described above.

If you were watching TV or listening to the radio, there would suddenly be horrendous static and possibly permanent damage to the receivers. There would have been a total power blackout and the telephones would have gone dead. Russian short-range underwater launched missiles were planted along OUR shores and in the Great Lakes in 1976 and 1977 (and are still there). We would have had from 24 to 10 minutes to live depending on how far from the launchers we would be.

In addition, Russia had Moon bases and Cosmospheres overhead, both armed with their charged particle beam weapons.

So what happened? The Superspy Satellite launched in March 1982 by the third Shuttle had detected something most puzzling in Russia. The puzzle consisted of large numbers of small domed installations arranged in rings around strategic Russian targets. There was a ring of those domes around each Cosmodrome and around each Comosphere Base in particular. They were obviously defensive weapons of some sort.

There were heated discussions about what they might be. Actually, they were Rail Guns. I shall not spend more time on them, if you want to know more, do your own research. The information is available to the public. For now, I will just say the Rail Guns cannot be deflected by electronic defenses.

Because of the arguments over the uncertainty of success, the attack was called off five hours before launch time. It was rescheduled. IT WAS RESCHEDULED FOR FEAST OF TRUMPETS, ROSH HASHANAH, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1990.

This last one was also rescheduled and that date also passed. The time was again reset for a later date for the launch of Nuclear War One.

Guess for when the new date was set?

Please review the first paragraph of this paper. I will copy it for you here:

"As I begin writing this report, the news is telling about a strange USAIR airplane crash in Pennsylvania. Next day a plane crashed in Moscow. CNN told about a fireball that was reported from Bakersfield, California, to Medford, Oregon. They said it occurred about 6 or 6:15 in the morning on SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10 (1994) and was so bright that the light shining through windows woke up some people. They showed a house in San Rafael with a hole in the roof from a piece of something falling from the sky. An Ariane rocket was launched from French Guyana and was LOST, a day before.

Several earthquakes have occurred in California, including one that CNN showed on a map, southwest of Lake Tahoe. About 15 minutes later, CNN began telling about the Space Shuttle firing lasers at Earth and showed a view of Earth, with Lake Tahoe in the upper right corner of the screen.

If you put the two together, then you can see that the Columbia Space Shuttle is firing laser beams at Earth 'for environmental purposes,' precisely where the earthquakes are occurring. The President went to Camp David, then when the President returned (?), a plane crashed into the White House. Later he gave a speech in a room of the White House, then just after he left a fire broke out in the room. Rosh Hashanah is recently passed, and Yom Kippur is coming up. The President has ordered 8,300 Navy, 1,800 Marine and 4,000 Army personnel along with 15 or 20 warships to [prepare to] invade Haiti."

Now, as I finish this article, as I am typing this the TV is telling that Carter and Colin Powell have arranged for the invasion of Haiti to be called off.

The payload launched from Guyana was a relay mirror satellite for the weapon carried on Columbia. It was to be fired into earthquake lines in Southern California to trigger bombs that have been placed there, to set off earthquakes. The resulting destruction would allow the government to bring in FEMA and declare martial law.

There are presently thousands of Russian troops across the border in Mexico and Baja California. The headline of the August 1994 Criminal Politics newsletter says, "International Zionism Planning War in Mexico, 300 Tons of Soviet Hardware Landed in Veracruz." Recent articles in SPOTLIGHT newspaper and several other newspapers across the country, including the San Francisco Chronicle, have reported on thousands of Russian troops and military equipment presently seen inside the U.S. Clinton called two aircraft carriers into the Caribbean and called up the Reserves (usually, you call up the reserves when you are losing the battle!). The relay satellite for the Shuttle was shot out of the sky by a "FLYING SAUCER."

The USAIR flight that was shot down, probably by a Russian beam weapon (the pilot said "traffic," and the cockpit recorder recorded what is described as a "WHOOMP, WHOOMP" sound) WAS CARRYING PAUL OLSON, WHO HAD JUST TESTIFIED CONCERNING AN UPCOMING DRUG TRIAL.

CNN is talking about the Shuttle in orbit firing lasers at Earth. The President just happened to be sleeping across the street when an airplane crashed into the White House, and later he gave a speech in a room in the White House and walked out and a fire broke out where he had just been.

September 6 was Rosh Hashanah and September 15 was YOM KIPPUR. Today as I finish this article it is September 18. I had to work, today, at a trade show. One of my customers was a Russian. I have a man (whose boss is Secretary of State Warren Christopher) speaking on audio cassette tape saying he PLANTED A NUCLEAR BOMB UNDER THE UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS IN AUSTIN.

Friends, there is much more that I could say, but I am tired. It is time you started doing YOUR OWN HOMEWORK. That is, if you care. DO YOU?

MAY YOU LIVE TO HAVE ANOTHER DAY!

END OF PART 13.

PART 14:

THE REST OF THE STORY

God did not say, "Righteousness will make you free." He did not say, "Obedience shall make you free." Obedience to a preacher, pope, pastor or guru WILL NOT DO IT. Neither will counting beads, ringing gongs, sitting cross-legged or chanting mantras. HE SAID THAT "THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE." (John 8:32)

We have lost a great deal of our freedoms, (and what is so appalling, most people are not even aware of it!) and are fast losing the rest. This must mean there is not much truth known and being taught! It is time we search for real truth!

I have been asked for the rest of the story about what happened with the American Space Shuttle Program, so I will try to add more information as I have a chance. Now to continue the story.

In my previous writing, I said that the "End of the World" was set for 3:00 PM E.D.T., Rosh Hashanah (Feast of Trumpets), Friday, September 17, 1982.

At exactly 3:01 PM E.D.T. all of Russia would be in darkness. When the Indian Ocean Satellite signal would arrive confirming the American Phantom aircraft attack, it would be followed within a minute or so by the EMP episode described previously. This would signal all U.S. military forces to launch a full scale "retaliatory" nuclear attack against Russia.

Obviously this did not happen, and I did not go into detail at the time about what really happened.

A syndicated article published by NEWSDAY said that on June 10, 1982: "President Reagan stunned allies at the NATO summit by telling them that as far as he is concerned the Soviet Union is at war with the United States, European officials said last week. The statement, which came as the President was summing up his views on the two-day meeting in Bonn, so surprised the other heads of state that they remained silent, and NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns immediately adjourned the session, according to these officials who were present at the summit a month ago."

For several years prior the war had raged between the U.S. and the Soviet Union. There was just no public admission of the fact that the war was already under way between the superpowers.

On July 13, Pravda published a speech by Soviet Defense Minister Marshal Ustinov which said that the U.S. was orchestrating a trade, credit and technological war against the Soviet Union. He also gave a blunt warning to Washington that a: "...pre-emptive first-strike use of nuclear weapons could not insure an American victory."

This indicated that Russia's new leaders knew about the Reagan Administration plan to launch nuclear war soon and they were prepared to defeat the Bolshevik-triggered American first strike if it was carried out. The Satanic Bolshevik-Zionist (Reagan/Begin) axis did not listen. They plunged right ahead with plans for all-out nuclear war.

They had a 5-part plan.

Part 1 was to stir up as much internal turmoil in Russia and her satellites as possible. This included sabotaging an Aeroflot jet which crashed in Moscow on July 6 (are any of you watching what is currently going on over there?)

Part 2 called for conditioning the American people for war (anything like that going on now?).

Part 3 of the plan involved the Space Shuttle Program. Columbia STS-1 was launched April 12, 1981, on the 20th anniversary of the first orbital space flight of Russian Yuri Gagarin (and about two weeks after the "attempted assassination" of President Reagan). It was shot down by two Russian Cosmospheres. Astronauts John Young and Robert Crippen were burned up when it crashed 85 miles south of Kazan in central Russia. A fake landing was staged at Edwards Air Force Base using the Shuttle Enterprise and actors.

Columbia STS-2 was launched November 12, 1981. It supposedly carried Astronauts Joseph Engle and Richard Truly. In fact there were no human pilots aboard. It was shot down by Russian TU-144 jet airplanes using beam weapons, over the White Sea (near Finland on your map).

Columbia STS-3 was launched March 22, 1982. It was supposed to orbit a special new Spy Satellite. It was hardened against attack from Russia's space weapons and armed with a robot-controlled laser that could shoot back. In addition, the Shuttle itself was armed with lasers on this third try. It landed one day behind schedule on March 30, 1982 at White Sands. That is, something landed. Astronauts Lousma and Fullerton successfully deployed a new laser-armed spy satellite then abandoned ship and entered an escape capsule and returned to Earth splashdown in the Indian Ocean. From there they were flown to White Sands Missile Range, where they later faked another Shuttle landing.

The "End of the World" was set for 3:00 PM E.D.T., Friday, Rosh Hashanah, Feast of Trumpets, September 17, 1982. However, what the Superspy Satellite found scared them into waiting, and the new launch date for Nuclear War One was eventually rescheduled for Feast of Trumpets, Thursday, September 20, 1990. This is where I left off in the previous article.

STS-4 was launched June 24, 1982, with Astronauts Thomas Mattingly and Henry Hartsfield (STS is Space Transportation System). Its purpose was to deploy a satellite that would be used to confirm the Phantom aircraft attack which was then the go-ahead for launching the nuclear missiles upon Russian targets. The Attack Confirmation Sensor was placed in geostationary orbit over the Indian Ocean by an auxiliary rocket. It was a cryogenic satellite - that is, it was maintained at super-cold temperatures close to absolute zero. This cold state was intended to protect the satellite from detection by Russian space weapons which would be partially based on "heat" (infrared) sensors.

For several years prior to 1982 the American scientific Intelligence analysts knew that the Russians had a new technology for target acquisition. The Russian technique was not radar, nor was it any other conventional means of detecting and tracking targets. The technique was deadly accurate, reliable, and, unlike radar, impossible to jam. Analysts were convinced they had figured out what the Russian technique was. They believed it was a Russian version of computer-enhanced infra-red detection. This was then developed in the U.S. and was called CEIR (see-er).

Shortly after development, a CEIR-equipped American laser was used to shoot down a Russian Cosmosphere. All objects warmer than absolute zero emit infra-red radiation. The warmer the object is, the more infra-red for sensors to detect it. The only way to hide from CEIR is, therefore, to reduce the temperature as low as possible. That is why the Air Force Attack Confirmation Sensor was a cryogenic satellite.

When our government tells us that the Shuttle payloads are carrying equipment to peer through clouds and electronic shields around planets and so on, don't you believe it. They are trying to develop a weapon they feel will give them the advantage when they launch all-out nuclear war, which they have tried to do several times. What do you think is really going on now with Korea, Haiti, Bosnia, Iraq, etc.?

Back to Shuttle mission #4. A liquid helium cooling system was originally used to keep the satellite only a few degrees above absolute zero, reducing infra-red emissions to nearly nothing.

The cryogenic design of the Air Force satellite was what gave the Bolshevik war planners so much confidence that it would succeed. They were sure that the Russians would be unable to find it in time to destroy it before it was used in war.

WRONG! The Pentagon Bolsheviks were wrong about the new Russian target-tracking technique. It was not an infra-red technique at all; instead, it was a revolutionary system which detects the atomic vibrations of matter. The Russians call it Psychoenergetic Range Finding, or PRF. The Russians regarded it as their master secret weapon. The longer it remained a mystery to the American Bolsheviks, the better it would be for Russia and so, when Space Shuttle #4 launched the Attack Confirmation Sensor in June, the Russians began the game playing.

GAME PLAYING

Instead of destroying the satellite right away, they allowed it to be orbited successfully. The Russians knew that the Attack Confirmation Satellite could do them no harm until war itself was about to begin, so they allowed it to stay there untouched for as long as possible. The result was exactly as expected: The long term survival of the Air Force Sensor convinced the Bolsheviks that they were right about Russia using CEIR. The Pentagon had walked right into a major intelligence blunder and the Russians were encouraging them to keep it up.

Throughout the summer Rockefeller cartel operatives within the CIA fed updates about the Pentagon war plan to the Russians. Those reports continued to say that the war timetable was remaining unchanged, targeted for mid-September, so the Russian Space Command let the Air Force Sensor alone for the interim time.

Meanwhile, the Russians began preparing in a totally unsuspected way for the moment when they would destroy the satellite. Those preparations had to do with Russia's international telephone service.

MEN IN OUR COUNTRY WERE PLANNING AN ALL-OUT FIRST-STRIKE HYDROGEN BOMB WAR WITH RUSSIA! Our government, friends. THEY HAD A BACKUP PLAN. If something happened to the Attack Confirmation Sensor, they could still tell whether or not the Phantom planes took out the Russian space bases, because the attack would shut down the Soviet telephone system!

Or so they thought.

In order to keep our Intelligence analysts from guessing what was afoot, the Russians resorted to a little disinformation in the right places. They created falsified leaks that there were unsettled conditions in the Kremlin, a power struggle (just like what is said to be going on over there right now). The Bolsheviks in the U.S., who are always struggling for power, swallowed the bait completely. First, in June of 1982 the Soviet Union drastically reduced the number of telephone links to the West. They also made clouded threats to reduce service still further at a later date.

The next major step was to suddenly cut off all automatic dialing service to and from the West. The U.S. Bolsheviks were startled but still did not suspect what it really meant. They were too preoccupied with rumblings of trouble in China to worry for long about Russia's telephones.

On April 21 the Rockefeller faction scored a major gain, while all eyes were on the Falklands crisis. The Bolshevik Admiral Bobby Inman was forced out as Deputy Director of the CIA and replaced by the Rockefeller man John McMahon. On June 24 the Shuttle was launched, and the next day a coup occurred when Rockefeller operative Alexander Haig was forced TO RESIGN and Bolshevik/Zionist (BZ) GEORGE SHULTZ took over as Secretary of State.

The World War III (Nuclear War I) date was set for September 17 (Feast of Trumpets), but on September 1 Communist Party Chairman Hu Yaobang dropped a bombshell at the Party Congress in Peking. He declared that China should no longer ally itself with the U.S. against Russia; instead Hu said China should regard both superpowers as equal threats but at the same time he included some conciliatory language toward Russia and said high Russian officials would come to China to begin talks around mid-month at China's invitation!

By disowning the Sino-American alliance, Hu Yaobang made it clear that the secret American Stealth attack-base IN CHINA WAS IN SERIOUS JEOPARDY.

That base, located in Red China's western Sinkiang Province, was essential for the intended attack on Russia's two Cosmosphere bases in Siberia. That war base was the reason for the joint communique of August 17 by the U.S. and Red China concerning Taiwan.

The communique committed the U.S. to discontinue arms delivery to Taiwan at some future date in violation of Reagan's past pledges. The communique was agreed to in order to head off a threatened shutdown of the Stealth base by the Chinese, but it was not enough to satisfy the Chinese.

On September 6 former President Richard Nixon arrived in Peking, adding further to the troubles of the Pentagon war-planners (think about what has happened recently with Clinton-Carter, Korea-Haiti and such. THINK!) Nixon had long been cooperating with the Rockefeller cartel.

Nixon went to Peking as a Rockefeller envoy and one with far more credibility for the Chinese than anyone the Bolsheviks had. Nixon shocked the Chinese by confirming what Russian sources had already told them - that the Stealth base was about to be used in war.

Nixon then counseled them not to shut down the base outright at that time for fear of undesirable reactions by the trigger-happy Pentagon Bolsheviks. Instead, he urged the Chinese to start interfering with operations of the Stealth base by bureaucratic devices. That is one thing the Chinese are very, very good at, and they accepted Nixon's advice.

By September 9 the American Stealth base in Sinkiang Province was effectively put out of action. Critical base personnel were tangled up in Chinese "red" tape, preventing them from reporting for duty. The Chinese were giving hints to Washington that all this was due to continued dissatisfaction over Taiwan but the real reason was that they wanted no part of a nuclear war with Russia and Russia would have taken that base right off the map.

The Kremlin received word through Rockefeller channels on September 9 that the Sinkiang Province Stealth base had been effectively neutralized. At that point the Russians could rest assured that even if the Pentagon went through with its nuclear attack plan, Russia's Cosmospheres would survive quite nicely. Russia's critical space triad of strategic weapons COULD NOT BE DESTROYED.

The next Friday, September 10, there was a sudden total shutdown of most International Telephone service to and from Russia but, in order to send a message to America's Bolshevik war planners, a few selected circuits were kept open. Those included Leningrad, Kiev, Minsk, and Tallinn. Their significance lay in the fact that none were targets planned for the initial Stealth attack.

The phone lines were cut off at 7:10 AM E.D.T., or 2:10 PM Moscow time. Moments later the Russian Space Command went to work.

A Russian Jumbo Cosmosphere was parked in a pseudo-orbit about two miles above the Air Force Attack

Confirmation satellite. It had been there for well over two months - from the moment the satellite was launched into orbit from Space Shuttle #4.

By using its electromagnetic propulsion system at low power the Cosmosphere had remained on station instead of slowly drifting away as a normal satellite would and, parked as it was above the downward looking Air Force satellite, the presence of the Cosmosphere was never detected.

The time had come! The Cosmosphere aimed its beam weapon and fired. Shortly after 7:10 AM E.D.T. on Friday, September 10, there was very bad news for the Bolsheviks. At the newly operational Air Force Space Command in Colorado Springs (which used Control Data Corporation computers) there was a sudden loss of signal from their Indian Ocean satellite.

At first they could not believe that their critical Attack Confirmation Satellite had been attacked. All sorts of things were tried in an effort to reestablish contact with the satellite - all to no avail. The satellite no longer existed!

However, their attitude was, it really didn't matter. America was going to be sucked into a totally annihilating war at any rate. We are speaking about reactions and actions regarding the planned war - not what was or was not actually possible.

As that Friday morning of September 10 wore on, the "Project Z" war planners were convened in crisis conference. The question was: What do we do now?

Someone suggested falling back to the back-up plan based on the telephones. "We can still go with the back-up plan - every target in Russia that is attacked by our birds will be obliterated. If international telephone service to Russian target areas is suddenly cut off at zero hour, we can assume that our birds made it."

There is always someone who didn't get the word. Nearly everyone yelled at him, "The Russian phones are already shut down!!"

For a while there was an atmosphere of near panic. Some were sure that a first strike by Russia was sure to follow and that the Pentagon should push the Nuclear Button without delay.

Others argues that if that were the Kremlin's intention, it was already too late - Russia's missiles would be on the way already. Someone suggested that the whole Project Z war plan be aborted and rescheduled for later on.

Everyone agreed on one thing: without the Attack Confirmation Sensor, any attack on Russia had become far more risky. After launching the Stealth planes from Norway and Turkey, it would just have to be assumed that they had destroyed their targets. But, you see, THEY WOULD NOT HAVE! With the Attack Confirmation Satellite gone there would be no way to confirm that, so the all-out follow-up attack by America's nuclear forces might run into a lot more than just the trouble which might have been expected. Not much has changed, friends, we are still ruled by snakes!

The Russians kept the International phone lines shut down for seven hours that day. They wanted to make sure that if the Pentagon Bolsheviks pushed the Panic Button, they would obtain absolutely no intelligence at all by monitoring telephone circuits. After the first two hours of the morning blackout, Secretary of State George Shultz was asked by reporters about it. Shultz told them, "It is very significant," but would say no more.

The idiots still planned to go through with it, and the go-ahead was set for Rosh Hashanah. Project Z would continue on schedule. Meanwhile, every effort would be made to cut through the Chinese red tape that was restricting use of the critical base in Sinkiang Province. At the same time, it was decided to set other plans in motion, too, just in case Project Z should finally fall through.

The countdown continued until Z-Day, Friday morning on September 17. At about 8:30 AM in Washington, a well-known national newspaper reporter was interviewed on the Washington NBC radio station, WRC. The reporter of the Washington Post called attention to the war warning he had learned about as set forth herein.

He outlined the plan briefly for everyone listening in the Washington metropolitan area, and he added that, "if the Pentagon did have such a plan, public exposure through information brought forth had probably reduced the chances that it would be carried out!"

SATAN CANNOT FUNCTION IN LIGHT!

The countdown was called off with less than five hours to go. It has been rescheduled and aborted at least four times since then, including, as well as I can figure it out, the last time was Rosh Hashanah (Feast of Trumpets) this past month (September 1994).

When ancient Israel was warned about Nebuchadnezzar, they said, "We are God's people, God will protect us." The survivors were marched naked into captivity in Babylon. In 70 AD the Jews in Jerusalem said, "We are God's people, God will save us." They all died.

I continually hear good people today saying, "I can not do anything about it; I leave it up to God; it is HIS will." BUT GOD SAYS, I GIVE YOU FREE WILL, NOT PROPHECIES. PROPHECIES SHALL FAIL, UNLESS YOU CHOOSE THEM (I Cor. 13:8). If you sit and do nothing, while your enemy works to destroy you, then you will be destroyed. Free Will is God's Will. So be it.

Have a nice day.

PART 15:

FORWARD by the Author

Many who read "Fire >From The Sky" (Parts 1-14) were shocked at the story. Some have said "I don't believe it" or "It can't be!"

It is true, whether you believe it or not. For those of you who want to better understand, I will try to share with you some of the things I have learned. I will reveal here some more things that "our" government wants to keep TOP SECRET.

The FIRE FROM THE SKY material told of anti-gravity Cosmospheres, invisible ships, and other "far out" stuff such as "Psychoenergetic Range Finding." "Psycho" is right, you may think.

Before you make judgments about something about which you know nothing, why not try to learn more about it?

This material is for those of you who wish to research and learn more about the subject.

THE MARVEL OF EMPTY SPACE

Many top scientists are recently talking about "Universes" coming into existence out of "nothing" and such. How can this be, isn't this thinking a form of insanity?

Those of you who completed your brainwashing classes (I believe you called them college and university courses) a few years ago, may not be aware that the top scientists are now discussing about things coming into existence out of nothing, etc.

Science News, Feb. 18, 1995, in an article called "Making universes, constants out of nothing" (p. 102) says, "Quantum cosmology posits that incredibly tiny universes spontaneously nucleat out of nothing." Weren't we taught that "spontaneous generation" is along the line of "old-wives' tales?"

If you stop and think, you will realize that the material universe had to come into existence out of "nothing," or else it had to have existed forever with no beginning. If you check current literature, you will find much discussion among top physicists, mathematicians, etc., about these questions.

For an example, read "Nothing's plenty: The vacuum in modern quantum field theory" by I.J.R. Aitchison, Contemporary Physics, 26(4), 1985, pp. 887-894.

Or see Yu. G. Itnat'ev, "Relativistic kinetics of an anisotropic plasmalike medium with damping in the field of gravitational radiation," Soviet Physics Journal, 27(12), Dec. 1984, (English translation: Plenum, June 1985), pp. 1066-1069. The article is about producing energy from a vacuum.

Michio Kaku, author of Hyperspace, A Scientific Odyssey Through Parallel Universes, Time Warps, and the 10th Dimension, speaks of empty space "bubbling" and the universe coming into existence from these "bubbles."

Fritjof Capra, in The Tao of Physics, (Bantam Paperbacks, p. 208), says:

The distinction between matter and empty space finally had to be abandoned when it became evident that virtual particles can come into being spontaneously out of the void, and vanish again into the void, without any nucleon or other strongly interacting particle being present... the vacuum is far from empty. On the contrary, it contains an unlimited number of particles which come into being and vanish without end.

Here, then, is the closest parallel to the Void of Eastern mysticism in modern physics. Like the Eastern Void, the "physical vacuum" - as it is called in field theory - is not a state of mere nothingness, but contains the potentiality for all forms of the particle world. These forms, in turn, are not independent physical entities, but merely transient manifestations of the underlying Void. As the sutra says, "Form is emptiness, and emptiness is indeed form."

The relation between the virtual particles and the vacuum is an essentially dynamic relation; the vacuum is truly a "living Void," pulsating in endless rhythms of creation and destruction. The discovery of the dynamic quality of the vacuum is seen by many physicists as one of the most important findings of modern physics. From the role as an empty container of the physical phenomena, the void has emerged as a dynamic quantity of utmost importance. The results of modern physics thus seem to confirm the words of the Chinese sage Chang Tsai: "When one knows that the Great Void is full of Ch'i, one realizes that there is no such thing as nothingness."

This science of applying the physics of creating "something" out of "nothing" is variously called "energetics," "Psychoenergetics," "scalar electromagnetics," "orgone energy," "radionics," etc.

Air & Space magazine, June/July 1995, in the article by Frank Kuznik (p. 70) about making a vacuum, starts:

Can something ever come of nothing? Alex Ignatiev fervently hopes so. Ignatiev, a University of Houston physics and chemistry professor, is scribbling equations for that very process on a board in his cluttered campus office.

Fer-De-Lance, by Col. T.E. Bearden, p. 106, #60, says:

Interactions which occurred between Krushchev and renowned physicist and Nobelian P. Kapitsa are of interest. Krushchev desired absolute defense of the Soviet Union so that the Soviets might be able to launch any action desired without risk of serious concern. Kapitsa informed the Soviet leader that, if a means of total neutralization of foreign missiles was to be found, it could only come from a group of new principles in physics which was called

"Energetics." The term "energetics," of course, was contracted from "psychoenergetics," and is essentially the expanded physics/electromagnetics that this author (Bearden) has dubbed, scalar electromagnetics.

Now you know what "psychoenergetics" in the Fire From The Sky document is the same as what T.E. Bearden calls "scalar electromagnetics" and the Russians call "energetics." (The Russian rocket that supplies their Mir [Russian for "World"] Space Station is called "Energia.") Bearden has had a considerable amount of writings published on the subject. For a list of his books, contact the Tesla Book Company, P.O. Box 121873, Chula Vista, CA 91912. To further track this information, take note of the following:

So about 1950 or so, the Soviet Union would have started phenomenology experimentation in earnest, with phase conjugate radar mirrors and phase conjugate radars. This is what was referred to as energetics. The Soviets began a massive program in energetics about the time of the beginning of the Korean War (p. 86, Aids, Biological Warfare by T.E. Bearden).

Building upon Whittaker's important work, I formulated a conceptual revision to electromagnetics, which I dubbed scalar electromagnetics to accent that the observable EM vector force fields did not exist as such in a vacuum, but dynamic scalar fields did ["vacuum" is not empty]. I also wished to call strong attention to the fact that observable force does not exist until an observable particle of mass is coupled to the interference of the two scalar fields (much like in the Aharonov-Bohm effect). The Soviets, of course, call this area energetics. Energetics technology has been used in gigantic weapons programs of the Soviet Union for decades, and it appears to be developed under the most highly classified program that the Soviets possess. All development and deployment of energetics weapons is under the KGB and controlled directly by that organization, not by the Soviet Armed Forces (p. 88, Aids, Biological Warfare).

P. 89 says scalar electromagnetics "allowed the direct engineering of the unified field theory, including structuring the vacuum, curving local spacetime, and producing effects at a distance [like shooting down aircraft] and in higher dimensions."

Please take special note of the above key identification terms "phase conjugate mirrors," as this helps us to identify this subject in other literature! At this point you do not need to understand what it is talking about, just remember the term.

ZERO IS NOT NOTHING

We think of vacuum as zero, nothing, empty, nada, nichts, zilch. If we have 7 rocks and we take away 7 rocks, then we have no rocks, zero rocks.

Later we learn that this is not always so. If we have 7 pieces of matter and 7 pieces of anti-matter, when combined we have zero, although we actually have 14 pieces. You may say that they canceled out each other and you now have nothing. Think of what you are saying. Are you saying that 14 things can be combined and cease to exist and become nothing? Then isn't it conversely possible that "nothing" can yield or be divided into 14 "real" "things."

In algebra we add seven plus-ones to seven minus-ones and get a sum total of zero, again in spite of the fact that there are actually 14 numbers.

Bearden states it as: "Although zero is the absence of just a single thing, it can be the presence of multiple things" (p. 98, AIDS).

You already know that "empty space" is not too empty - it contains radio waves, radar waves, gravity, cosmic rays, etc. Even when these are removed, Bearden and others point out that what we think of as "empty space" actually consists of an incredible amount of positive and negative forces that cancel each other out and sum to zero, thus appearing to be "not there." By "curving space" and such, some forces become "out of balance" and the result is light, or gravity, etc. Normally this is expressed as positive gravity, but under the right conditions, the gravitation force is reversed. This is called anti-gravity. And, yes, my friends, the Russians (and now others) have anti-gravity.

Note: For those readers who might already understand Bearden, I am aware that he says that force does not exist in a vacuum. ("But if force CONSISTS OF mass welded to acceleration, it cannot exist in the absence of mass. Hence force does not exist in vacuum... Therefore neither magnetic field nor gravitational field exist in vacuum. The greatest error in physics has been the assignment of a force as a cause, and thus assigning it to the vacuum. The force is an EFFECT, and it never exists in a vacuum, a priori." (Toward A New Electromagnetics Part 4: Vectors And Mechanisms Clarified, slide 14.) The problem is physics and electronics as taught in universities are WRONG and there are problems with definitions, so in this brief introduction, I will say things in a simplified way that may not be correct in a higher understanding, but are necessary steps in beginning to understand. My purpose is not to explain the mechanics of exactly "how it works," I am not qualified to do that. My purpose is to encourage you to break through your brainwashing and WAKE UP to reality and see who is your REAL ENEMY. A knowledge of these things IS a MATTER OF LIFE AND DEATH.

END OF PART 15.

HAARP, THE SYSTEM (HIGH-FREQUENCY ACTIVE AURORAL RESEARCH PROGRAM)

If all this energy is available from empty space, then how come we are still using fossil fuels, you might ask? The answer is simple. The powers that control us are very rich. They got very rich by controlling such things as the energy (mostly oil and nuclear) industry. The last thing in the world they want is for us to have free energy, which is what results from understanding psychoenergetics (scalar electromagnetics, energetics, etc.).

What does all this mean to you? Let's look at one example. There is a major government project being built in Alaska called the "HAARP" Program. "High-Frequency Active Auroral Research Program." One of the patents for this project claims that it can "cause... total disruption of communications over a very large portion of the Earth... disrupting not only land-based communications, but also airborne communications and sea communications (both surface and subsurface)... missile or aircraft destruction, deflection, or confusion... weather modification... by altering solar absorption... ozone, nitrogen, etc., concentrations could be artificially increased..."

I have a friend who returned from Canada recently. He was in contact with Nick Begich, Jr., who is monitoring the HAARP project (contact Nick at P.O. Box 201393, Anchorage, AK 99520). The friend was told that the government did a full wattage power-up test of HAARP on December 14, 1994.

This date is rather interesting when you match it with the following article which appeared in the Austin American-Statesman newspaper on the next day, December 15, 1994.

Western cities in the dark after 8-state mystery blackout. *Power surge might have triggered outages for up to 2 million people, by Richard Cole, AP.

SAN FRANCISCO - An unexplained power surge in the West Coast's main electrical transmission line caused blackouts and other power power disruptions across eight Western states early Wednesday, shutting down a nuclear plant and forcing doctors to operate by flashlight.

As many as two million customers from Arizona to Washington went without power for periods ranging from a few seconds to several hours when a stretch of the giant 500-kilovolt Pacific power grid went dead just after midnight.

The blackout darkened the homes of 1 million California customers and interrupted power to patches of Arizona, Nevada, Utah, Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana.

An initial inspection showed no breaks in the section where the trouble began, a 60-mile line between Tracy and Fresno in California's Central Valley.

"We believe it was a power surge from outside our service area, and a substation tripped to prevent an overloading of our system, just as a circuit breaker would do in your house," said Bill Sessa, Pacific Gas & Electric Co. spokesman.

Now let's look more closely at one of the HAARP patents (excerpted from HAARP file downloaded from the Internet):

ABSTRACT:

This invention relates to generation of an Artificial Ionospheric Mirror (AIM), or a plasma layer in the atmosphere. The AIM is used like the ionosphere to reflect RF energy over great distances. A tiltable AIM is created by a heater antenna controlled in phase and frequency. The heater antenna phase shift scans a beam to paint a plasma layer. Frequency is changed to refocus at continually higher altitudes to tilt the plasma layer.

Here is a quotation from Youth Action News concerning HAARP:

Dr. Bernard J. Eastlund's Aug. 13, 1991 patent (No. 5,038,664) describes the system now being implemented in the U.S. HAARP transmitter:

If the particles which form the plasma along the Earth's field lines continued to move with a constant pitch angle, often designated "alpha," they would soon impact on the Earth's surface. However, in converging force field, the pitch angle does change in such a way as to allow the particle to turn around and avoid impact.

The point at which the particle turns around is called the mirror point. This process is repeated at the other end of the field line. The particle again turns around and this is called the "conjugate point" of the original mirror point. The particle is therefore trapped and bounces between the two magnetic mirrors. The particle can continue oscillating in space in this manner for long periods of time. (Letter with July 1994 copy of Youth Action News, P.O. Box 312, Alexandria, VA 22313.)

I think it is obvious that the HAARP project is the same as the scalar electromagnetics phase conjugate mirrors that Bearden describes in articles he has written detailing Russian weather warfare against the United States and the shoot-down of the Challenger Space Shuttle, the destruction of numerous rockets and missiles, and relative to the ongoing (including recent) shoot-downs of many aircraft (such as the USAIR crash near Pittsburgh). And now, it was revealed soon after the Oklahoma City Federal Building bombing, that there were two bomb blasts, the second of which came from overhead pulse beam blasts. CONFUSION

One of the results that scalar electromagnetics can produce, as listed above, is "confusion." We hear of controllers becoming "confused" in Iraq and shooting down our own helicopters. We hear of a pilot trying to land on a carrier and becoming "confused" and crashing.

Recently in the news we hear of a helicopter pilot in Korea who got "confused" and strayed across the border and was shot down. In today's newspapers, as I write these notes, is an article which states: "Human error alone was to blame for a U.S. Army helicopter straying into North Korea and getting shot down last winter, but no one involved should be punished, the Army said in a report Thursday. It said Hilemon and Hall had become disoriented in unfamiliar terrain." (Austin American Statesman, "Army blames none for North Korea shootdown," p. A3, June 23, 1995.)

This sounds reasonable enough until you stop and think. It is almost impossible for today's highly sophisticated military vehicles to become "lost," unless something pretty major happens, because of geo-positioning satellites and such. Any fisherman can buy a little hand-held device that will tell him where he is. How can pilots flying one of the world's most dangerous borders just "stray" across?

Do you remember the infamous raid into Iran to rescue the hostages during President Carter's administration, April 24-26, 1980? If you recall, the raid failed, because the helicopters got lost and had their equipment fouled because of sandstorms and the pilots got "confused" and crashed into each other. It was a very embarrassing incident for the United States.

These were the most highly-trained people in the world (U.S. Army Special Forces Delta Teams) flying the best equipment in the world, and they got defeated by "dust storms?" Did it never occur to any of the pilots to simply fly above the dust storms? Doesn't that suggest there must be more to the story?

Let's examine this event more closely. Col. Charlie Beckwith was the officer in charge of the Delta Teams and writes of the event in his book Delta Force. (Harcourt Brace Janovich, with Donald Knox, copyright 1983.)

Three troop-carrying MC-130s and three fuel-bearing EC-130s left from Masirah Island off the coast of Oman and flew to a desert spot in Iran. There they were to wait 30 minutes for eight helicopters to arrive. Then the 118 man assault force would load on to the RH-53D helicopters and continue the raid.

For some reason, the helicopters were up to an hour and a half late. When the helicopters started arriving, Beckwith quoted them as saying, "Its been a hell of a trip," and "words to the effect that if we had any sense we would move the helios out into the desert and load everyone on C-130s and go home."

Strange words for the most highly-motivated, gung-ho soldiers in the military, don't you think? "I didn't understand how tough a time he'd really had; and he didn't elaborate on his statement." Two helicopters never arrived at all, and the six that did eventually arrive came from scattered in all directions.

One pilot said, "I don't know who's really running things at my level, but I'll tell you this much, that some very careful consideration ought to be given to calling off this operation. You have no idea what I've been through. The damndest sandstorm I've ever seen hit us. It was tough! I gotta tell you, I'm not sure we're going to make it. I'm really not sure we can make it."

"Here were two very strong officers whom we'd observed and knew, who now were pretty well shattered.

"Things were so confused that the mission was called off. They began to load back onto the C-130s to leave. I turned around and began to walk quietly toward the head of the line. It was nearly 2:40 A.M. Some of the C-130 pilots had started to gun their engines. Dust was blowing all around. Between wind gusts, I saw one of the choppers lift off and bank to the left. It slid slightly backward. Then, BALLLOOEE! It wasn't a bomb, not a CRACK! It was a THUMP!"

Next a "gasoline" explosion. A blue fireball ballooned into the night. Obviously, the chopper I'd just seen lift off - it had been Major Schaefer's - had struck the northernmost EC-130, the one on which Blue Element had just boarded" (pp.

P. 251: "Just two hours into the mission, this helicopter received an indication that one of its main rotor blades was about to malfunction. It landed at once. Another helicopter (Number Eight) landed with it. When it was determined that Number Six could not proceed farther, its crew climbed aboard the other chopper, which then proceeded to Desert One. Helicopter Number Five, the one in which Colonel Pittman was flying, turned back to the carrier four-fifths of the way to Desert One, when after flying through several cyclonic sandstorms, it began experiencing instrument problems."

Dr. Peter Beter recorded the following comments on this incident a month later on June 28, 1980, which were published in Wisconsin Report newspaper on July 31, 1980. (Dr. Beter was an attorney practicing before the U.S. Supreme Court, appointed to U.S. Export-Import Bank by President Kennedy, was involved in intelligence activities, originator of the term "stagflation", responsible for revealing that there is no gold in Fort Knox, and had many intelligence contacts. He had access to very high-level sources of information.) [Quoting:]

The American Commandoes who were sent into Iran tried their best to follow orders and do their duty; but unknown to them, those who had planned the raid did not intend for it to succeed. They were supposed to reach Teheran but discovered too late that they were too small a force to do the job. As soon as the Commandoes ran into big trouble, that was to be used as an excuse for American navy jets to strafe Teheran; and with American passion stirred up, the Iran crisis was to escalate with additional military moves. But for more than a year now, Russian Intelligence has been informed about even the most secret plans in Washington; and so the Russians were ready.

They unraveled the latest Bolshevik war plan in two ways. First the huge armada of cosmospheres were floating overhead on April 25 as the American helicopter force entered Iran. Using their weather modification capabilities, the Cosmospheres intensified dust storms in the area. They also utilized microwave brain-scrambling radiation to cause nausea, disorientation, and fatigue among the helicopter crews. The Russian brain-scrambler is the same technology which I first revealed in Audio Letter No. 20.

The Russians were hoping to cause the mission to be given up as hopeless without casualties, but the American Commando force reached its first check point, regrouped and prepared to continue.

So the Cosmospheres turned up their brain-scrambling transmitters to full power. One helicopter took off but veered off crazily, and sliced into a C-130 Troop Transport airplane. Two others prepared to take off. The Cosmospheres overhead fired low-power bursts from their Particle Beams, rotor blades flew off, and the helicopters went nowhere. At that point it was obvious that it was all over.

The raid was aborted, and all energy shifted to efforts to explain away the disaster to the public. Soon the charred bodies of slain Commandoes were flown home to Dover Air Force Base, Delaware. It was the second time in less than two years for Dover to receive bodies from a secret Commando raid by the United States! The first time they had paid the price for a successful operation was in Guyana [Jonestown]. On April 28... Cyrus Vance resigned as Secretary of State in protest.

In the next paragraph, Beter continues by telling of Russian pulse beams triggering the eruption of Mt. St. Helens on May 18, but that is another story.

THE JONESTOWN MASSACRE HOAX

In studying what the truth is behind many of the events in recent history, you will find some amazing interconnections. Once you realize that the same "elite" groups of conspirators are behind many of our problems, it should not be surprising that there are connections because it is the same people involved.

A better known example that could be given of this is E. Howard Hunt. Most researchers know that Hunt was involved in such seemingly unrelated events as the Bay of Pigs invasion, the Kennedy assassination and Watergate. If you "do your homework," you will find connections between the Jonestown massacre, the Waco massacre, and the Oklahoma City federal building bombing.

To understand the Jim Jones Jonestown tragedy, you need to understand some of the background.

In 1976-79, I worked in the classified section of Control Data Corporation. Control Data had the world's most powerful computers at that time, and they were used by the U.S. in its most secret and most important projects. I was also coordinator for the Mensa Special Interest Group called the "Doomsday Club."

I wrote a newsletter called the Doomsday Club News and Intelligence Report. I learned some things that concerned me about what Russia was doing and quoted an article from the Oct. 2, 1978, Aviation Week and Space Technology magazine in my October newsletter.

I learned, for instance, that Russia had been shooting down our spy satellites. What I did not know at the time was that Dr. Peter David Beter was also concerned because he was getting information superior to some of our intelligence services about what was really going on.

For example, in June 1976, Dr. Beter received information that Russia had planted a nuclear bomb on Mt. Desert Island, Maine, near the Seal Harbor home of Nelson Rockefeller. He reported the information to General George S. Brown, Chairman of the Joints Chiefs of Staff, who had the information checked AND FOUND THE BOMB.

Nelson Rockefeller immediately put his home up for sale, although it had been in the Rockefeller for two generations. Dr. Beter said, "But my report of June 1976 about the Seal Harbor bomb led to far more than the present unsettled real estate conditions there. It proved to high intelligence that the Dr. Beter Audio Letter could be trusted to tell the truth; and from that point onward, I began receiving large amounts of intelligence information that is not entrusted to any other public information channel." (Dr. Beter Audio Tape #39 recorded 10/29/78.)

Dr. Beter continued to give Gen. Brown such information as the precise location of Russia's secret missile and bomb emplacement, including some that had been planted on American soil and in U.S. rivers, near dams, etc. Russia would plant them, Dr. Beter would tell Brown, and Brown would have them removed.

The Bolsheviks in our government who were working with Russia arranged to have Brown replaced, and the bombs were no longer removed. On October 1, 1976, President Gerald Ford (a secret Communist and member of the Michigan Mafia) signed what has been called the treasonous Red Friday Agreement and the Russians were allowed to continue without interference.

In Beter's Audio Letter #39, recorded 10/29/78, and printed in Wisconsin Report of November 16, 1978, he quoted the same October 2nd article from Aviation Week that I quoted in my October 1978 newsletter, about Russia attaining Particle Beam weapons technology. In his letter he said, "Last September 1977 I reported Russia's first operational use of Particle Beam weapons in space.

On September 20, 1977, the Russians blasted an American Spy Satellite into a huge fireball in space as it passed over the Petrozvodsk Observatory in northern Russia. And barely a week later, on September 27, 2977, the secret American Moon Base in Copernicus Crater was silenced by Russia's neutron-beam attack from Earth orbit. America had just lost the Battle of the Harvest Moon. Immediately America was forced to stop short in her secret Beam-weapons race with Russia, for suddenly our Unseen Rulers were teetering on the edge of war itself - and Russia suddenly was calling the shots."

And now, friends, you know what the Apollo Moon Landing (hoax) was about - it was a cover for the real above-top-secret military missions. Although top secret, hints of the base have appeared here and there. The December 1993/January 1994 issue of Air & Space magazine, in the article "Securing the High Ground," said:

"Details of the moon base, which were contained in a thick secret report called 'Military Lunar Base Program or S.R. 183 Lunar Observatory Study,' were revealed by the Air Force Ballistic Missile Division's Directorate of Space Planning and Analysis in April 1960. The heart of S.R. (Study Requirement) 183 was an underground lunar-Based Earth-Bombardment System that would insure 'positive retaliation' in the event of a Soviet attack against the United States. Although the report said that construction of the missile complex could be postponed for three or four years, it called for active planning for the base to begin 'immediately if maximum military advantage is to be derived from a lunar program."

The broad outlines of the moonbase plan had been published in the April and September 1959 issues of Aviation Week. Richard Hoagland, R. Ren_, Bill Kaysing, and others have determined that the NASA moon landings as presented were hoaxed and they discuss what might really have happened. Hoagland has found evidence of the remains of highly advanced structures on the Moon AND Mars. What Hoagland does not know is that some of those structures could be American built. This is a story that remains to be told.

You will wonder where Beter got his information, including information that not even our highest intelligence services knew. Most of you are not ready for the answer to THAT QUESTION, but for those of you who are ready, I will tell you that the answer is revealed on page 204 of Missing the Lifeboat? Phoenix Journal #86 and page 29 of Ascension or Never-Never Land? Phoenix Journal #98. [Call 1-800-800-5565 to order.]

On May 25, 1961, President Kennedy (in his state of the union address, not the inaugural address as sometimes reported) made the famous speech in which he said: "I believe that this nation should commit itself to achieving the goal, before this decade is out, of landing a man on the Moon and returning him safely to Earth."

Apparently he did not know at the time, although he soon began to learn, that at the time he made that statement, there was a base already on the Moon. A year later, on May 22, 1962, a space probe landed on Mars and confirmed the existence of an environment which could support life. Not long afterward the construction of a colony on the planet Mars was begun in real earnest.

If you want to learn more, I suggest you research the subject known among the UFO crowd as "Alternative 3" (the book by that name is about 75% true and 25% disinformation). "Bob Grodin" was a pseudonym for an astronaut who saw the real base. The moonbase was set up by our actual rulers, known as Bilderbergers (this project was headed by the particular group known as the Jason Society), with headquarters in Switzerland.

They have meetings to make their plans and Spotlight newspaper likes to brag that it is able to penetrate the meetings. What Spotlight doesn't know is the main meetings were conducted on a nuclear submarine under the Polar ice cap. There are fewer party crashers there. For proof that NASA has lied to you, contact Richard Hoagland of the Mars Mission. While you are at it, ask him about Dan Quayle. (The Mars Mission, 122 Dodd St. Weehawken, NJ 07087).

The RAND Corporation developed nuclear powered machinery for creating the underground tunnels at the base. The machinery was also used in the U.S. to build a huge network of underground tunnels and complexes. You might want to read Underground Bases and Tunnels - What is the Government Trying to Hide? by Richard Sauder, a book available from Spotlight newspaper.

People who worked on the Apollo programs and in NASA will say that I do not know what I am talking about, after all, they were "there," they "know." For serious open-minded researcher, those who realize that something is fishy with NASA and want to know the real truth, I will tell you that the REAL Moon vehicles operate out of S-4 in Nevada (and sometimes Area 51), not to mention the Russian bases.

CUBAN MISSILE CRISIS

In 1962, it was learned that Russia was deploying nuclear missiles in Cuba. The information was obtained from photos taken by a U2 aircraft piloted by Roger Chaffee. President John F. Kennedy, thanks to information provided to him by the Russian defector Colonel Oleg Penkovsky, knew Russia's military weaknesses and warned Khruschev to pull the missiles out. Khruschev was in no position to stand up to Kennedy, so he removed the missiles. The story has been written many times in books and articles.

The U2 pilot Roger Chaffee later was chosen as an astronaut on Apollo 1, commanded by veteran astronaut Gus Grissom (Mercury and Gemini flights). The evidence indicates Chaffee, Grissom and White were murdered, perhaps because Grissom did not like to cooperate in the hoax.

Grissom told his wife, "If there ever is a serious accident in the Space Program, it's likely to be me." Grissom tried to get NASA chief administrator Joe Shea to go through the Apollo test with him. Chaffee had never been in space, but was a veteran of secret intelligence missions such as the U2 flights. NASA had 7 oxygen fire accidents before Grissom, Chaffee, and White were "accidently" burned up in Apollo I in January, 1967.

General Phillips, Frank Borman's superior, did an investigation which was withheld from the public as "classified." Why classified? What were they hiding? Eight astronauts died of "accidents" in 1967. Is it any wonder that the other astronauts "got with the program?" For more details see NASA Mooned America! by R. Ren_. (R. Ren_, 31 Burgess Place, Passaic, NJ 07055.)

What Kennedy did not know when the Cuban Missile Crisis occurred was that Russia was very close to deploying a totally new weapons system. Khruschev lost much face with his countrymen, temporarily. To regain face with his leaders, on April 10, 1963, he tested his new weapons system by destroying the U.S.S. Thresher nuclear submarine. That is another story for another time.

What all the many books about the Cuban Missile Crisis did not tell you, however, was where Khruschev moved those missiles.

At that time the secret Rockefeller/Soviet alliance was in full swing, and the long range joint plans for a controlled Nuclear War were moving right along. Both sides were looking ahead toward an eventual double-cross, but that still lay far in the future at that time. The deliberate strengthening of Russia at America's expense was part of their joint plan for World Government and conquest.

The Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962 threw a temporary monkey wrench into the program when President Kennedy intervened personally and stopped the nuclear arming of Cuba; and for doing that, and other humane "indiscretions," he lost his life in Dallas barely a year later. PART 18:

GUYANA

Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Johnson, made sure that he followed the script more carefully. In the wake of the Cuban crisis, the Russians needed a new forward base in the Caribbean area for strategic purposes until the heat was off in Cuba. To accommodate Russia, Guyana was selected for this purpose, and David Rockefeller saw to it that a Marxist named Forbes Burnham became Prime Minister. In return, the Chase Manhattan Bank became fiscal agent for Guyana, giving Rockefeller access to the gold produced in Guyana; and as a key factor in all this, then-President Lyndon Johnson in 1965 turned over the American Air Base, Atkinson Field, to Guyana.

America's right to retain control over the base for several more decades was simply thrown away without any excuses offered. Atkinson Field, which was then renamed Temehri Airfield, is south of Georgetown, the capital city. This is the airfield to which American helicopters carried bodies to be airlifted to America after the Jonestown disaster.

When Johnson gave the Temehri Airfield to Marxist Guyana, he handed Russia a very large plum indeed. The Temehri Airfield is the largest in all of Latin America, larger even than New York's largest airport, the John F. Kennedy Airport; and its location makes it ideal for ferrying Cuban troops and supplies to Africa.

As a result, Johnson's action on behalf of the Rockefellers robbed the United States of an important logistic connection to Africa while opening the door for Cuban troops. Our later troubles with Cuban troops in Angola and elsewhere in Africa were partly the result.

For a number of years, Russian military activity in Guyana was heavily concentrated around the vicinity of the Temehri Airfield. In 1974, the Russians placed missiles in sites that ringed the airfield. Then the missiles were pulled out from those locations and moved to a separate missile complex west of Georgetown, over the following two years.

In that new complex, the missiles were deployed at sites scattered over an area some 30 miles in diameter. In the approximate center was a Command and Control installation commanded by Russian personnel. And the plot began to thicken.

After the missile base relocation was completed, the missile complex was centered at a point about 70 miles northwest of Temehri Airfield. It was no accident that the Peoples' Temple kibbutz was located so close to the missile base.

At the time the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) was established in WW II, Nelson Rockefeller already had a strong presence in Latin America with his own agency called the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. I am reminded of a story told to me by a friend who, as a young German in South America, was arrested for being German and sent to a concentration camp in Texas for the duration of World War II. Later he often returned to South America. He told me of the time he lived near the border of Colombia and Venezuela and admired the huge beautiful field of flowers owned by Rockefeller. Did you know that Rockefeller loved flowers and was in the flower business? What kind of flowers, you ask?

POPPIES!

ORIGINS OF THE PEOPLES' TEMPLE

The origins of the Peoples' Temple in the 1950s had nothing to do with government intrigues. It was not until about 1970 that certain elements of the United States intelligence community began to infiltrate and subvert the Peoples'

Temple. The Rockefeller brothers have always had a standard practice of supporting not only the faction in power but also spies and opponents to that faction - and who doesn't want a little "free" funding and support money? In this manner they are always in a position, at least theoretically, to cut down anyone who tries to break free of their control.

In the case of Guyana, the Rockefellers wanted to have such a tool in Guyana as a check on Forbes Burnham, the Prime Minister, whom they had put in power with the use of their money. Certain elements within the United States intelligence community under general coordination by the CIA were given the task of finding ways of accomplishing this.

In the course of evaluating various options, it was concluded that the Peoples' Temple would prove ideal. The psychological profile of the leader, Jim Jones, indicated that he could be converted into a powerful tool of the Unseen Rulers. Contrary to reports in the controlled major media, Jim Jones was born a Jew, and he already exhibited tendencies toward kibbutz-style organization that could be channeled into useful directions. This would be brought about through a combination of both conscious and unconscious factors.

At the conscious level, money and powerful political support would be channeled in his direction; at the unconscious level, the technique of psychological programming would be employed.

Gradually, Jim Jones would lose control of his own personality and become what our Unseen Rulers wanted him to be. The process would inevitably create tremendous internal conflicts and turn Jim Jones into a troubled and dangerous man.

CHANGES IN BEHAVIOR

By 1973, changes in Jones' behavior began to be noticed by his friends and followers. His conversion into a semi-conscious agent of death and intrigue was underway in earnest by that time. That same year the mushrooming funds of the Peoples' Temple were used to launch the agricultural kibbutz at Jonestown, Guyana, though only a few people went there at that time.

Guyana was a rigid Marxist police state, and no one could have launched a new enterprise like the Commune without its approval by Forbes Burnham; but David Rockefeller agents made sure that Burnham received all the assurances he needed that the Jones compound would fit neatly into the Marxist environment of Guyana.

At the same time, Forbes Burnham had begun double-crossing David Rockefeller, exactly as had been feared. He was now playing ball politically but he was hiding much of Guyana's gold production in caves in the mountains. David Rockefeller found this out sometime later, but by then the much bigger problem was developing from a double-cross by Russia so Burnham was left untouched in order to make way for bigger things.

By summer 1974, the Rockefeller brothers were still soundly in bed with the Kremlin, and there were already ominous signs that something was happening in Russia which they did not understand; but they simply could not imagine that their old Kremlin allies, the Bolsheviks, were being overthrown.

Public warnings about Guyana missiles were denied or ignored. The planned and programmed Nuclear War was being blueprinted for the late 1970s and they did not want the plan to be spoiled by public awareness; but two years later Russia's all-out military double-cross of America began with the Underwater Missile Crisis of 1976, another story for another time.

MAJOR TARGET

The Guyana missile base was one of the major targets of the revised planning. When this planning began more than two years prior, the Space Battle of the Harvest Moon still lay in the future. It seemed quite inconceivable that America could lose its secret beam-weapons base which was soon to be operational on the Moon; and so long as they had this Moon Base to depend on, our Unseen Rulers thought they could not lose. But in light of the Underwater Missile double cross, they wanted to be able to pull as many of Russia's military teeth as possible. In this way, their destruction of Russia would be even more complete than originally planned.

The planners of Operation Guyana were given a difficult problem to solve. The objective was to wipe out the Russian missile base in Guyana by removing the threat it posed to the Panama Canal and southern American cities; but this was to be a pre-war operation carried out covertly and with complete surprise. It had to be covertly, because neither the United States nor Russia could afford to have it known that the base ever existed; and the surprise had to be complete, because with even the briefest warning the base could be reinforced and defended by Cuban troops.

From these requirements it was concluded that a commando-style raid would be necessary, something like the Israeli raid at Entebbe Airport in Uganda in July 1976. Any other kind of attack would have required our leaders to do what President Kennedy did in 1962, that is, tell the American people what was afoot and ask for our support. At all costs, the one thing our Unseen Rulers were determined not to do was to tell us anything. The problem then arose - how to get the joint attacking forces into Guyana in a force large enough and fast enough to do the job without betraying their hand.

Wiping out a base like that one in Guyana, after all, was no small task. It was then concluded that somehow some very sudden, massive, compelling excuse would have to be provided in order to enable the secret joint military to enter Guyana temporarily. The excuse, whatever it was, would have to be so visible as to tie Russia's hands so that Russia could not retaliate in Guyana without giving away what she had been up to there; and the excuse would have to appear non-military yet require military expertise.

Furthermore, some provision would have to be made for ALL casualties in the missile-base attack to be removed from Guyana after the raid, otherwise their presence in Guyana could have been made the basis of an international incident trumped up around some different story unrelated to the secret missile base.

For example, the government of Guyana, following Russian dictates, might have publicly displayed the bodies of the joint military forces killed in the attack and said they were killed in an attempted coup d'etat against Forbes Burnham. It was a very big order, but the Jonestown kibbutz proved to be the answer. All that was necessary was to arrange for many hundreds of American citizens to die suddenly in Guyana and under conditions guaranteeing instant massive publicity.

The sheer enormity of the tragedy would require military involvement, and the location of Jonestown was made to order. Helicopters commuting between the Temehri Airfield and Jonestown would naturally fly over the missile complex - whose details were known in spite of expert camouflage. This meant that joint special armed forces could be set down near the perimeters of the missile base and later recovered, along with casualties, with relative ease.

And as the reporters at the Temehri Airfield watched helicopters leaving to the northwest and return from the same direction, they were led to assume that all were going to and from Jonestown some 150 miles away. They had no way of knowing that many of the flights were to and from the Russian missile base, which lay in the same direction but only half as far distant.

IN THE BEGINNING OF THE SCHEME

When it was decided to use mass deaths at Jonestown as a cover for the missile-base attack, Jonestown was functioning only as an outpost of the Peoples' Temple. There were not enough people there to provide a sufficiently major incident to serve the intended purpose, and so, through both direct and indirect means, Jim Jones was persuaded to go to the Guyana kibbutz himself, taking as many of his flock as would follow him.

That turned out to be about 25% to 30%, and by following him they automatically identified themselves as the group most highly dependent upon Jones personally. They were also most susceptible to the combined influences of exhaustion, intimidation, and isolation from outside help - in other words, just right for thorough brainwashing.

Ever since the days of the Korean War it had been known conclusively that brainwashing techniques can cause many people to do all kinds of things. Even hardened American GIs in Korea fell victim to brainwashing in surprising numbers because they did not understand what they were up against. The Jonestown victims were anything but hardened soldiers.

In August 1977, Jim Jones left for Guyana with his large sacrificial flock. That same month, United Nations Ambassador Andrew Young carried a message to Prime Minister Forbes Burnham of Guyana. He said that under certain conditions the United States and the World Bank would increase its aid to Guyana - that is, line Burnham's pocket by a factor of ten times more than previous levels. And so the key disaster of Jonestown was set into motion shortly before the Battle of the Harvest Moon.

POOR LEO RYAN

To trigger the whole tragedy and in a blare of publicity, the interest of late Congressman Leo J. Ryan was developed and programmed.

In a display of courage that is practically unknown today in the U.S. Congress, Ryan went to Guyana knowing that it might be dangerous. But what he did not know, of course, was that he had been lured into making a trip whose tragic outcome was planned well in advance.

Congressman Ryan and those who died with him at Port Kaituma Airport were casualties in the secret war that was leading up to Nuclear War One. And so were the hundreds of other American civilians who died in the so-called "mass suicide" at Jonestown, Guyana.

As the time approached for Congressman Ryan to make his anticipated trip to Guyana, other activities were set in motion on the diplomatic and military state. It was essential that Russia's attention be diverted away from Guyana until too late to take action to protect the missile base.

Russia's prize in the Western Hemisphere, of course, is Cuba; and so in the final days before the Battle of Guyana on Thanksgiving Day 1978, the trumped up MIG-23 crisis was used to divert Russian attention to Cuba. Only too late did the Kremlin discover that the real target was not Cuba but Guyana.

THE BATTLE OF THANKSGIVING DAY 1978

Close aides of the late Congressman Leo Ryan have reported publicly that his ill-fated decision to go to Guyana was triggered by a State Department report to him that he found totally unsatisfactory. This reaction of Ryan's had been correctly predicted and, in fact, deliberately encouraged. With elections coming up, Congressman Ryan decided to schedule the trip after the election during the Congressional recess.

This was a quite natural decision, and had also been anticipated by the planners behind the scenes. No politician would miss the opportunity to campaign right up to election day.

As the time approached for his trip, the false issue of the Cuban MIG-23 crisis erupted. The Carter Administration had learned nearly a year prior that the Russians were going to send the MIG-23s to Cuba and decided that it would be a perfect pretext for a fake crisis. The MIG-23 can carry certain types of nuclear weapons as claimed; but even this role it is a tactical weapon best suited for support of ground or naval forces.

The MIG-23 in and of itself did not threaten America in the same way that the 1962 Cuban missiles did, and so when the United States began playing up the MIG-23s, it was very obvious to the Kremlin that this was a deliberate effort to stir up public tension over Cuba.

The questions were: Exactly what was the United States up to? Would the Carter Administration be so crazy as to invade Cuba? Such a thing sounded irrational, but America's Unseen Rulers were behaving more and more irrationally.

This, too, was partially deliberate and was intended to keep the chess players in the Kremlin off balance, but it was also partly a result of the increasing degree of control over America by those Satanic schizophrenics, the Bolsheviks.

Cuba was, after all, very important to Russia, for Russia was looking ahead to world domination after Nuclear War I; and for that, Cuba is Russia's main beach-head in the Western Hemisphere. Even more urgently, Cuba was the unadmitted home of Russia's Caribbean Submarine Fleet, and that fleet had repeatedly moved into attack positions in the Gulf of Mexico over the prior two years and more during periods of tension.

As if that were not enough, there were concentrations of nuclear weapons in at least four land locations in Cuba. One was near the north coast roughly 10 miles inland southeast of Cardenas. This location is 150 miles due south of Cape Sable, Florida. A second site was about 150 miles to the east-southeast of that and about 10 miles inland from the north coast. One hundred twenty five miles farther to the southeast was a third concentration 15 miles northeast of Marti, well inland. A fourth nuclear site was near the eastern tip of Cuba, 18 miles north-northwest of the United States Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay.

With all this at stake, American publicity over the MIG-23s caused worry in the Kremlin. And in early November the tension increased when the United States began sending SR-71 reconnaissance flights over Cuba - shades of 1962 and the U-2.

In response, massive formations from the Atlantic, Pacific, and Caribbean Submarine Fleets of the Russian Navy began fanning out along America's east, west, and gulf coasts on November 6. They did not deploy into attack formations but their sheer numbers signaled a clear warning to Washington. At that moment they were still on station, many with neutron weaponry.

Then during the week immediately preceding the tragedies in Guyana the MIG-23 pseudo crisis built to a climax. Beginning on Tuesday, November 14, a huge combined American and British naval Task Force began heading toward Cuba. By midweek, Cuban defense forces were on full alert, and on Thursday, November 16, a group of twelve United States Senators in Moscow - supposedly to discuss the SALT talks - met with Russia's Kosygin.

There they pressed the alleged issue of the Cuban MIG-23 argument, calling it a "false issue." As a former test pilot and America's first astronaut in orbit, Senator John Glenn knew what he was talking about, but Kosygin's anger over the other comments about the MIGs provided the United States intelligence community with valuable proof that the decoy action toward Cuba was working. The next day, November 17, Russia publicly admitted sending MIG-23s to Cuba, calling them strictly defensive weapons.

The same day an editorial in the Washington Post typified the crescendo of media attention to the Cuban MIG-23s. It was titled: "A New Cuban Missile Crisis?" The very next day, Saturday, November 18, Congressman Leo Ryan, three newsmen and a woman seeking to escape from Jonestown were slaughtered at the Port Kaituma Airport. At least a dozen other people were also wounded, but there was no effort to destroy the airplane filled with terrified escapees from Jonestown. Instead, many witnesses were left alive, and a smaller plane managed to take off right after the airport massacre and report the attack in the capital, Georgetown.

Immediately world attention was focused on Guyana, and meanwhile the mass murder at Jonestown - wrongly called a mass suicide - was underway.

At this point, the elaborate decoy action toward Cuba was no longer needed, so the Pentagon announced that a routine naval exercise was in progress which would approach no closer to Cuba than 50 miles. Cuban defense forces relaxed, but the real action was only beginning in Guyana. The methodical executions of Congressman Ryan and three prominent newsmen had guaranteed that Jonestown would shortly be in the glare of publicity. Having guaranteed this publicity, Jim Jones then ordered the mass executions at the Jonestown kibbutz.

DETAILS OF MASSACRE

The complete details of the Jonestown disaster may never be known publicly. It is certain, however, that very few if any of those who died there willingly took their own lives. Some were tricked, not realizing that the death rites were real. Many more resisted, but they were weak, helpless, and confronted with armed execution squads. So by various means, several hundred people were poisoned with potassium cyanide, many by being forcibly injected. Many more fled into the jungle, where U.S. Army Green Berets and British SAS special forces troops tracked them down and killed them with a shot to the temple.

Finally, when the mass murder was completed, the executioners performed their final task of stage-managing the horrible death scene. In order to achieve the surprise needed in attacking the Russian missile base, it was critically important that the first reports from Jonestown described the scene as a mass suicide. Only in this way could its actual military significance be hidden long enough to fool the Russians.

Therefore, all the bodies free of gunshot wounds were carefully arranged in neat rows and other groupings, suggesting at first sight that everyone died willingly and deliberately. This was the scene that greeted Guyanese troops late the following day, Sunday, November 19. It was more than 24 hours after the kibbutz victims died and the executioners, including the real Jim Jones, were long gone. Jim Jones did not die at Jonestown.

COUNTERS AFRAID OF DISEASE

The Guyanese troops were afraid of possible disease but counted the bodies as accurately as possible without close handling or moving the bodies. The total they reported was 409 on that Sunday night. The initial impression of a mass suicide was seized upon by the controlled major media of the United States. Without waiting for an investigation, the media drummed away at the suicide image of Jonestown as if it were a proven fact. After a few days a few people did begin to raise questions, but by then the initial image of suicide had served its purpose of opening Guyana's doors to the United States.

For example, on Tuesday, November 21, Jim Jones' surviving son, Steven, said in a Georgetown press conference, "There's no way it could have been mass suicide." And that same day, according to the Washington Star, a Guyanese source pointed out a serious medical discrepancy in the Jonestown kibbutz death scene. He said, "If you die of cyanide, which seems to have been the poison, your body goes into spasm and contortion death, but at Jonestown everyone looked totally relaxed."

The reason for this discrepancy was that by the time the Guyanese troops arrived, all the bodies had been rearranged. They were also placed face down for the most part. This was so that the widely publicized news photos would not ruin the desired impression of calm by letting you see the victims' final expression of agony.

To continue the nightmare charade to fool the Russians, the United States at first publicly urged Guyana to collect and bury the hundreds of bodies. As arranged, Guyana replied in effect that it was America's problem and that America should take the bodies back to the United States - just as planned. To facilitate this huge and hideous task, Guyana obligingly agreed to waive the usual Guyanese law that requires any body to be autopsied before removal from the country. With this arrangement, the United States achieved the carte blanche military access to Guyana that was needed.

Russian intelligence realized what was afoot by early Monday, November 20, but it was already too late to stop it. Russia could hardly announce to the world that, "We have a secret nuclear missile base in Guyana and the United States is getting ready to destroy it." That would have rallied world opinion behind America; and, although Russian Cosmoshperes quickly converged over Guyana, they, too, were useless in the covert conditions of battle there.

Their Charged Particle Beam Weapons could have made short work of the commando-style forces, but in the process they would have wiped out the Russian base itself. The Guyana missiles had become only a minor factor in Russia's military power since the Battle of the Harvest Moon the year prior. They were not valuable enough to Russia to declare open war on their account. And so under these conditions, Russia was powerless to act once the Jonestown tragedy had been staged.

As Thanksgiving Day approached, huge American transports, helicopters, troops, and medical teams swarmed into Guyana. In a remote corner of the huge Temehri Airfield a command post was established for the twin operations of Jonestown and the Russian missile base.

As some of the troops began the nauseating task of cleaning up the Jonestown kibbutz, other joint attack forces were taking up positions around the missile base in preparations for the surprise raid. Meanwhile, day after day the death count reported at Jonestown remained unchanged at 409.

Then on Thanksgiving Day itself, the Battle of Guyana took place. Crack military forces experienced in jungle and surprise warfare moved in on the Russian complex, striking all the dispersed sites simultaneously. Like the Entebbe raid, the battle itself did not last long. It had to be over quickly to be successful.

First the small crews on site near each missile were overwhelmed, and then killed. The missiles themselves were quickly disabled. Next the military forces converged on the Missile Command and Control Center, where a bloody pitched battle took place.

When the smoke cleared, every single person manning the missile base had been killed, including the Russian commanders.

When the battle was over, American helicopters from Temehri Airfield began landing within the ruined missile complex and flying out the wounded. Then the remaining attackers were left with two more jobs before they could retire from the area. First, they were under strict orders to leave no bodies in the attacking forces on Guyanese soil, and so the entire area was scoured until every single member of the attacking force had been accounted for. Their bodies, like those of the victims at Jonestown, were sealed in Vietnam-type body bags and collected in clearings where helicopters could land to pick them up.

Finally, the combined forces were under orders to remove the nuclear warheads from the missiles and take them back to Georgetown for airlift to the United States. Specially trained members of the attacking force had set to work on this task immediately after the initial attacks on the missile crews.

By early Friday, November 24, all the warheads had been removed. They, too, were placed in body bags, one per bag, with some jungle foliage stuffed in to give the bag a reasonable appearance.

Of course none of this war was apparent to the reporters at Temehri Airfield, whose access to the American Command Post there was carefully controlled. When wounded members of the attacking force were flown back to the Airfield, after the Battle of Guyana on Thanksgiving afternoon, they were kept out of sight of the reporters. Otherwise, when reporters occasionally saw body bags being moved from place to place they just naturally assumed that all contained victims from Jonestown. They had no way of knowing that some contained slain Commandoes and that others contained Russian nuclear warheads. The continual cargo of death from the Jonestown kibbutz made the perfect cover for the aftermath of the Battle of Guyana.

WHERE COULD THEY TAKE ALL THOSE BODIES?

Many reporters were totally puzzled at the choice of Dover Air Force Base in Delaware for the Guyana airlift. Most of the Jonestown victims were from California, and there is a mortuary facility, similar to the Dover facility, at Oakland Air Force Base in California. Dover was chosen to facilitate transfer of the Russian nuclear warheads to the nearby Aberdeen Proving Ground and Arsenal. This was done by means of shallow flights from Dover to Phillips Air Force Base.

Originally the Guyanese count of 409 had been accepted as firm by United States officials in Guyana. That had raised questions as to where the rest of the one thousand or so residents reported to be in Jonestown had gone. Finally, on Thanksgiving Day, with the body clean-up operation well under way, a military spokesman told reporters, "The evaluation that we have made is simply that there were not many more people in Jonestown at the time of the suicide." But even as he spoke, the Battle of Guyana was raging at the Russian missile base. By midday on Friday, the day after Thanksgiving, 485 body bags had already arrived at the Temehri Airfield. The "bodies" of warheads from the Russian missile base were destined to raise the total far beyond the total of 409 bodies originally counted by the Guyanese at the kibbutz. It was a bad mistake, the kind of thing that happens in the heat of battle. Something had to be done, and quickly.

So, on that Friday after Thanksgiving, a breathless and nervous Pentagon spokesman at the Temehri Airfield made a stunning announcement over CBS television [some of us call it CIABS Television, don't we, Dan Rather?]: "The original count of persons found dead at the Jonestown site has been found to be seriously in error. It now appears there may be as many as 780 bodies, total, found at the site. They were found simply buried under other bodies. There were larger adults that were grouped together, and under their bodies were found bodies, and under their bodies were found the bodies of smaller adults and children."

Rather a curious mass suicide, I would say.

Badgered by incredulous reporters, the Government embellished the cover story later on. The Washington Star quoted the same spokesman as saying Friday night: "Near the center of the pile of bodies, near the assembly hall, they were three deep in some areas. They were in layers with blankets between them." Wasn't it just nice of all those people to fall over in well orchestrated and neat rows?

The story was so unbelievable that within two days the United States Government dismissed its own story about the blankets as a "rumor." Still the basic idea of bodies on top of bodies had to be maintained, so on Saturday, November 25, another Air Force spokesman tried to make it all sound plausible in the following words:

"From what I observed, the people, when they committed suicide, would line up in nice neat little circles, children in front of them, and as they died they folded into the interior of the circle."

Even though the story kept getting curiouser and curiouser, nearly everybody accepted it hook, line, sinker and fish!

The Guyana cover-up was world-wide in its dimensions - it had to be. In Guyana, Deputy Prime Minister Reid made the first public announcement to the Guyanese people about Jonestown on Friday afternoon, November 24, in parliament. Then he refused to answer questions, and rushed out to cries of "Shame, Shame" and "Cover-up" from parliament members.

And in the United States on Thanksgiving Day, FBI Director William Webster said that the: "FBI disaster squad had positively identified the body of James Warren Jones through fingerprint identification records." This was a lie, and at that moment Jim Jones was making good his preplanned escape from Guyana.

HOW DID JIM JONES GET OUT?

The plans for removal of Jones were laid well in advance. An ocean-going boat, well stocked with supplies and money, was waiting for him near the river town of Bartica, 35 miles southwest of Georgetown. In order to make his way to Bartica from Jonestown, Jones had a Safe Conduct Pass.

In the early morning of Thanksgiving Day, as the Battle of Guyana was beginning, Jones headed downstream toward Georgetown. Shortly after noon Guyana time his boat left the mouth of the Essequibo River into the Atlantic Ocean.

From there Jones followed a complicated itinerary which was designed to prevent his being followed; but in spite of that, he was followed. From Guyana Jones headed due east for about 330 miles and then turned south, landing near La Mere, French Guyana, at about 5:30 A.M. local time, November 27. From there he traveled by land to the capital of Cayenne, and took an airplane across the Atlantic Ocean to Freetown, Sierra Bissau Airport, arriving there approximately 7:00 P.M. local time, November 28.

There, less than two hours later, he boarded a DC-3 and took off. His route took him eastward to Tambacounda, (Senegal); from there onward into Mali with stops at Segou, Mopti, and Gao; then onward to Agadez (Niger), and Largeau (Chad). From there his plane continued to Atbaqra (Sudan), and then a short final hop to Port Sudan where he arrived shortly after 4:00 A.M., November 30, local time.

When he arrived at Port Sudan, Jones found a Turboprop Executive Transport waiting for him which was owned and operated by Israeli Intelligence. Within 20 minutes the plane took off with Jones and headed up the middle of the Red Sea toward the Gulf of Aqaba. At 6:30 A.M. local time on November 30, Jones' plane landed briefly at Elath, the back door to Israel; then on to a private airport outside of Jerusalem, arriving at 7:20 A.M. local time. From there he headed to a nearby location for an intelligence briefing.

I have information that Jones was in Israel for about 7 or 8 years then was killed by his "keepers" as being too dangerous to have around. However, I have other information that conflicts with this, so I do not know his current status.

I have heard preachers giving sermons making a point by telling about Jim Jones and Jonestown. They are really just snorting in the wind; they have no notion of truth and are merely reinforcing the brainwashing that has been laid upon them.

PART 20:

LT. COL. JAMES "BO" GRITZ AND JONESTOWN

The officer in charge of all U.S. Army Special Forces for Latin America at the time of the Jonestown holocaust was Lt. Col. James "Bo" Gritz. Gritz was the original soldier after which the movie character "Rambo" was patterned. Gritz was the most decorated soldier to come out of the Vietnam war.

The Guyana massacre was carried out by Bo Gritz' men (along with British SAS troops). Flatland (#10) magazine, in an interview with Gritz, asked him:

Question: You trained Special Forces that went into Jonestown? What was the precise nature of the operation?

"I don't know precisely because it was a compartmentalized operation. The only thing that I do know for certain is what the Sergeant I quote coming out of Jonestown, he was insistent because he was disgusted, on writing this book. He was, without compromise, going to call it All the Niggers Are Dead. I asked him, 'Why would you want to entitle anything such an offensive way?' 'It doesn't make a difference what your color, your creed, your sex,' he said, 'when you are treated the way they were, that's what you are; you're a nigger, you're nothing else.' I think that those soldiers saw things that affected them and made them very angry. I've seen other things like that in combat where there have been abuses. I wrote about one of them in my book where the Captain tortured the young severely and the young Sergeant put on a swastika and said, "If I'm going to act like a Nazi I'm going to look like one.' I think that the same kind of negative impact occurred in Jonestown."

Gritz has more about Jonestown in his autobiography, Called to Serve. Perhaps you simply cannot believe what I am telling you. Will you believe it if told to you by the Green Beret officer in charge of the men who did the killing? He admits that the information was "compartmentalized" and it was not until later that he learned what his men were actually doing. The following information is from pages 584-587 of his book:

"The true story of the Jonestown camp in Guyana has been brought to light through an extensive investigation conducted by John Judge, from Philadelphia and Washington, D.C., and other dedicated researchers and investigators. The truth, which was thoroughly suppressed by the American media, is that it was actually a slave-labor camp run by Jones with the assistance of the CIA. Most of the information which follows is from John Judge's summary of the investigation, supplemented with information provided by Special Forces teams I had earlier trained and commanded, who were sent in to 'clean up the remains of Jonestown.'

"Most of the black and Hispanic poor people and social activists who became the inmates of the camp were brought there either by force or coercion, or lured under false pretenses, where extensive experiments of drug-induced mind control were performed on them. Even before they were moved to Guyana, reports of beatings, kidnappings, sexual abuse and mysterious deaths had leaked out to the press about the earlier Peoples' Temple in Ukiah, California.

"Jim Jones had a very interesting past which was overlooked by the media: During the time his friend Dan Mitrione was teaching torture techniques to the Brazilian and Argentineans, Jones was also sent to Brazil where his house, transportation and groceries were provided to him by the U.S. Embassy, and he frequently traveled to Belo Horizonte, the CIA headquarters in Brazil.

"Jones had been contacted in Ukiah by 'Christian missionaries' from World Vision (World Vision is a CIA controlled front operation), an evangelical order which had performed espionage work for the CIA in Southeast Asia. Most of Jones' top lieutenants were from wealthy, educated backgrounds, many with connections to the military or intelligence agencies. These were the people who were involved in setting up the bank accounts, complex legal transactions and financial agreements which put people under the control of the Peoples' Temple.

"Some of Jones' Lieutenants were: Dr. Lawrence Layton was chief of Chemical and Biological Warfare Research at Dugway Proving Grounds in Utah for many years and later worked as Director of Missile and Satellite Development at the Navy Propellant Division at Indian Head, Maryland. His wife, Lisa, was the daughter of Hugo Phillips, who had represented the huge Nazi manufacturing cartel, I.G. Farben, as a stockbroker. Their daughter, Debbie, met and married George Philip Blakey, whose parents had extensive stock holdings in Solve Drugs, a division of I.G. Farben.

"Blakey was reputed to be training mercenaries in Jonestown who were sent to work with CIA-backed UNITA forces in Angola. Terri Buford's father, Admiral Charles T. Buford, worked with Naval Intelligence. Marie Katsaris' father was minister with the Greek Orthodox Church, thought to be a conduit of CIA funding, and she claimed she had proof he was a CIA agent. The 'official survivors' were represented upon their return to the U.S. by Joseph Blatchford, an attorney who had been named in a prior scandal involving CIA infiltration of the Peace Corps.

"The people who were taken from San Francisco to begin their 'new life' in Guyana were bussed to Florida and arrived in Guyana bound and gagged, where they were forced to work 16 hours or more daily, and were fed on minimum rations. As more and more rumors began to filter back to the United States of druggings, beatings, torture, sexual humiliations and coercion at the Guyana site, Congressman Leo Ryan decided to go to Guyana and verify the situation for himself.

"Ryan had challenged the CIA's overseas operations before, as a member of the House Committee responsible for oversight on intelligence. He was co-author of the controversial Hughes-Ryan Amendment, which would have required advance CIA disclosure to the congressional committees of all planned covert operations. The amendment would be defeated shortly after his death in Jonestown.

"With Ryan on the way to Jonestown, the secrecy surrounding the camp would be broken and desperate measures would need to be taken to keep the truth from escaping, much less the inmates. In a futile attempt to test their conditioning methods, the leaders at Jonestown apparently tried to implement an actual suicide drill, but it was obviously ignored. Official stories first numbered the victims at 408, but later revised the toll upward to 913. It was claimed that some 505 bodies had been covered by those of the first 408 who had fallen directly on top of them, confusing those who had been counting from aerial photographs. - a blatant and ridiculous attempt at cover-up.

"However, the first reports were true - 408 had died, and 700 fled to the jungle where British Black Watch troops and American Special Forces were conducting 'training exercises.' Of the 700, 505 who had been deliberately shot in the jungle were added to the count of those who had supposedly committed suicide by drinking cyanide-laced Kool Aid.

"The truth is that nearly 400 inmates were forced to die by injection, according to the Chief Guyanese medical examiner, Dr. Mootoo, who arrived at Jonestown within hours of the massacre. He found needle marks on the left shoulder blades of 80-90% of the victims, and the others had been shot or strangled.

"As Chief Medical Examiner, Mootoo's testimony to the Guyanese Grand Jury led to their conclusion that all but three of the people who had died at Jonestown were murdered by 'persons unknown.' Several pictures show the gunshot wounds on the bodies as well. The U.S. Army spokesman, Lt. Col. Schuler, told the press, 'No autopsies are needed. The cause of death is not an issue here,' and the forensic doctors who later performed the autopsies at Dover, Delaware, were never made aware of Dr. Mootoo's findings.

"Guyanese troops discovered a large cache of drugs, enough to control the entire population of Georgetown, Guyana (pop. 200,000), for over a year. One footlocker contained 11,000 doses of Thorazine, a dangerous tranquilizer, and others such as sodium pentothal (truth serum), chloral hydrate (a hypnotic), demerol, Thallium (confuses thinking), haliopareael and Largatil (powerful tranquilizers) and many others. It was very evident that Jonestown was a tightly-run concentration camp, complete with medical and psychiatric experimentation.

"Direct orders to cover up the cause of death came from the top levels of the American Government. Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's national security advisor, authorized Robert Pastor to order Lt. Col. Gordon Sumner to strip the bodies of the medical bracelets they had been forced to wear for identification. Pastor later served as Deputy Director of the CIA.

"One of the Special Forces sergeants assigned to the Jonestown massacre was so outraged about what he had witnessed that he had decided to describe the events in a book. While the Secrecy Act prevented him from detailing all that went on, SFC Inman carefully hid the entire story within his title: All The Niggers Are Dead! When I asked that he explain the crudeness of so naming his report, he replied, 'Sir, that's what they were. Both blacks and whites were niggers; that's what any slave is; that's what they were. That was our final radio message when the job we were assigned was finished.' I could tell by his bitterness that the government had no fear that the book would ever be printed. He just needed someone to vent his anger on.

"Guyanese Prime Minister Forbes Burnham rose to power as the result of a CIA-inspired coup against the recalcitrant Guyanese leader Cheddi Jagan. Richard Dwyer, a CIA agent working as Deputy Chief of Mission at the U.S. Embassy in Guyana, was shown to have been at the scene at the time of the massacre and at the airport strip, where he failed to order Guyanese troops, armed with machine guns, to defend Ryan and his staff.

"Chief Consular Officer Richard McCoy, who was described as 'close to [Jim] Jones,' worked for military intelligence and was 'on loan' from the Defense Department at the time of the massacre. Dan Webber, who was sent to the Jonestown site the day after, was also named as a CIA agent.

"U.S. Ambassador John Burke, who had served in the CIA since 1963 and had worked with Dwyer in Thailand, according to Philip Agee, tried to stop Ryan's investigation. The State Department concealed all reports of violations at Jonestown from Congressman Leo Ryan, while the Embassy regularly provided Jones with copies of all congressional inquiries under the Freedom of Information Act.

"According to current reports, Jonestown has been 're-populated' with over 1,000 Laotion Hmong people who grew opium and served under General Vang Pao during our 'secret war' in Laos and Cambodia. According to these reports, World Vision was also attempting to move the population from the island of Dominica to Jonestown.

"In addition to the already mentioned torture camp, Colonia Dignidad, another is reported to be located at Pisgua, Chile. Inside Guyana itself is another 'religious community,' named Hilltown, also operated under iron discipline, with 8,000 blacks from Guyana and the U.S. They were allowed to clear the Jonestown site of shoes and weapons, both of which are in short supply in Guyana. It may only be a matter of time before another Jonestown is exposed. It is sad to know that what started out to be an information gathering organization has turned into an instrument of the dragon."

IN THE BEGINNING...

In the March 1919 issue of Electrical Experimenter magazine, details of the Roger's underground communication system were released. This system was later classified SECRET and used to communicate with submarines during World War I. It involved using frequencies through the ground and water. The signals were 5,000 times stronger than signals through the air.

The patents are confusing to most engineers, but to someone who understands, it is obvious that the transmitters were using scalar waves. If you wonder if it could be possible for scientists to devise the type of technology written about in the early Fire From The Sky articles, you need to be aware that this technology has been around for a long time. Actually, for a very long time.

For instance, in 1977, Louis Kervran won the Nobel Prize for showing that plants and animals (his main experiments were with chickens) use "scalar wave" type technology to transmute elements, for instance, turning potassium into calcium. This is impossible according to the "laws" of physics currently taught in schools. The ruling Elite does not want you "common folk" to have this type of knowledge, as it will undermine their control over you. So the "laws" they teach are WRONG.

While the oil barons sabotaged Nikola Tesla's efforts to provide cheap or free energy to the world, the Russians took an interest in his material and developed it.

Nikita Kruschev asked his physicists, specifically Pyorte (Peter) Kapitsa, to develop a system for total defense against missiles and aircraft. By studying Tesla and others they were successful and, in 1960, Kruschev announced the development of a "fantastic" Soviet weapon, one that could destroy all life on the world. ("Kruschev Says Soviets Will Cut Forces a Third; Sees 'Fantastic Weapon'," by Max Frankel, New York Times, Jan. 15, 1960, p. 1.) However, it was not quite ready and in 1962 Kruschev was forced to back down during the Cuban Missile Crisis. This caused him to lose much face with his government and people.

U.S.S. THRESHER AND THE U-2

As things were not going well with Kruschev, he decided to use the weapons system before it was fully operational and on April 10, 1963, he successfully detected and destroyed the nuclear submarine U.S.S. Thresher, using an underwater scalar howitzer. The next day, they celebrated by firing a pulse blast creating a tremendous underwater explosion about 100 miles north of Puerto Rico, south of where they had sunk the Thresher.

Col. Tom Bearden described the event: "It left a signature: the sub's surface companion, the U.S.S. Skylark, was in the splatter zone of the underwater scalar interference. That is, spurious EM noise was being generated in all the Skylark's electrical systems, some of which were actually disabled. So intense was the "electronic jamming" that it required over an hour and a half for the Skylark to transmit an emergency message back to its headquarters that the Thresher was in serious trouble and contact with it had been lost.

Some of the Skylark's communication systems actually failed, but later resumed operation inexplicably, once the jamming was gone. That type of "jamming" of multiple bands and multiple electronic equipment, of course, together with the anomalous failure of electronic equipment and its later mysterious recovery, were direct signatures of the use of the exothermic scalar interferometer against the undersea target area in the vicinity of the Skylark.

"The very next day, April 11, 1963, the same Soviet scalar EM howitzer system was tested in the "destroy submarine" pulse mode. A huge underwater EM blast occurred off the coast of Puerto Rico, about 100 miles north of the island. The underwater explosion caused a huge boiling up of a giant mushroom of water about a third of a mile high. The mushroom of water then fell back into the ocean, completing the signature.

"Fortunately the entire incident was seen by the startled crew of a passing U.S. jetliner which was just passing its checkpoint in that area." (See Robert J. Durant, "An Underwater Explosion - or What?" Pursuit, 5(2), April 1972, p. 30-31.) For more information on the Thresher disaster and Skylark problems, see John Bentley, The Thresher Disaster, Doubleday, Garden City, N.Y., 1975, particularly p. 164.

"These two incidents were full-up operational tests of Kruschev's newly-deployed superweapons. He probably staged this dramatic one-two punch in a desperate effort to recover face with the Communist Party after his disastrous facedown by Kennedy in the Cuban Missile Crisis a few short months previously. Apparently the attempt was successful, since he remained in power another year before being deposed."

There is also evidence that the U-2 flight of Francis Gary Powers was shot down by this technology. Bearden says: "In fact, Gary Powers' high-flying aircraft was probably shot down in 1960 by a 'jury-rigged' scalar EM howitzer using modified radars and timed scalar pulses to provide an aerial explosion and EMP." (Fer-De-Lance, by Tom Bearden, p. 65.)

END OF PART 21.

PART 22:

TOTAL RUSSIAN DEFENSE

In 1968, the Soviets made a statement in Military Strategy that the USSR has achieved a 100% defense, and the West has not (Sokolovsky, 3rd Edition). Were they telling the truth, and if so, to what were they referring? It is only a matter of life and death, you know.

Dr. Edward Teller said in 1987: "Today, the Soviets have a monopoly on defense and they intend to keep it. We have done practically nothing about civil defense." He also said, "The Soviets have worked for the past 10 years perfecting laser weapons and now have a laser capable of shooting 1,000 miles without its beam spreading more than 5 feet" (Jan.-Feb. 1987 Fusion).

PROJECT PAPERCLIP

Before we continue in time sequence of what happened, I want to go back and point out some connections you need to know. The earlier Fire From The Sky material says that Russia succeeded in developing anti-gravity levitating platforms, which are the same things as commonly called flying saucers. In fact the Soviets used former Nazi scientists to achieve their advances.

The Nazis actually originated the "flying saucers," and they got their ideas and information concerning them from extraterrestrials. This is what all the records indicate. I will give you some leads and if you are serious, you can do your own research and prove it to yourself. You don't have to believe me or anyone else - check it out for yourself!

For information about the Nazi scientists, I suggest you study material about Project Paperclip. (Project Paperclip by Clarence Lasby; The Torbitt Document by William Torbitt; The Nazi Connection to the John F. Kennedy Assassination by Mae Brussell; etc.) A former member of that operation is a good friend of mine. Among the Germans (Austrians) involved in Paperclip was a Communist spy named Henry Kissinger - you've heard of him, perhaps?

Another German was Werner von Braun, who was brought to this country and became head of the U.S. space program. Von Braun worked for a German general named Walter Dornberger, and had been an SS Sturmbannfuhrer since 1937. Dornberger was in charge of Peenemunde. At the end of the war, von Braun and 115 other German scientists surrendered to the Americans and were brought to Fort Bliss Texas (just across the state line from White Sands Missile Range New Mexico).

In 1950 they were transferred to the Redstone Arsenal at Huntsville, Alabama. Col. Tom Bearden was a nuclear physicist at Redstone Arsenal. Von Braun's original security report said: "He was an SS officer but no information is available to indicate that he was ardent Nazi. Subject is regarded as a potential security threat by the Military Governor."

Von Braun played down his SS membership and said that it was only honorary, and that "his real reason for working in the Nazi missile program, he said, had been the potential usefulness of his machines in 'space travel'" (Blowback, p. 39).

Dornberger was convicted as a war criminal, then later was secretly brought to the U.S. at the request of von Braun to High Commissioner John J. McCloy. He went to work for Bell Aircraft (Bell Textron) where he worked on the space program as director of R&D (James "Bo" Gritz, Called to Serve, p. 511). He was also a special CIA consultant (The Nazi Hunters, p. 217).

Eventually he served on the board of several aerospace companies. He helped develop a nuclear powered trans-atmospheric vehicle (TAV). These vehicles began operating out of Area 51 in Nevada, and other places. Dornberger became a boss of Bell Aerospace Corporation and had about 30 former Nazi scientists working for him. A man named Stanton Friedman is going around the country saying he has worked on these type of nuclear propulsion systems. He sells videos with photos.

McCloy was Assistant Secretary of War and blocked the executions of many Nazi war "criminals." He is the one who was overseer of the internment of Japanese-Americans in concentration camps in California. In 1949 he became High Commissioner in Germany and pardoned convicted war criminals such as Alfred Krupp and Dr. Hjalmar Schact (who went to work for Aristotle Onassis).

He became legal counsel to the "Seven Sisters" oil companies, one of which was managed by the father of CIA agent George de Mohrenschildt who was a Nazi spy in WW II. "George's cousin, the movie producer Baron Constantine Maydell, was one of the top German Abwehr agents in North America , and was recruited by Gehlen..." (Gritz, p. 538).

OPERATION SUNRISE

According to Col. Bo Gritz, former head of U.S. Army Special Forces for Latin America , "General Reinhard Gehlen, Hitler's chief intelligence officer against the Soviet Union , had struck a deal with the Americans (Called OPERATION SUNRISE) that was not, for obvious reasons, released to establishment media. The principal negotiators were Allen Dulles and William Casey of the OSS , Sir William Stephenson for the British, and SS General Karl Wolff, head of the Gestapo in Italy and former chief of Heinrich Himmler's personal staff" (p. 562).

Operation SUNRISE developed into Operation OVERCAST with General Walter Dornberger and Werner von Braun, and then became Project PAPERCLIP, BLOODSTONE AND BELARUS, etc. (ibid.).

John McCloy, by the way, would later serve the Warren Commission and helped cover up the assassination of JFK.

He became head of the World Bank, head of the Chase Manhattan Bank, head of the Ford Foundation, chairman of the Council on Foreign Relations, and co-author of Freedom From War, The United States Program For General And Complete Disarmament In A Peaceful World (Department of State Publication 7277).

Von Braun had an assistant named Fred Wolff: "...that matter had been amply met through Dr. von Braun's suggestions (which Wolff sketched out quickly to receive von Braun's check)." War For The Moon by Martin Caidin, E.P. Dutton, 1959, chapter "Project Moon," p. 61 (this book was illustrated by Fred Wolff). Note above that the head of the Gestapo in Italy , Karl Wolff, was working with von Braun. Was Fred's name originally Karl, or was he a son? We are not talking Smith or Jones here, how many men named Wolff (spelled with two f's) that were close friends of von Braun were there in this very small organization?

Gehlen, von Braun and Dornberger continued to have considerable influence on American politics, as evidenced from this quote from Blowback, p. 64: "Gehlen also played a role in the creation of the famous missile gap of the 1950s. 'Gehlen provided us [the CIA] with specific reports on the Soviet ICBM program,' Victor Marchetti says. 'He said, "We have two reliable reports confirming this," and they [the Soviets] have just installed three missiles at that site,' et cetera, claiming that they had contacts among the German scientists captured by the Russians at the end of the war." The intelligence reports were transmitted to the Pentagon through interagency channels, and word about the alarming new development eventually leaked from there into the press.

"Walter Dornberger added fuel to this fire in 1955 by publishing alarming speculations that the Soviets might attack from the sea, using shorter-range missiles deployed in floating canisters off the coast of the United States. He was deeply involved in the United States ' own ICBM program at this point, and his opinions were given considerable weight in public discussions."

PROJECT OVERCAST

On July 19, 1945, the Joint Chiefs of Staff approved a program called Operation Overcast. Under this program, 350 German scientists and technicians would be brought into the United States for a period of six months. The program was labeled Top Secret to keep it from the American public. (Ashman, Charles & Wagman, Robert J., The Nazi Hunters, Warner Books, p. 212.)

When the Nazi scientists were brought into the U.S., they were first put up at Camp Overcast. Camp Overcast was at Wright Field, which later became famous among UFO researchers as Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, home of the infamous Hangar 18. Even Senator Barry Goldwater was not allowed access to this facility.

Rabbi Stephen Wise, head of the American Jewish Congress, discovered that the wife of one of the Wright Field rocket team was a former Nazi Party official and in May 1946 said: "This operation [Paperclip, formerly called Overcast] is all the more deplorable at a time when officials of our government find every possible reason for failing to fulfill the declared policy of President Truman to rescue as many victims of the Nazi terror as our immigration laws permit... As long as we reward the former servants of Hitler while leaving his victims in DP camps, we cannot even pretend that we are making any real effort to achieve the aims we fought for."

Rabbi Stephen Wise is also famous for the quote: "Some call it Communism; I call it Judaism!"

When the Germans were first brought into New York, "At Port Washing, they lived in comfortable conditions at a castle that had been build by the multimillionaire Jay Gould. They soaked in marble bathtubs and ate in an imposing dining room" (p. 203, American Swastika by Charles Higham).

"In August 1945, General Walter Bedell Smith's private plane was used to fly Gehlen and five of his general staff to the American capital. They traveled in plain clothes, one of their members using a violin case for a suitcase. It is interesting to note that Bedell Smith was Eisenhower's chief of staff" (p. 260, American Swastika).

On March 4, 1946, the operation was changed to Operation Paperclip, with no limits on the time or to the number of Germans.

Another German brought in, who was not a scientist, was Otto von Bolschwing. He was educated at the University of London and the University of Breslau. He joined the Nazi Party on April 1, 1932 and developed an import/export business, owned a coal mine, and was involved with several drug companies.

When the war broke out, he joined the SS and became an intelligence officer, working with the German branches of General Electric and Standard Oil. He was in charge of important funds that came through Nazi connections with Allen Dulles in the Schroeder Bank of New York. In 1945 he was contacted by the Army CIC and in 1947 was a member of the Gehlen organization. He came to the United States and got a job with Alfred Driscoll, former governor of New Jersey and president of Warner-Lambert drug company.

Later he joined the Transinternational Computer Investment Corporation (TCI) in Silicon Valley, California and became vice-president of the company. Reinhard Gehlen worked for TCI during the time he was helping Richard Nixon run for President.

MICHAEL PAINE

Those who studied the assassination of President Kennedy perhaps will recall that Lee Harvey Oswald's wife Marina was staying with Ruth Paine. On April 30, 1961, Oswald married Marina Pruskova in the Soviet Union. He wrote to U.S. Senator John Tower for help in returning to the United States, and it was granted. Remember, Oswald had denounced and left the United States, then he asked a U.S. Senator for help in returning, and got it! Why did he pick Tower to ask, and why did Tower help him? Tower took Lyndon Johnson's place in the Senate and later became head of the Armed Services Committee.

A special non-quota immigrant permit was issued for Oswald's wife. Oswald and Marina arrived in the U.S. on June 13, 1962 and went to Dallas. "He returned to Dallas on October 2, 1963, and was met by fellow CIA agents George de Mohrenschildt and Ruth and Michael Paine. Michael Paine worked for Nazi war criminal Gen. Walter Dornberger at Bell-Textron in Dallas" (Gritz, p. 529). Next page - "Most of Oswald's contacts in Dallas, in fact, were with persons hired by Dornberger."

The majority of people who testified about Oswald before the Warren Commission were carefully selected Dornberger associates. Gritz says of these very people: "Eastern European and Russian emigre groups supplied by Gehlen were the personnel initially trained for these missions at a special camp set up at Oberammergau in 1946, under the command of General Sikes and SS General Burckhardt, and with the assistance of Henry Kissinger and Lucius Clay. The camp held 5,000 anti-communist elements who were prepared there and called themselves "Special Forces" (p. 564).

This was the origin of the U.S. Army Special Forces and on the next page Gritz says: "Many of the remainder underwent special guerrilla training as Special Forces recruits at Fort Bragg, North Carolina and helped form the nucleus of the present-day Green Berets. They would later be quite at home at their first assignment - the SS Bad Tolz Flint Kaserne in the heart of the Bavarian Alps."

And on page 566 Gritz says: "Gehlen's immediate staff of about 350 agents, in fact, were brought en masse to the U.S. Army's Historical Division. Almost all resistance to using Nazi war criminals to accomplish the CIA's missions seemed to have been overcome by the time Allen Dulles became Director in 1953." The Nazi SS Death's Head insignia was adopted as the symbol of the U.S. Army Special Forces (p. 567).

CIA agent George de Mohrenschildt's boss in the CIA was George Bush. De Mohrenschildt had a close friend, John W. Mecom, who was one of the incorporators of the San Jacinto Fund which was used to launder Bush's drug money. ("Surreptitious Entry: The CIA's Operations in the United States," by Thomas B. Ross of the Chicago Sun Times in The CIA File, edited by Robert L. Borosage and John Marks (Viking, 1976), and quoted in *The Mafia, CIA &

George Bush* by Pete Brewton, p. 317.)

De Mohrenschildt had another friend, Jean de Menil, president of Schlumberger Corporation. Jim Garrison tells of Schlumberger being the source of weapons involved in anti-Castro operations and in Algeria. In 1977, hours after arranging to meet an investigator for the House Select Committee on Assassinations, de Mohrenschildt joined the long line of people involved in the Kennedy assassination who "committed suicide."

If you have the stomach to check into it, you will find that Presidents Johnson, Nixon, Reagan and Bush shot their way into the Presidency. And people keeping a list have identified over 30 people close to President Clinton who have been murdered or at least died under mysterious circumstances. If you count the wars, our Presidents have been responsible for the deaths of thousands of people. Tell me, friend, are you a Republican or a Democrat?

Oswald told a public stenographer that an "engineer" (Michael Paine) offered to publish a book about the Soviet Union for Oswald if he would write it. The Paines began to subsidize the Oswalds and later Mrs. Oswald moved in with the Paines, where she and Ruth chatted every day in Russian.

Lee Harvey Oswald then went to New Orleans and became involved with the "Fair Play For Cuba Committee." The head of that committed was a Jew named V.T. Lee, real name Tappin. Researchers of Lee Harvey Oswald must take into account the fact that there were several people claiming to be Oswald.

While living with the Paines, Oswald practiced shooting with a rifle he kept in their garage. Some say he took a pot-shot at General Walker at this time. In September, it was announced that President Kennedy would visit Dallas, and three weeks later Mrs. Paine called Mr. Truly, the manager of the Texas School Book Depository and got Oswald at job working there, under the name of "O.H. Lee." (New York Post, Dec. 10, 1963, p. 22.)

END OF PART 22.

PART 23:

MORE ASSASSINATION CONNECTIONS

Immediately after Kennedy was assassinated there were three main investigations launched - by the Texas Attorney General, the FBI, and the U.S. Congress. On Dec. 9, 1963, seventeen days after the assassination, the Communist Worker Newspaper demanded that the three investigations be stopped and that only Earl Warren do the investigation. Three days later, President Johnson ordered the three groups to stop and put Earl Warren in charge, exactly as the Communists had ordered.

Warren immediately began destroying evidence. While the other groups were finding information of multiple people involved, Arlen Specter came up with the "magic bullet" theory to explain what happened. No one else supported that theory except Gerald Ford, but that became the conclusion of the Warren Commission. Gerald Ford, whose real name was Leslie Lynch King (American Heritage Dictionary, 1979), in his book Portrait of the Assassin, page 51, tells about Lee Harvey Oswald being on the payroll of the American Red Cross while in Russia. The current head of the Red Cross is Elizabeth Dole, the wife of Senator Bob Dole. Specter has become prominent recently in the Waco and Ruby Ridge investigations, and is campaigning for President. Does it sound like maybe the Communists were behind the assassination of Kennedy? If only it were that simple! We need to pay attention to who and what these people are, as their names come up in all kinds of strange places.

Ruth Paine's husband Michael worked as an engineer at Bell Aerospace for the German ex-General Dornberger, head of research for Bell. Paine was part of the Gehlen operation.

Werner von Braun became a close personal friend of J. Edgar Hoover and soon after he came to the U.S. he also became a close personal friend of Lyndon B. Johnson. Von Braun worked with Hoover in security projects at the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Redstone Arsenal and later in the National Space Agency. In 1958 Lyndon Johnson, majority leader of the Senate, helped push through the National Space Act, which gave funding to von Braun.

The Navy and Air Force were in charge of the U.S. missile programs when Russia launched its Sputnik satellite in October of 1957. Two weeks later, they launched the much larger Sputnik II which carried a dog into space. The Russians had put a six-ton package into orbit, while two months later the Navy tried to launch a three-and-half-pound grapefruit-size satellite on their Vanguard missile. It rose a grand height of four feet and blew up, on national television. Eisenhower was reminded about the little-known bunch of Nazis at Huntsville, so he gave them the go-ahead. Less than two months later, the (ex) Nazis put America's first satellite, Explorer I, into orbit on January 31, 1958.

"Sputnik forced two space agendas on the United States, one public, the other top secret." (Burrows, William E., Deep Black - Space Espionage And National Security, Random House, 1986, p. 138.)

Reinhard Gehlen was head of the Nazi Abwehr spy organization during WW II, and at the end of the war he approached the OSS and offered to work for them, with his team and records. They accepted and brought many of his team into the U.S. under Projer Paperclip.

Gehlen remained chief of the West German Intelligence service until he retired in 1968. Frank Wisner, who worked for Allen Welsh Dulles, was a Wall Street lawyer who became head of Dulles' Secret Intelligence Branch and was responsible for the Gehlen organization. Working with Wisner were Harvard grad Harry Rositzke who worked in the same room with Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. and Richard Helms, who later became Director of the CIA in 1966.

One of Wisner's team was George Bookbinder, who later became President of the Rand Development Corporation. It was the Gehlen organization that dug the famous Berlin tunnel. They, especially the Rand Corporation, became good at digging tunnels (except they have not quite conquered that annoying "hum"!).

PEOPLE OF EARTH/SHAN

The book Air America says, during the Vietnam conflict, "An HQ was established in Singapore where Frank Wisner, the Deputy Director of Plans for the CIA, went personally to head the operation." (Robbins, Christopher, Air America, New York: Avon Books, 1979, p. 70).

Air America was the secret CIA airline involved in Operation Phoenix in the Vietnam war. One of the pilots was John Lear of UFO fame. The name Phoenix was a translation from the Phung Hoang, a mythical bird the Vietnamese said had magical powers to bring news of peace. The CIA bought drugs from Khun Sa, leader of the "Shan" people.

Bo Gritz, in Called To Serve, tells that Khun Sa tried to STOP the drug trade and was forced to continue by the Americans. On page 300, Gritz tells that President Reagan offered to recognize Shanland as a new and independent nation. I suppose it is "only coincidence" that the command ship ("flying saucer") of the ships involved with UFO legend Billy Meier was called the "Phoenix" and the extraterrestrials involved said that their name for Earth was "Shan."

The man in charge of the CIA Vietnam drug operation was Richard Armitage, who later became Assistant Secretary of Defense. Armitage shipped the drugs to Manuel Noriega in Panama, who shipped them to George Bush, head of the CIA and later President, at Bush's drug bases in Mena, Arkansas, Homestead Air Force Base in Florida, and through the Zapata and Black Rose and such Bush family operations.

Armitage had a best friend named Erich von Marbod, also a Gehlen Organization person and a friend of Bo Gritz. At the end of the war in Vietnam, "he [Armitage] and Erich secreted tons of munitions in strategic caches around Southeast Asia. Erich's friends read like a global Who's Who. He was a best friend to the Shah of Iran. He is also very close to James Schlesinger, who was appointed Director of the CIA by Richard Nixon in December 1972. Schlesinger later became Secretary of Defense from 1973-1975 and Secretary of the Department of Energy from 1977-1979" (Gritz, p. 300). Erich "...was a protege of Henry Kissinger."

NIXON, BUSH & DONOVAN

On page 572 of his book, Gritz says: "The Indonesian campaign marked the entry of the CIA into large-scale operations, and although it was a failure, the more the Agency failed in the future, the more it grew and prospered. Oddly enough, the man who had helped back Dulles and Frank Wisner [remember, Wisner was over Gehlen's Nazi spy network] on the campaign was Richard Nixon."

In 1969, Richard Nixon was in California campaigning and one of his campaign supporters was Reinhard Gehlen, former Nazi head of the German Secret Service (Abwehr). Gehlen was with a high-tech firm called TCI (Transinternational Computer Investment Corp.) that worked on classified Defense Department projects. His translator for German projects was Helene von Damme, who was also Governor Ronald Reagan's personal appointments secretary and personal secretary to Reagan when he became President. Von Damme later became U.S. Ambassador to Austria. Von Damme was former secretary to the Nazi German High Command.

William Donovan, head of OSS, and Allen Dulles, head of OSS in Europe under Donovan (who later became head of the CIA until President Kennedy fired him - it was said that he told Kennedy, "You can't fire me, you don't even know who I work for!"), and J. Edgar Hoover, head of the FBI, brought Reinhard Gehlen and his Abwehr spy group into the United States. One of the men involved was counter-intelligence officer William P. Clark. Clark married Werner von Braun's niece, Joan von Braun (Brauner). Clark at one time was a member of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Clark moved to San Luis Obispo in California and joined Ronald Reagan. He became President Reagan's National Security Advisor on the National Security Council. A suit was filed in Southern California naming William Clark as being involved in the Kennedy assassination. Researchers Mae Brussell, William Torbitt, District Attorney Garrison, and others say Lyndon Johnson, J. Edgar Hoover, Werner von Braun, and Walter Dornberger were involved in the Kennedy assassination. Also involved were Richard Nixon, George Bush and Allen Dulles.

Col. Bo Gritz, in Called To Serve (p. 534), quotes a memo written by an FBI staff assistant in 1947: "Nixon intervened on behalf of a Chicago gangster who was about to be called as a witness before a congressional committee... It is my sworn statement that one Jack Rubinstein of Chicago, noted as a potential witness for hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, is performing information functions for the staff of Congressman Richard Nixon, Republican of California. It is requested Rubinstein not be called for open testimony in the aforementioned hearings. That same year Rubinstein moved to Dallas, Texas, and changed his name to JACK RUBY..."

Sam Giancana bragged that Nixon was controlled by the "Mob," see the book Double Cross written by his brother.

GEHLEN AND THE GERMAN GENERAL STAFF

Dick Russell in The Man Who Knew Too Much is one of the researchers with many details of the involvement of Nixon, Bush, and Dulles and said, "Willoughby was in regular correspondence with Allen Dulles - before JFK fired Dulles - and with ex(?) Nazis who ran the CIA's European-based spy network" (p. 707).

Gehlen was responsible for reviving the Nazi German General Staff after the war by placing his agent Adolph Heusinger in charge of the German General Staff. Der Spiegel said: "It is quite true that General Gehlen had engaged the former Chief of Wehrmacht Opertions for a purpose other than his espionage service. The West German spy boss did not at that time think of confining himself to merely collecting and sifting information. Two years before Adenauer offered soldiers to the Allies, General Gehlen was, with General Heusinger, already engaged in assembling a new general staff high command." (Der Spiegel, Feb. 29, 1956.)

The Heusinger Wehrmacht were involved in the space race (remember, it was the Germans who started rockets, "flying saucers," etc.). The book Heusinger of the Fourth Reich by Charles R. Allen, Jr., said: "The conservative columnist Edgar Ansel Mower on September 28, 1962 reported that the West German newspaper Die Welt of Hamburg devoted a lengthy series to the vigorous efforts being made by the West German Defense Ministry to perfect 'death rays' (LASERS) which, when fired from a space platform, 'WOULD BURN, VAPORIZE, DESTROY ANY KNOWN MATTER AND MATERIAL BY ITS FANTASTIC ENERGY CONCENTRATION OF MILLIONS OF WATTS and, from the DISTANCE OF THE MOON, WOULD TAKE EXACTLY 1.3 SECONDS TO KILL." (Long Island Daily Press, September 28, 1962). Note they were talking, in 1962, of lasers from a Moon base.

WILLIAM CLARK

Paperclip Operation member William Clark was one who pressured to pardon Ollie North. Clark has a ranch in California called the "Eagles Nest." There was (is?) a machine gun in Clark's living room which came from a National Guard Armory robbery in Oxnard, California. The rest of the weapons from the robbery were stored at a hideout at the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Texas. When "they" wanted "their" guns back, David Koresh did not want to give them back. Oh, friends, why don't you check up on your leaders?! Why waste your time on soap operas, when the real thing is so much more "interesting"?!

As another interesting "coincidence," not that our present Jewish Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. John Shalikashvili (who succeeded the part-Jewish, part black CFR member Gen. Colin Powell) speaks English with a foreign accent and was born in Soviet Georgia. The media has reported that his father was a major in the Nazi Waffen SS. In spite of this, he is the darling of the Zionists, with strong support from Les Aspin, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Senator Carl Levin, etc.

When Reagan became Governor of California, he appointed William Clark as Superior Court Judge in San Luis Obispo County. Later Reagan appointed him Deputy Secretary of State. When James Watt resigned as Secretary of the Interior, William Clark replaced him. Reagan appointed Clark's wife Joan Brauner (von Braun) Clark as alternate United States representative to the United Nations General Assembly.

Ray Renick says: "The American headquarters of the Gehlen Organization is in San Luis Obispo County. The main office is called "Eagles Nest." Many public officials, judges, supervisors and law enforcement personnel are personal friends and business associates (in drug trafficking, no less) with the Gehlen Organization and "Eagles Nest." Judge William P. Clark and Mrs. Joan Clark (nee von Braun, Brauner) are the executives behind the Gehlen Organization, "Eagles Nest" and the Zapata Cattle Company's drug trafficking interest. [The cattle are brought in from Mexico. Cattle have four stomachs.] Ronald Reagan is a slient partner in the San Luis Obispo cattle/drug business. Remember, Clark was one of the original architects of "Project Paperclip"! The Zapata Cattle Company is affiliated with George Bush's Zapata Oil Company of Houston, Texas (REF: "The SLO Connection," Barrons article "The Mexican Connection") - Sept. 19, 1988.

A major law firm for the Gehlen Organization is Sinsheimer, Schiebelhut, and Baggett.

The Gehlen Organization, copying Hitler's New Order, established a concentration camp system in San Luis Obispo County. It was called the California Specialized Training Institute. It developed plans called the King Alfred Plan, Operation Cable Splitter, Operation Garden Plot, and REX-84 and was later renamed as the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). You can get more information on these subjects from Militia of Montana, Bo Gritz, Spotlight Newspaper, etc.

Also brought in under Paperclip was Henry Kissinger. The U.S. Army 44th CIC and 970th CIC Detachments negotiated the surrender of the German Army in Northern Italy and Austria in Operation Sunrise from which Paperclip took over. Later the Vatican provided documents and help for many Nazis to escape to South America, including Martin Bormann.

Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands created a group that became known as the Bilderbergers. Many "conservative" researchers have come to recognize the Bilderbergers as an important force for the "New World Order." What they probably don't know, though, is that Bernhard was a former Nazi SS storm trooper.

Some of the Paperclip surrender operation personnel included Theodore Shackley and Heide Kingsbury (daughter of General Galland, designer of the Messerschmidt ME 262). Kingbury became secretary and court transcriber to Judge William Clark. Shackley became head of Operation Phoenix in Vietnam (Laos). Shackley was head of JM Wave, code name of the CIA Miami office during the Bay of Pigs and Kennedy assassination events (Furiati, p. 41). (Furiati, Claudia, ZR Rifle - The Plot To Kill Kennedy And Castro, Ocean Press, Victoria, Australia, 1994. From declassified Cuban records of the Kennedy assassination.)

For more information see Reinhard Gehlen, Master Spy (I can't find my copy at the moment and don't remember the author). In 1968, after the Kennedy assassination, Gehlen retired to his chalet in Bavaria. The chalet was a gift from Allen Dulles. The General Was A Spy by Heinz Hohne and Hermann Zolling,, Project Paperclip by Clarence Lasby, Shootdown by R.W. Johnson (tells about Clark's involvement in the shootdown of Korean Airlines 007), Project Paperclip by Ray Renick, and the Torbitt Document by William Torbitt are all resources for more information. The most accurate source of information for a general overview are the Phoenix Journals and CONTACT newspaper.

PART 24:

GERMAN SCIENTISTS AND ALIENS

Here is something you should think seriously about. The ONE thing that "everybody" agrees on. Christians, atheists, Republicans, Democrats, Communists, whatever, is that the Nazis were degenerate, sick, nuts, weird, the ultimate evil. I ask you: realistically, how can this be?

Is it possible that this is another "lie?" You ask, am I saying the Nazis were not evil? What is your definition of evil? Does the evidence support what you believe? How can a whole nation of Germans - many of them our brothers and sisters and direct ancestors - all be totally evil? Were they that different from us? Was our government telling us the truth? Has the government ever told us the truth about ANYTHING?

Let's go back to Werner von Braun. IN 1959, (in News Europa, Jan. 1, 1959), von Braun states this about extraterrestrials in an interview: "We find ourselves faced by powers which are far stronger than we had hitherto assumed, and whose base of operations is at present unknown to us" (when asked about the deflection of a U.S. satellite). "More I cannot say at present. We are now engaged in entering into a closer contact with those powers, and in six or nine months' time it may be possible to speak with more precision on the matter."

The great German space pioneer Hermann Oberth said, "We cannot take credit for our record advancement in certain scientific fields alone; we have been helped." When asked who helped, he said: "The people of other worlds." (Robin Collyns, Did Spacemen Colonize the Earth? London: Pelham Books, 1974, p. 236.)

Noted German rocket expert Dr. Walter Riedel said: "I'm convinced that saucers have an out-of-world basis." (April, 1952, LIFE magazine, p. 96.)

The American Weekly of October 24, 1954, quoted Professor Oberth of Germany: "It is my thesis that flying saucers are real and that they are space ships from another solar system."

General Douglas MacArthur, quoted in the The New York Times, Oct. 8, 1955, said "The nations of the world will have to unite - for the next war will be an interplanetary war. The nations of the Earth must someday make a common front against attack by people from other planets."

There is plenty of proof that "flying saucers" are real. The questions now are, what are they, and from where do they come?

NICAP

The National Investigations Committee On Aerial Phenomena (NICAP) was founded in 1956 by Navy physicist Thomas Townsend Brown. Brown is known as the discoverer of the electrogravitic capacitance effect. He was former Vice President of Douglas Aircraft (one of the founding groups of the RAND Corporation). NICAP gained a reputation as being a CIA front operation. For many years it was headed by Marine Major Donald Keyhoe.

In Der Weltraum Rueckt Uns Nagher, Blanvalet Verlag, Chapter III, by; Major Keyhoe, he says that the U.S. infiltrated 600 scientists into Bohemia in tank crew uniforms, in 1945, to check out some of the U.F.O. bases. Vice-Admiral Roscoe Hillenkoetter, a former director of the CIA, was a board member of NICAP for years.

Colonel Joseph Bryan III, chief of the CIA psychological warfare staff and Count Nicolas de Rochefort of the same CIA staff were board members. Karl Pflock was chairman of NICAP's Washington sub-committee. John Acuff "who was alleged to have CIA affiliations" per the UFO Encyclopedia by John Spencer, took over as head of NICAP. Then Acuff did a curious thing, according to Cosmic Patriot Files, Vol. 2, by the "Committed of 12 to Save the Earth,"* edited by Commander X, p. 137, Acuff sold classified CIA documents to a Nazi organization in Canada called Samisdat.

Samisdat is the publisher of two books called UFOs, Nazi Secret Weapon? by Mattern-Friedrich and Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions by Christof Friedrich, both of which were available from Samisdat Publishers, 206 Carlton St., Toronto, ONT., M5A 2L1, Canada, or from Liberty Bell Publications, Reedy, WV, 25270.

A video called UFO Secrets of WW II German Flying Saucers and one called UFO Secrets of the Third Reich, both produced by the American Academy of Dissident Scientists, are available and a phone number from the tapes is: 310-473-9717. (American Academy of Dissident Scientists, 10970 Ashton Ave. #310, Los Angeles, CA 90024. One of their Presidents is Vladimir Terziski.

Acuff was kicked out and replaced by CIA agent Alan Hall in 1979. Christof Friedrich campaigned to become Prime Minister of Canada. A Jewish radio announcer interviewed Friedrich to try to discredit him, but the result was the firing, blacklisting, and subsequent persecution of the Jewish moderator.

Cosmic Patriot Files (currently available from ads in UFO publications and most UFO book dealers) says in Vol. 2, p. 131 that in 1945 the Germans began transferring their flying saucer projects to a secret underground base near the South Pole. Also in 1945, General Hans Kammler disappeared from Germany and went to the South Pole on German U-Boat U-977, and German flying saucers began appearing over the United States.

Samisdat was selling a manuscript called "The Lightning & the Sun" by Savitri Devi, a "guru" from India whose book connected roots of Naziism with the pyramid in Egypt and Pharoah Akhn-aton and the "ancient cult of the Sun."

Willard McIntyre, a friend of Stuart Nixon, who was the assistant to NICAP President John (Jack) Acuff, accused Acuff of selling the material to Samisdat and of intending to merge Samisdat and NICAP. One NICAP board member, the Jewish Senator Barry Goldwater, was quite upset upon learning about the involvement with Samisdat, considered a Nazi organization.

Goldwater was busy running for President and no doubt would not appreciate the link to Nazis and UFOs. The head of his Presidential Campaign Committee was someone you have perhaps heard of, named Ronald Reagan. Goldwater was Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee. He tried to obtain entrance to the infamous Hangar 18 at Wright-Patterson and was denied. There was more going on with this situation than we are allowed to know.

Anyway, Acuff had to go and was forced out. A new board was voted in which included two new board members: one was Senator Goldwater's aide, Charles Lombard, and the other was John Fisher. If you recall, in the early Fire From The Sky writings, I said that General George Keegan, head of Air Force Intelligence, inspired the founding of the American Security Council to try to warn the American public of what was happening. The President of the American Security Council was - did you guess it? - John Fisher. A Co-Chairman of the Council was Senator Robert Dole. The members of this council did not understand who was the real enemy, and they were sabotaged.

"NICAP continued to have confidential UFO data leaked to it during Acuff's tenure. Late in 1976, for example, an officer in the Pentagon provided Acuff with copies of a number of classified documents, including the now-famous Iranian report and several other 'hot' reports." This had to be stopped, so Acuff was canned and retired CIA agent Alan Hall was brought in to replace him. "Not much is known about Hall's background, except he evidently worked in some technical capacity - perhaps with the Office of Scientific Intelligence..." My-Oh-My. What tangled webs.

THEN CAME 1947

The famous Roswell crash occurred in 1947. That year, Operation Majestic-12 was supposedly established by Truman to control the UFO situation, the National Security Act was passed, Project SIGN was established at Wright-Patterson and the CIA was established. Admiral James Forrestal was soon appointed Secretary of Defense, later to be murdered when he was tossed out of a hospital window by CIA agents, because he wanted to tell about the flying saucers.

The Roswell, New Mexico, crash of a flying saucer in 1947 has been described by the government as nothing but a weather balloon. Yet, an investigation by the Government Accounting Office and others has shown that all records pertaining to this event were illegally destroyed.

Another strange thing about this event is that the government must have released HUNDREDS of these "weather balloons" in 1947 - or - perhaps they were not weather balloons? A file in the MUFON computer bulletin board called 1947.SIT lists the reported sightings of UFOs during 1947, sorted by state. There were 853 events and 3283 witnesses reported. How many more were not reported? Quite a lot of "weather balloons," don't you think?

In 1951, Congress was talking about turning Antarctica into a nuclear test area, but suddenly changed their mind when Washington was buzzed by UFOs and pictures of flying saucers over the White House appeared on the front pages of newspapers.

ANTARCTICA

In early 1980, I received the following letter from Christof Friedrich of Samisdat, written in 1979, the same year John Acuff was kicked out of NICAP for selling classified CIA documents to Samisdat. As it is too long, I will quote only part of it.

"SEARCH FOR HITLER'S ANTARCTIC U.F.O. BASES. Due to an overwhelming number of letters and telephone calls requesting details about our new books, new products, speaking tours, psychic research projects and our intensive experimental UFO-construction programs, we have to use this less personal form of keeping in touch with our many friends and collaborators around the world.

"Your response to our most recent mailout and activities has been most encouraging! We have received orders and enquiries from as far away as Nomea in the South Pacific, Easter Island, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Venezuela, Panama, Mexico, Soviet Satellite countries, China, South Africa, Persia, the Congo, Australia, Japan, as well as from every country in Western Europe and almost every state in the U.S.A.

Not only is this response extensive, it is massive - a clear indication on the part of knowledgeable UFO researchers and members of the public that they are tired of the 'junk food' being served up by old-line UFO groups and publications who expound the official CIA-KGB alibi that all UFOs are extraterrestrial. What the UFO-watching world wants now is the real meat of the matter - a serious investigation of UFOs whose origins are terrestrial. SAMISDAT is the only organization making such an effort, but we are not alone, for we have thousands of supporters like yourself who want to know the truth which the saucer-charlatans have for 30 years tried to cover up with fairy tale fantasies of 'little green men.' It is people like yourself who have made SAMISDAT the most active UFO organization and publisher on Planet Earth!

[I want to insert a question to readers who consider themselves serious UFO researchers. Have you ever heard of Samisdat? That's what I thought. Continuing:]

"Certainly we can be proud of this achievement which is the result, not only of our own Herculean efforts and sacrifices, but of your faithful support during this 5-year-long struggle against the forces of vested interest, deceit and prejudice which have attempted to hide the UFO story under a cloak of childish nonsense and outright lies.

For many years we have determinedly pursued this new course of investigation, firm in the knowledge that man is able to achieve that which he perceives. Our researchers' keen sense of direction and perception has guided them unerringly in their discovery of seemingly insignificant clues and the derivation of meaningful patterns therefore. Only such devoted and painstaking research could succeed in unEarthing the present array of facts which indicate the Earthly origin of most flying saucers. As one vital discovery has led to another, we have reached certain conclusions which are logical and inescapable, however unpopular they may be today.

"Our discoveries have led us into the production of a number of currently suppressed and sometimes vilified books which are now underground best-sellers. UFOS - NAZI SECRET WEAPON? was our first title, now sold out in five complete editions. Our second book, SECRET NAZI POLAR EXPEDITIONS, is coming up fast and has sold out two full editions. Foreign language translations of these books are selling briskly, and it is becoming obvious to everyone that the media-enforced blockage of the truth has now been broken. Three additional books are currently under production and these will round out our Phase I Publishing Program: THE CIA-KGB-UFO COVERUP, THE ANTARCTICA THEORY and THE LAST BATTALION.

"During the course of our research, we have discovered some of the original German flying saucer scientists who are still alive! These space pioneers are, of course, old men now in their 70s and 80s. Our interviews with them will be incorporated into our regular lecture program as well as into our future books.

"We have also been able to establish research teams in Canada, the U.S.A. and in particular, Germany, whose task it is to rediscover basic principles of wingless flight which brought the original Nazi UFOs into being. Already, these teams have designed and constructed small scale models, some using conventional power and others which have propulsion systems unprecedented in today's aerospace technology. With additional research, we hope to make available several different models in kit form for hobby-builders." END OF QUOTE.

ADMIRAL BYRD AND OPERATION HIGHJUMP

Also in 1947, Admiral Richard E. Byrd led 4,000 military troops from the U.S., Britain and Australia in an invasion of Antarctica (Operation Highjump and follow-up), but encountered heavy resistance from Nazi flying saucers and had to call off the invasion. A Rear-Admiral who was in that invasion has retired in Texas, and said he was shocked when he read the Fire From The Sky material. He knew there were a lot of aircraft and rocket shoot-downs but did not realize the situation was so bad.

The invasion of ANTARCTICA consisted of three battle groups from Norfolk, VA, on Dec. 2, 1946. They were led by Byrd's command ship, the ice-breaker Northwind, and consisted of the catapult ship Pine Island, the destroyer Brownsen, the aircraft-carrier Phillipines Sea, the U.S. submarine Sennet, two support vessels Yankee and Merrick, and two tankers Canisted and Capacan, the destroyer Henderson and a floatplane ship Currituck. A British-Norwegian force and a Russian force, and I believe some Australian and Canadian forces were also involved.

On March 5, 1947 the El Mercurio newspaper of Santiago, Chile, had a headline article "On Board the Mount Olympus on the High Seas" which quoted Byrd in an interview with Lee van Atta: "Adm. Byrd declared today that it was imperative for the United States to initiate immediate defence measures against hostile regions. The admiral further stated that he didn't want to frighten anyone unduly but that it was a bitter reality that in case of a new war the continental United States would be attacked by flying objects which could fly from pole to pole at incredible speeds. (Earlier he had recommended defence bases at the North Pole.) Admiral Byrd repeated the above points of view, resulting from his personal knowledge gathered both at the north and south poles, before a news conference held for International News Service."

When Byrd returned to the States, he was hospitalized and was not allowed to hold any more press conferences. In March 1955, he was placed in charge of Operation Deepfreeze which was part of the International Geophysical Year (1957-1958) exploration of the Antarctic. He died, some have suggested he was murdered, in 1957. UFO researchers are familiar with a diary purported to be Admiral Byrd's diary which tells of an entrance to a hollow Earth at the poles and a being called THE MASTER. The diary is generally considered to be a hoax, but even if it is a hoax, it is an indication that there was SOMETHING going on upon which to build the hoax.

UFO researchers are also aware of strange sightings of flying saucers with swastikas or iron crosses on them, "aliens" speaking German, etc. An example is the American Reinhold Schmidt, whose father was born in Germany, who tells in his book Incident At Kearney (Nebraska) that he was taken on a flying saucer on several occasions. He said the crew spoke German and acted like German soldiers. He said they took him to the Polar region (if someone were making up a story, why would they claim to be taken, of all places, to the pole?)

After returning he was subjected to persecution by the U.S. Government. His description of the flying saucers matched pictures captured from the Germans. In 1959, three large newspapers in Chile reported front page articles about UFO encounters where the crew members appeared to be German soldiers. IN the 1960s there were reports in New York and New Jersey of flying saucer "aliens" who spoke German, or English with a German accent.

In the Julius and Ethel Rosenberg atomic espionage trials, they spoke of "warships of space." Since they had access to top secret information, about what were they talking?

END OF PART 24.

PART 25:

HITLER ESCAPED!

I remember hearing, in the 1950s, rumors that Hitler had escaped to a secret Nazi base at the South Pole. In 1952, Dwight D. Eisenhower said: "We have been unable to unearth one bit of tangible evidence of Hitler's death. Many people believe that Hitler escaped from Berlin."

When President Truman asked Joseph Stalin at the Potsdam conference in 1945 whether or not Hitler was dead, Stalin replied bluntly, "No." Stalin's top army officer, Marshall Gregory Zhukov, whose troops were the ones to occupy Berlin, flatly stated after a long thorough investigation in 1945: "We have found no corpse that could be Hitler's."

The chief of the U.S. trial counsel at Nuremburg, Thomas J. Dodd, said: "No one can say he is dead." Major General Floyd Parks, who was commanding general of the U.S. sector in Berlin, stated for publication that he had been present when Marshall Zhukov described his entrance to Berlin, and Zhukov stated he believed Hitler might have escaped. Lt. Gen. Bedell Smith, Chief of Staff to Gen. Eisenhower in the European invasion and later Director of the CIA, stated publicly on Oct. 12, 1945, "No human being can say conclusively that Hitler is dead."

Col. W.J. Heimlich, former Chief, United States Intelligence, at Berlin, stated for publication that he was in charge of determining what had happened to Hitler and after a thorough investigation his report was: "There was no evidence beyond that of hearsay to support the theory of Hitler's suicide." He also stated, "On the basis of present evidence, no insurance company in America would pay a claim on Adolph Hitler."

Nuremburg judge Michael Mussmanno said in his book Ten Days to Die, "Russia must accept much of the blame (to the extent that it still exists) that Hitler did not die in May 1945." However, Mussmanno stated that he interviewed Hitler's personal waiter, his valet, his chauffeur, his two secretaries, pilots, top generals, etc., and they all agreed perfectly that Hitler committed suicide. He said they could not have gotten together afterward and made up a story that agreed in perfect detail without one flaw anywhere, so they must be telling the truth and he was absolutely convinced that Hitler committed suicide. The story at first sounds convincing, until you realized that they could have memorized a story BEFOREHAND and these were all people who almost WORSHIPPED Hitler. Do witnesses ever agree perfectly in detail in real life?

Former Secretary of State Jimmy Byrnes in his book Frankly Speaking (as quoted in the April 1948 The Cross and The Flag): "While in Potsdam at the Conference of the Big Four, Stalin left his chair, came over and clinked his liquor glass with mine in a very friendly manner. I said to him: 'Marshal Stalin, what is your theory about the death of Hitler?' Stalin replied: "He is not dead. He escaped either to Spain or Argentina.'"

I still have the September, 1948, issue of a magazine called The Plain Truth with the headline article: "IS HITLER ALIVE, OR DEAD?," subtitled: "Here is summarized the conclusions of an exhaustive three-year investigation - together with reasons for believing Hitler may be alive and secretly planning the biggest hoax of all history."

Another article in November, 1949, says "The Nazis went underground, May 16, 1943!" and details a meeting at the residence of Krupp von Bohlen-Halbach, the head of I.G. Farben, etc., at which they planned "for World War III."

Another article in August, 1952, entitled "HITLER DID NOT DIE," subtitled "Adolph Hitler's fake suicide in his Berlin Bunker now is exposed as History's greatest hoax! Positive evidence comes to light that Hitler did not die - here's new evidence that Hitler is alive, directing Nazi underground, today!"

The June, 1952, issue of The Plain Truth is headlined: "HITLER May Be Alive!" The article states: "Now, NEW FACTS, or purported facts, leak out. It's reported now that in 1940 the Nazis started to amass tractors, planes, sledges, gliders, and all sorts of machinery and materials IN THE SOUTH POLAR REGIONS - that for the next 4 years Nazi technicians built, on an almost unknown CONTINENT, Antarctica, the Fuhrer's SHANGRILA - a new Berchtesgaden.

The report says they scooped out an entire mountain, built a new refuge completely camouflaged - a magic mountain hide-a-way. The recently discovered continent is larger than Europe - 5,600 miles from Africa, 1,900 miles from the southern tip of South America, 4,800 miles from Australia.

It is NOT a mere ice-covered surface, but a real continent, with plains, valleys, mountain peaks up to 15,000 feet. The temperature in the interior is around zero (?) in the summer, and never drops below 20 or 30 degrees below in the winter. In other words, it is not as cold as in parts of North Dakota or Canada."

Bonjour magazine, the Police Gazette, and the Paris newspaper Le Monde all had articles about Hitler's South Pole hideaway. Admiral Doenitz, in 1943, stated, "The German submarine fleet has even now established an earthly paradise, an impregnable fortress, for the Fuhrer, in whatever part of the world." Although he did not specify where the exact location was, Bonjour pointed out that in 1940 Nazi engineers had begun construction of buildings that were to withstand temperatures to 60 degrees below zero.

There have been strong rumors, from the end of the War, that Hitler escaped to the South Pole. Yet, most people simply REFUSE to believe the evidence, the idea that Hitler survived the war is just unacceptable! It is too upsetting to too many people!

There is plenty of PROOF that the Americans and Russians LIED about what happened to Hitler, and there are strong rumors that he escaped to Antarctica. There is ample proof that a major group of Nazis escaped to Argentina. What do YOU think? Why did Admiral Byrd lead an invasion to Antarctica, and why the extreme secrecy about the whole situation?

In 1981, Donald McKale wrote Hitler: The Survival Myth to try to lay to rest the questions about what happened to Hitler. The flyleaf says: "In this book a distinguished historian examines the postwar world's most absorbing and persistent mystery, revealing why it has endured and where the mystery leads" (emphasis mine). The back flyleaf says "Absolute certainty about what happened still eludes us today."

Just recently on TV there are STILL programs telling "at last, the final, once and for all, this is the real story" about what happened to Hitler, yet they all do not really answer the question. A recent TV program, called "What Really Happened to Adolph Hitler," after investigating numerous stories, ends by saying that, in spite of Glasnost and the new freedom of access to Russian files, the files on Hitler are still some of the most highly classified items of the Soviets.

The Diario Illustrado of Santiago, Chile, January 18, 1948 issue, said: "On 30th of April, 1945, Berlin was in dissolution but little of that dissolution was evident at Templehof Airfield. At 4:15 p.m. at JU52 landed and S.S. troops directly from Rechlin for the defence of Berlin disembarked, all of them young, not older than 18 years.

The gunner in the particular plane was an engineer by the name of B... whom I had known for a number of years and for whom I had endeavored to get exemption from military service. He sought to tank up and leave Berlin as quickly as possible. During this re-fueling interval Mr. B... was suddenly elbowed in the ribs by his radio operator with a nod to look in a certain direction.

At about 100-120 meters he saw a sleek Messerschmitt Jet Model 332 [an editorial comment says this should be an ARADO 234]. Br. B.. and the radio operator saw, and without any doubt whatsoever, standing in front of the jet, their Commander in Chief, Adolf Hitler, dressed in field-grey uniform and gesticulating animatedly with some Party functionaries, who were obviously seeing him off.

For about ten minutes whilst their plane was being refuelled the two men observed this scene and around 4:30 p.m. they took to the air again. They were extremely astonished to hear during the midnight military news bulletin, some seven and a half hours later, that Hitler had committed suicide."

On a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation program called As It Happens, September 17th, 1974 at 7:15 p.m., a Prof. Dr. Ryder Saguenay, oral surgeon from the Dental Faculty of the University of California at Los Angeles, said that Hitler had ordered a special plane to leave from Berlin with all medical and dental records, especially X-rays, of all top Nazis for an unknown destination. He said that the dental records used to identify Hitler's body were drawn from MEMORY by a dental assistant, who disappeared and was never found.

An editorial in Zig Zag, Santiago, Chile, January 16, 1948, states that on April 30th, 1945, Flight Captain Peter Baumgart took Adolf Hitler, his wife Eva Braun, as well as a few loyal friends by plane from Tempelhof Airport to Tondern in Denmark (still German controlled). From Tondern, they took another plane to Kristiansund in Norway (also German controlled). From there they joined a submarine convoy. (U.F.O. Letzte Geheimwaffe des III Reiches, Mattern, pp. 50-51.)

The Jewish writer Michael Bar-Zohar in The Avengers, p. 99, said: "In 1943 Admiral Doenitz had declared: 'The German U-boat fleet is proud to have made an earthly paradise, an impregnable fortress for the Fuhrer, somewhere in the world.' He did not say in what part of the world it existed, but fairly obviously it was in South America."

The German writer Mattern said that Admiral Doenitz told a graduating class of naval cadets in Kiel in 1944: "The German Navy has still a great role to play in the future. The German Navy knows all hiding places for the Navy to take the Fuhrer to, should the need arise. There he can prepare his last measures in complete quiet."

The Germans say they were in contact with extraterrestrials. Now consider what Ronald Reagan, who was involved with the formerly Nazi Gehlen spy organization, said to Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev at the November 1985 Geneva summit conference: He told him, "How much easier your task and mine might be in these meetings that we held if suddenly there was a threat to this world from another species from another planet outside in the universe. We'd forget all the little local differences that we have between our countries, and we would find out once and for all that we really are all human beings here on this earth together." (International Herald Tribune and Daily Telegraph, 5 Dec. 1985.)

On September 21, 1987, Reagan spoke before the General Assembly of the United Nations and said: "I occasionally think, how quickly our differences worldwide would vanish if we were facing an alien threat from outside this world. And yet I ask, is not an alien force already among us?"

On May 4, 1988, at Chicago's Palmer House Hotel, Reagan said: "I've often wondered, what if all of us in the world discovered that we were threatened by an outer... a power from outer space, from another planet."

You of course have heard about Reagan's Star Wars program. If you study what was reported after the Gulf War about the Patriot missiles, you will find that the Patriot missile program and the Star Wars program were a big lie and the money was spent on something other than what we were told. The Patriot missiles never shot down a Scud, as learned by Congressional inquiry and reported by Israel.

There are so many facets to this story, it is hard to explain one part because it will not make sense unless you understand the other parts.

END OF PART 25.

PART 26:

POLAR DEFENSES

One thing that Admiral Byrd stated in a press conference after his defeat at Antarctica was that the Antarctic continent should be surrounded by a "wall of defence installations since it represented the last line of defence for America." Although the U.S. and Russia had been allies during the war, suddenly the "Iron Curtain" was created and we and the Russians became enemies.

Both the Soviets and the United States ringed the poles with defense and detection bases, and in between was the barren no-man's-land of the poles where absolutely nobody lived, or did they? Could it be that we pretended we were protecting against the Russians and they pretended they were protecting against us, while really we and they were both scared of what was in between us - the Nazi Last Battalion?

UFO researchers should now begin to see the light of why the Navy has always been in the lead of UFO research. And you should now understand why, right from the beginning, they issued shoot-to-kill orders against any UFOs and why the situation was so highly classified! And anti-communist researchers have more clues now as to why we were giving aid to the Soviets at the same time we were calling them our enemies!

UFOs - NAZIS OR ALIENS?

Let me be sure you understand, though, that NOT ALL UFOs ARE NAZIS. Originally they were Nazi with some alien. Later the U.S. developed UFOs, and the Russians, and who knows who else. But all along there really were extraterrestrials, that is from where some of the technology originally came. Read the lives of Walter Russell, Nikola Tesla, the world's most advanced mathematician Ramanujan, etc., and they all say they were in contact with "gods" (The Goddess Namagiri, in the case of Ramanujan) or they had "enlightenment" from a "cosmic messenger" as in the case of Walter Russell. Russell is one who understood true physics, as opposed to the deceptions taught in modern physics.

RUSSIAN SPACE PROGRAM

Let's return to the origin of the Russian space program. The Russians also captured many German rocket and space scientists. Later the chief Russian physicist was Kapitsa, who once headed an atomic research laboratory at Cambridge University. (Assault on the Unknown, The International Geophysical Year by Walter Sullivan, McGraw-Hill Book Co., New York, p. 56. Part of the IGY explorations were covers for secret investigations into the Nazi UFO base at Antarctica, see books referenced elsewhere.) The Russians were successful in their endeavors and in 1972, at a meeting of Communist leaders in Prague, Brezhnev stated that the Soviets would be able to dominate the world by 1985. He specifically stated they would control the oceans, 90% of the land, and the air and space. He said they would control, not invade and conquer.

In 1974, the construction of the Tara directed-energy facility at Saryshagan was begun.

In 1975, a Soviet article in International Life talks about weather war, changing the nature of lightning, increasing the power of lightning, and using directed energy of tremendous power at specific targets. It tells of using "atmospheric electricity" to suppress mental activity of large groups of people.

On June 13, 1975 - he repeated his call for a ban on doomsday weapons to visiting U.S. Senators. They could not understand what he was talking about.

In August 1975 - Ponomarev made the same proposal to a group of U.S. congressmen visiting the Kremlin, same result.

In November of 1975 - large amounts of hydrogen gas with traces of tritium were detected at Semipalatinsk by U.S. Air Force TRW reconnaissance satellites. General George Keegan had been paying special attention to this facility ever since one of his men warned him of something "fishy" there in 1972. This was evidence confirming his suspicions of Soviet particle beam research.

In October-December of 1975 - the Soviets destroyed at least five U.S. satellites over the Indian Ocean.

In 1976 - the State Department revealed that the U.S. Embassy in Moscow had been continuously under some sort of microwave radiation attack from the Soviets. Two ambassadors were killed, other people got sick. All Embassy employees were given a 20% hazardous duty pay increase.

In 1976 - Soviet nuclear physicist Rudakov visited the U.S., and gave a talk which was immediately classified and the blackboard ripped down and carried away. Material which was open public scientific material in the USSR was considered classified here in the U.S. Who was being kept in the dark?

March 30, 1976 - a huge unexplained boom occurred over the Netherlands. Probable Soviet scalar howitzer test.

July 4, 1976 - Independence Day! Russia joined our celebrations by activating its giant Woodpecker transmitters causing worldwide interference in all frequencies from 3 to 30 MHz. Transmissions have been continuous ever since. Later the U.S. government said these were merely Russian over-the-horizon radar.

September 10, 1976 - European Airways Flight 831, Moscow to London, saw a huge blinding ball of light below them. Pilot contacted Soviets, was told to not ask questions. This was probably a test to measure the British reaction and to determine if the British knew what it was.

In 1976 - Sweden detected evidence of nuclear explosions from Semipalatinsk but without seismic activity.

In 1976 - Legionnaires Disease strikes in downtown Philadelphia. Kills 34, 187 others got sick. Dr. P. David Beter said this was actually caused by Soviets releasing plutonium gas, but Bearden says it was a scalar electromagnetic attack.

SCALAR WEAPONS ACTIVATED

March 24, 1977 - a luminous patch of light appeared off the coast of Spanish Sahara, Africa, and a large globe of dynamic lights appeared over it. Bearden says this was a test of the Tesla shield which shields everything within it from any outside attack.

June 11, 1977 - Soviet scientist gave a report to Los Angeles Times journalist Robert Toth (who was in Moscow) which spoke of energy coming from the vacuum of space. KGB quickly arrested both and charged them with possessing Soviet state secrets. Most American scientists at the time thought energy from the vacuum was nonsense.

September 26, 1977 - Russia launched the Intercosmos 17 octagon space vehicle and destroyed the U.S. moon base, as mentioned in earlier Fire From The Sky material. Soviets also destroyed our spy satellites and "took the high ground." Russia has prevented us from controlling space ever since.

December 1977 and later - mysterious unexplained booms began occurring off the U.S. coasts. This was, according to Bearden, Soviet weapon registration and calibration, and according to Beter was warnings to our government.

Also in 1977 - Russia began weather war in earnest. Two huge hot spots in the Pacific were created which caused an El Ni±o effect and resulted in one of the most severe winters on record. For more information, read Tom Bearden's materials and check his reference material.

January 27, 1978 - all three engines fail on a Boeing 727 off U.S. east coast, restart one by one as plane falls 8,000 feet. Bearden says this was a Soviet test and warning. Four planes crash in 6 days NW of Las Vegas in February, 1978. From this point on the aircraft events and crashes are too numerous to list and are still ongoing. Atmospheric booms were reported over Texas coast, Nova Scotia, South Carolina.

April 2, 1978 - 39 pilots in a race off Florida experience "time loss" on synchronized watches. Unexplained lights and lighted objects seen and tracked on radar over Florida.

For more information on scalar EM bird kills, earthquakes, Tesla shield observations, crashes, and much more as part of Soviet man-caused events, see Tom Bearden's material, Dr. Beter's material, and related material from other authors. There are far too many for me to list.

COALITION INSIDER

In December, 1978, I received Vol. 1, No. 1 of the Coalition Insider, a report of the Coalition for Peace Through Strength. This was published by the American Security Council, started by General George Keegan after he resigned as head of Air Force Intelligence to become a private citizen so he could warn about the Soviet particle beam and other weapons developments. The back page article entitled "Soviets Have Satellite Killers" says: "At a news conference recently, Defense Secretary Harold Brown revealed that the Soviet Union has placed into operation a space interceptor satellite capable of shooting down U.S. military and civilian satellites." How did he know the capabilities of these interceptors? Because they had already knocked out our satellites!

The article further stated: "Last year, the Soviet Union denounced the U.S. for even considering the development of a similar space interceptor satellite, capable of shooting down Soviet interceptor satellites, before they could knock out our reconnaissance satellites. Any such plans, warned Moscow, would be in 'direct violation' of the treaty for peaceful uses of space. But, the Soviets already had a 'killer satellite' of their own!"

The co-chairman of the press conference is pictured; his name was Senator Robert Dole.

NORTHERN BOOK HOUSE

Also in 1978 I received a packet of Communist literature from the Soviet distributor Northern Book House, Box 1000, Gravenhurst, Ontario, Canada. At the time, I considered the material as worthless nonsense garbage. Now, as I review it, I am shocked. They talk about humans and animals responding to "electromagnetic waves." They talk about Soviet scientist Dr. N. A. Kozyrev's study of earthquakes on the moon. They talk about getting energy out of the vacuum.

They brag about the "world's first supersonic aircraft," the Soviet TU-104, introduced in 1956 (they ignore the German supersonic bomber code-named Horten XVIII, made in 1945). I'll just quote the article: "Remember back to 1956? World's first jet passenger plane. Changed whole course of flying (vastly increased people carried).

When NN [Northern Neighbors, publication of Northern Book House] said it (15 years ago), hor-hor-hor, such exaggerating! Plane was, of course, famous Soviet TU-104, long far ahead of USA. Now they've {Russia] got the TU-144 supersonic aircraft.

And where is USA? Where NN said it would be. Far behind USSR's. But darn it all, we missed out! We didn't say USA would not have any SST at all, like it hasn't. Sorry, but don't expect to see us exaggerate all the time. These days it's hard to see how far behind USA is falling."

Oh, but now we are far ahead of them, we are told. Our supersonic passenger transport is the, ah, er, it's the - somebody help me out here, please? And our space station is the ah, er, oh - never mind. We have Disney World, so there!

They quote a U.S. News & World Report article "U.S. Superiority Has Ended," April 5, 1971. The centerfold of the magazine is a spread of pictures of the inside of their space station and the four men working there for months at a time. They point out that the U.S. astronauts have to crash land in the ocean on return, while Soviet astronauts land on the ground.

The next page is an article condemning Zionism as racism! One of the articles tells of the Russian educational system. In their system, there is no homework, all study is done at school. Everybody learns another language starting in Grade One. In some of the schools physical training consists of three hours a day! No wonder they win all the Olympic medals. Oh well, they are probably just bragging.

KAMMLER

Anybody familiar with Nazi Germany will be familiar with Himmler, Speer, Bormann and such but few have ever heard of Hans Kammler. Kammler was a General in the SS, rather an accomplishment any way you look at it. Kammler "was regarded by many in the Nazi hierarchy as the most powerful man in Germany outside the Cabinet." (Blunder! How the U.S. Gave Away Nazi Supersecrets to Russia, by Tom Agoston, Dodd, Mead & Co., p. 4.)

Kammler, whose position of authority was directly under Himmler, was in charge of Hitler's most secret projects, specifically projects such as the world's first jet engines and rockets. He had over 14 million people working for him, mostly building underground factories. Agoston said his projects were equivalent to being in charge of building the Great Pyramids of the Coliseum in Rome. Speer said that he believed that Kammler was being considered to take his (Speer's) position.

Working under Kammler in charge of rockets was General Walther Dornberger, who with Dr. Werner von Braun, developed the V-2 rocket. Working with Kammler at the "Reich's most advanced high-technology military research center" at the Skoda armament complex in Pilsen, Czechoslovakia was General Dr. Wilhelm Voss. Some of the projects at Skoda remain secret to this day, but it is acknowledged that among the projects was one by Dr. Franz Josef Neugebauer, "a specialist in thermal systems for aircraft nuclear propulsion." (Agoston, p. 12.)

Albert Speer, in his book Spandau, The Secret Diaries, brags that it was he who ordered Werner Heisenberg to stop building an atomic bomb and concentrate on a "uranium motor" for aircraft. Towards the end of the war, Hitler even made Goering and Speer subordinate to Kammler. Eisenhower admits in Crusade In Europe that the Nazis were within 6 months of developing advanced weapons that would have changed the outcome of the war.

RUDOLPH HESS AND SECRET GERMAN SPACE BASE

Rudolph Hess, Hitler's best friend and second in command, went to England to try to stop the war with Britain and was arrested as a "war criminal" on May 10, 1941 and was kept from having any contact with the public until he was recently murdered. He was the only prisoner in Spandau prison. Ones who paid any attention to his situation at all have wondered what was the big secret he knew that made him so dangerous to the Allies? Perhaps the answer is revealed in Friedrich's book Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions on page 34: Hess "was entrusted with the all-important Antarctic file... Hess, himself, kept the Polar File..."

If you look at a map of Antarctica you will see that a portion of Queen Maud Land is called new Schwabenland. This is the part of the continent nearest to South Africa. The Germans made a major expedition to this area in 1938-1939 and began the construction of a major base. For details of this expedition, see the book by Friedrich. This book has pictures of the warmwater ponds and other information that will surprise you. It has maps showing that Admiral Byrd's Operation Highjump (Naval Task Force 68) military invasion landed on the side opposite the German bases. The book tells of a major food item in the area called krill. Ever heard of "Krill?" The maps of Operation Highjump say that they left the German side of the continent unexplored.

A man who was very influential in modern German post-war politics was Hans-Ulrich Rudel, a frequent guest speaker in German military and political circles. Rudel was the man groomed by Hitler to become his successor. It is known that Rudel made frequent trips to Tierra del Fuego at the tip of South America nearest Antarctica. One of Martin Bormann's last messages from the bunker in Berlin to Doenitz mentioned Tierra del Fuego.

The book, UFOs, Nazi Secret Weapon? says (p. 8) "Hitler's appraisal of the Jews can best be summed up as contained in '*THE PROTOCOLS OF THE LEARNED ELDERS OF ZION.' This is a very important aspect of the whole U.F.O. story, because in it, we find the seeds for many far-reaching decisions made 30 years later." Do you have any idea what such a politically "incorrect" subject such as the PROTOCOLS could have to do with UFOs?

A book called America's Aircraft Year Book tells about the U.S. using captured German scientists at Ft. Bliss and Wright Field. "Among those in the German group at Wright Field were Rudolph Hermann, Alexander Lippsisch, Heinz Schmitt, Helmut Heinrich, and Fritz Doblhoff and Ernst Kugel. Hermann was attached to the Peenemunde Research Station for Aerodynamics, where Germany's V-2 rockets were hatched and launched against England. A specialist in supersonics, he was in charge of the supersonic wind tunnel at Kochel in the Bavarian Alps. He also was a member of the group entrusted with Hitler's futuristic plans to establish a space-station rocket-refueling base revolving as a satellite about the Earth at a distance of 4,000 miles - a scheme which he and certain high-ranking AAF officers in 1947 still believed to be feasible."

Later evidence shows that most or all of the craft and flying saucer scientists disappeared. The available evidence indicates they went to South America or Antarctica.

The El Mercurio and Der Weg papers told of a large submarine convoy discovered by the British Navy at the end of WW II. All available Allied units engaged the convoy and were totally destroyed except for the Captain of one destroyer, who was reported as saying, "May God help me, may I never again encounter such a force."

On July 10, 1945, more than two months after the end of the War, the German submarine U-530 surrendered to Argentine authorities. The Commander was Otto Wermoutt. The sub had a crew of 54 men (the normal sub crew was 18 men) and the cargo consisted of 540 barrels of cigarettes and unusually large stocks of food. The Commander was 25 years old, the second officer was 22, and the crew was an average of 25 except for one man who was 32 years old. This was an unusually young crew and upon questioning it was learned that they all claimed that they had no relatives.

A map from a Spanish book called Is Hitler Alive? with the route of the Fuhrer convoy shows it passed alongside South Georgia Island, where later a secret underground base was the focus of a secret battle during the Falkland Islands War.

On April 4, 1944 at 4:40 a.m. the German submarine U-859 left on a mysterious mission carrying 67 men and 33 tons of mercury sealed in glass bottles in watertight tin crates. The sub was sunk by a British submarine and most of the crew died. One survivor on his death bed about 30 years later told about the expensive cargo and some divers checked out his story and found the mercury. For what purpose was this mercury to be used? And where were they trying to take it?

There are many other stories of other U-boats and German survivors, mostly in the Southern Hemisphere. The Germans and other European nations required very meticulous registration records of everybody, including their relatives, employment, addresses, children, etc., and at the end of the war the Allies, cross checking these records, taking into account casualties and deaths, determined that there were 250,000 persons unaccounted for.

WERNER HEISENBERG

Hitler signed the order for the atomic bomb to be built on September 26, 1939. The top scientist on this project was Dr. Werner Heisenberg. (Powers, Thomas, Heisenberg's War, Alfred A. Knopf, 1993, p. 16.) Heisenberg won the Nobel Prize for physics in 1932 "for the creation of quantum mechanics." He was professor of theoretical physics at Leipzig and later Director of the Max Planck Institute for Physics. His best friend, until the war, was Niels Bohr. Edward Teller received his doctorate by studying under Heisenberg (Powers, vii).

Thomas Powers wrote the book Heisenberg's War, The Secret of the German Bomb, in which one of the main themes was trying to account for the fact that Germany was far ahead of the rest of the world in developing the bomb and yet the Allies were astonished when they found the primitive experimental reactor at the end of the war that was supposedly the best the Germans were able to accomplish. Excuses such as German inefficiency, etc., do not fit the evidence, and to say that the Germans were more moral than the American Jews that developed the bomb is not politically acceptable.

It is known that the Germans were also working on the hydrogen bomb, and the Allies frantically bombed the heavy water plants. There are many books and movies about the heroes who stopped the German nuclear efforts, yet somewhere in the hoopla you find that at least one large load of heavy water was never accounted for.

In a speech in June 1949, Vannevar Bush tells that the Allies were extremely concerned that the Germans were ahead of them on the bomb, but finally found out "they had not accomplished five percent of the undertaking which had been brought to success... in this country." He blamed their failure on typical German "regimentation in a totalitarian system." But if you think about it with an open mind, you should realize that "regimentation in a totalitarian system" is usually MORE efficient, especially when it comes to making weapons.

Powers explores Heisenberg's explanation that the Germans "had used their influence as experts to direct the work into the channels which have been mapped in the foregoing report." But the "foregoing report" did not explain what happened. Powers said: "His account is incomplete. Something is withheld" (p. 482). On the last page he sums up by saying, "No one denies what Samuel Goudsmit found in southern Germany in 1945 - a small-scale program of atomic research that posed no threat to the Allies. It is the difficulty of assigning reasons for the failure that have kept the issue tender for nearly fifty years."

When Field Marshall Erhard Milch visited the Gottow laboratories in 1945 where atomic research was being carried out, he asked Heisenberg, "How big would a bomb have to be in order to destroy New York or London?" Heisenberg replied: "About as big as a pineapple, and we will have a basketful for the Fuhrer by Christmas...!" (Mattern-Friedrich, UFOs, Nazi Secret Weapon?, p. 77. Some of the material in the book came from classified documents obtained from the CIA. See elsewhere in this text.) (It takes 33 pounds of highly-enriched uranium or 13 pounds of plutonium to make a small atomic bomb).

In 1943 Niels Bohr escaped from Denmark to London and reported that Germany was making the bomb. They also had proof that the Germans had "cornered the major supplies of uranium and also of thorium."

END OF PART 26.

PART 27:

WHO CREATED THE ATOMIC BOMB?

Boris Pash, head of security for the Manhattan Project, and scientist Samuel Goudsmit followed the lead tanks into Paris and into Germany, looking for the German nuclear laboratory, which they found in Strasbourg. This was called Operation Alsos (Greek for "Groves"). Peter Goodchild in his book J. Robert Oppenheimer, Shatterer of Worlds, p. 110 said: "Very soon a picture of the Germans' progress began to emerge. They revealed that Hitler had been told of the possibilities of a nuclear weapon in 1942 and that there had been a whole series of uranium pile experiments.

But the crucial facts were that even as late as August 1944 the experiments were still at an early stage. The Germans had neither the certain information that an explosive chain reaction was possible, nor did they have the material or the mechanism to make their bomb. It was apparent that the project had moved forward hardly at all since 1942. There were one or two people in Washington who, when they read Goudsmit's final report, suspected that the information had come too easily, but most people believed it."

It is possible that Germany DID develop the bomb, and the Allies kept it secret? In Heisenberg's War, p. 481, Vannevar Bush is quoted as saying in June 1949: "The Nazis wanted an atomic bomb; we knew that. They had as good a chance at it as we had. In the tense years up to 1945 we thought that they were close competitors, even that they might be six months ahead of us. Then after Stuttgart fell and the Alsos mission did its work, we found out. The Nazis had not even reached first base." Surprise, surprise. Or was it lie, lie?

My best guess, based on the evidence, is that there is a strong possibility Germany DID develop the atomic bomb! The Americans managed to capture some of them in early 1945, then on August 6, 1945, dropped one on Hiroshima. This would account for J. Robert Oppenheimer's curious statement that the bomb dropped on Hiroshima was made in Germany. Could the Germans have taken some bombs with them when Hitler escaped? Was the submarine convoy protected by nuclear weapons, and were they what stopped Operation Highjump? Perhaps not, that is just conjecture, but I strongly suspect we got the "bomb" from the Germans.

In Blowback, "the first full account of America's recruitment of Nazis, and its disastrous effect on our domestic and foreign policy" by Christopher Simpson, he states: "On July 6 [1945] the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) specifically authorized an effort to 'exploit... chosen, rare minds whose continuing intellectual productivity we wish to use' under the top secret project code-named Overcast... At first this was justified on the grounds that German scientists might be useful in the continuing war against Japan" (p.33).

When the Allies found the German atomic bomb laboratory, they were amazed that it was just a small concrete reactor in a cave, too small to go critical. Yet they went to considerable trouble in a top secret program to grab these scientists because they might be useful in defeating Japan? What were they going to do, throw radioactive concrete at the Japanese? Tom Agoston in Blunder! says (p. 38) that "Unknown to Allied scientists, the Germans had been able to build up a sizeable stockpile of U-235 and had held up to two tons, as well as two tons of heavy water."

William Stevenson, in A Man Called Intrepid, says "The Germans had the man [Heisenberg] whose theoretical work was the basis of the bomb" (p. 456) and "In the military field, the view prevailed in 1939 that the country with the greatest chance of brining together the pieces was Germany."

Let's see now, the atomic bomb was a German idea, they had the best scientists, they had a proven ability to develop advanced weapons, they had plenty of raw material, and yet their "bomb" consisted of nothing more than some radioactive concrete in a cave in a hill at the base of a church? (Heisenberg's War, p. 421.) The German laboratory was captured on April 21, 1945, then three months later on July 16 a bomb was tested at Alamogordo, New Mexico. Then on August 6, 1945, one was dropped on Hiroshima, and August 9 on Nagasaki. This is not counting the nuclear explosion in the Oakland, California, area, but we are not supposed to know about that.

Pash and Goudsmit in Operation Alsos captured several tons of uranium and "it was shipped to Britain and then the United States, transformed into uranium hexaflouride gas for isotope separation at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, and finally in the form of U-235 used to destroy Hiroshima." (Heisenberg's War, p. 362.)

Most classified files from World War II have been routinely declassified under the provisions of the U.S. Freedom of Information Act. Tom Agoston (Blunder!, p. 124) said of the Alsos information, "The files continued to be suppressed and remain under lock and key in Washington, well beyond the thirty-year rule. The motive for this remains a four-decade mystery."

He also said that the testimony of Albert Speer, referring to General Kammler, "The transcript continues to be classified beyond the normal thirty-year rule, and is not expected to be made public before 2020."

Kammler disappeared at the end of the War and it was reported that he committed suicide (four different versions). If he were dead, why the secrecy? Kammler was regarded as "the most important man in Germany outside the Cabinet." The chain of command was Hitler to Himmler to Himmler's Deputy SS General Karl Wolff to SS General Oswald Pohl to Kammler, and later the link was more direct.

Dr. Wilhelm Voss told Agoston what happened to Kammler was a "hot matter" that could not be revealed. Agoston said one of Kammler's close associates was Rudolph Hess, who flew to Britain on a secret mission in May 1941. "The secret British file that might explain why he flew to Britain will remain closed until the year 2020" (p.160).

What clinched the proof for me was when I read in Phoenix Journal #18 (Blood And Ashes), speaking of the Manhattan Project, "Of course, they utilized the German production urn and, actually, the bomb used on Japan was constructed in Germany" (p. 159). The author of those Journals is "One Who Knows."

GERMAN SUBMARINES IN SOUTH ATLANTIC

The newspaper France Soir had the following account: "Almost 1-1/2 years after cessation of hostilities in Europe, the Islandic Whaler, "Juliana" was stopped by a large German U-boat. The Juliana was in the Antarctic region around Malvinas [now Falkland] Islands when a German submarine surfaced and raised the German official naval Flag of Mourning - red with a black edge.

The submarine commander sent out a boarding party, which approached the Juliana in a rubber dinghy, and having boarded the whaler demanded of Capt. Hekla part of his fresh food stocks. The request was made in the definite tone of an order to which resistance would have been unwise. The German officer spoke a correct English and paid for his provisions in U.S. dollars, giving the Captain a bonus of $10 for each member of the Juliana crew. Whilst the food stuffs were being transferred to the submarine, the submarine commander informed Capt. Hekla of the exact location of a large school of whales. Later the Juliana found the school of whales where designated."

The French Agence France Press on 25 September 1946, said: "The continuous rumours about German U-boat activity in the region of Tierra del Fuego (Feuerland, in German), between the southernmost tip of Latin America and the continent of Antarctica are based on true happenings."

There have been stories and books written about Germans counterfeiting U.S. currency and otherwise obtaining American money printing plates, which may account for the German use of American money.

The Guinness Book of World Records says that the "greatest unsolved robbery" was the disappearance of the entire German treasury at the end of the war.

RAND CORPORATION

In January 1946 industrialist Donald Douglas approached the Army Air Force with a plan for government and industry to work together on long range strategic planning. This was called Project RAND, a name coined by Arthur Raymond from Research ANd Development. Much of their first government money went to the von Braun team. (McDougall, Walter al....the Heavens and the Earth, A Political History of the Space Age, Basic Books, New York, 1985, p. 89.)

LESLIE R. GROVES

Groves is known as the General in charge of the Manhattan Project which built the Atomic Bomb. He was chosen because he is the one who supervised the building of the Pentagon, and by 1942 was in charge of all U.S. military construction everywhere. After the war he went to work for Remington Rand Corporation.

BORIS PASH

"The stakes in the search for the scientific expertise of Germany were high. The single most important American strike force, for example, was the Alsos raiding team, which targeted Axis atomic research, uranium stockpiles, and nuclear scientists, as well as Nazi chemical and biological warfare research. The commander of this assignment was U.S. Army Colonel Boris Pash, who had previously been security chief of the Manhattan Project - the United States' atomic bomb development program - and who later played an important role in highly secret U.S. covert action programs.

Pash succeeded brilliantly in his mission, seizing top German scientists and more than 70,000 tons of Axis uranium ore and radium products. The uranium taken during these raids was eventually shipped to the United States and incorporated in U.S. atomic weapons." (Simpson, Christopher, Blowback, Collier Books, New York, 1988, p. 26.)

"Another notable Bloodstone veteran is Boris Pash, a career intelligence officer identified in the Final Report of the U.S. Senate's 1975-1976 investigation into U.S. intelligence activities as the retired director of the CIA unit responsible for planning assassinations" (Blowback, p. 108).

Blowback, p. 152-153 says: "The records of Operation Bloodstone add an important new piece of information to one of the most explosive public issues of today: the role of the U.S. government - specifically the CIA - in assassinations and attempted assassinations of foreign officials. According to a 1976 Senate investigation, a key official of Operation Bloodstone is the OPC officer who was specifically delegated responsibility for planning the agency's assassinations, kidnappings, and similar 'wet work.'

"Colonel Boris Pash, one of the most extraordinary and least known characters in American intelligence history... his work for U.S. intelligence agencies places him in the critical office given the responsibility for planning postwar assassination operations... Colonel Pash is one of the few remaining originals of U.S. intelligence, and his experience in 'fighting the communists' goes back to the 1917 Russian Revolution.

He was in Moscow and Eastern Europe in those days with his father, a missionary of Russian extraction, and the young Pash spent much of the Soviet civil war working on the side of the White armies, then with Czarist refugees who had fled their country. In the 1920s Pash signed on as a reserve officer with the U.S. military intelligence service... he... played a role in the internment of Japanese civilians in California, and was soon assigned as chief counterintelligence officer on the Manhattan Project, the supersecret U.S. effort to develop the atomic bomb. (More than a decade later it was Colonel Pash's testimony that helped seal the fate of scientist Robert Oppenheimer in the well-known 1954 security case.)

Before the war was out, it will be recalled, Colonel Pash led the series of celebrated special operations known as the Alsos Mission that were designed to capture the best atomic and chemical warfare experts that the Nazis had to offer.

"After the war Colonel Pash served as the army's representative on Bloodstone in the spring of 1948, when the tasks of that project, including recruiting defectors, smuggling refugees out from behind the Iron Curtain, and assassinations, were established. Bloodstone's 'special operations,' as defined by the Pentagon, could 'include clandestine warfare, subversion, sabotage and... assassination,' according to the 1948 Joint Chiefs of Staff records. In March 1949, Pash was assigned by the army to the OPC division of the CIA... His five-man CIA unit, known as PB/7, was given a written charter that read in part that 'PB/7 will be responsible for assassinations, kidnapping, and such other functions as from time to time may be given it... by higher authority.'"

From Dulles by Leonard Mosley (A Biography of Eleanor, Allen and John Foster. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1978.), we find, p. 459: "But now he [Allen Dulles] was interested in the more sinister Agency experiments in mind-bending drugs, portable phials of lethal viruses, and esoteric poisons that killed without trace. Allen's sense of humor was touched when he learned that the unit working on these noxious enterprises was called the Health Alteration Committee (directed by Dr. Sidney Gottlieb and Boris Pash)... Richard Bissell... had now succeeded Frank Wisner as deputy director of Plans..."

To learn more about the mind-control and torture experiments of Pash and Gottlieb, read Journey Into Madness: The True Story of Secret CIA Mind Control and Medical Abuse by Gordon Thomas (Bantam Books, New York, 1989).

One of the people they killed was Frank Olson (a CIA germ warfare doctor whose specialty was anthrax), while they were working on Subproject-68, also known as MK-ULTRA. MK-ULTRA started as Project Bluebird, set up on April 20, 1950, by CIA Director Admiral Roscoe Hillenkoetter (who later was a member of NICAP), and on July 20, 1950, they began using sodium amytal, Benzedrine and other drugs to "brainwash" prisoners.

In September 1950, the Miami News published an article under the headline BRAIN WASHING TACTICS which was considered the first formal use of the term. One of Gottlieb's partners was Dr. Harold Wolff, who appears to be a Paperclip doctor. He worked with Parke-Davis and "...remained closely connected with the M-K Ultra brainwashing project" (p. 191). He helped set up an apartment and introduce LSD to the hippies in San Francisco, and worked on Project Mindbender (a Manchurian-Candidate type operation) with William Buckley.

Isn't it interesting that so many of the participants in the most secret of secrets of World War II are still very involved in the Kennedy assassination and other more current affairs. Many books and articles have been written about the CIA being involved in the JFK assassination, and now you know that the man in charge of CIA assassinations was Boris Pash, formerly chief of security for the Manhattan Project. He was also head of the group trying to capture Hitler's advanced technology, including "flying saucers" and other secrets.

The book ZR Rifle - The Plot To Kill Kennedy And Castro by Claudia Furiati, p. 36, says that a man named William Harvey had been in charge of the CIA post in West Berlin until 1960, then was placed in charge of CIA assassinations by Richard Bissell in 1961. The plans to assassinate political leaders was code-named ZR-RIFLE, headed by Harvey. Bo Gritz said on p. 525 of his book: "The Kennedy assassination was code-named 'ZR-RIFLE'." It seems apparent to me that Harvey and Pash were wearing the same pair of pants.

In 1941, Ian Fleming, the future creator of the "James Bond" stories, and at that time a high ranking officer of British Intelligence, suggested to William Donovan that he set up a specially trained and selected assassination unit. PB/7 (Pash Boris Seven) was the original of the "Agent 007" concept. If my memory is correct, I believe Nixon stated that William Harvey was the real 007.

I assume Pash was Agent 001, or perhaps he had seven agents working for him (originally five). If you want to understand more of how these various factions such as CIA, KGB, Nazis, Communists, FBI, etc., can be fighting each other and working together at the same time, you need to understand who was above them, controlling them. To understand that, look to British Intelligence! You will find British Intelligence to be an operation of British and European Royalty and "Aristocracy"!

E. Howard Hunt, while in prison in December, 1975, in an interview with the New York Times, said that the head of the CIA assassination unit was Boris Pash. Pash was assigned to Angleton at this time (see Final Judgment, p. 207). Angleton was head of the Israel desk of the CIA and was very pro-Israel. He was also closely involved with Meyer Lansky.

In Cold Warrior, the biography of James Jesus Angleton by Tom Mangold, he says on page 362: "I would like to place on the record, however, that Angleton's closest professional friends overseas, then and subsequently, came from the Mossad (the Israeli intelligence-gathering service) and that he was held in immense esteem by his Israeli colleagues and by the state of Israel, which was to award him profound honors after his death." His place was taken after his death by William Colby. When Kissinger wanted to "get LaRouche," he turned to Angleton for help. Angleton's tombstone is in Hebrew.

On page 97 of Final Judgment, Piper says that "The ZR/Rifle Team, in fact, was one of Angleton's pet in-house CIA projects, which he ran in conjunction with his CIA colleague, William Harvey."

According to Claudia Furiati, Joseph Schreider was in charge of the CIA laboratories and of developing poisons for assassinations, and says that Harvey was in charge of political assassinations, working out of the Miami office run by [Paperclip] Shackley, and was working with Schreider to try to poison Castro. Above we have Boris Pash and Sidney Gottlieb working together in the same manner. We have Pash and Harvey in the same locations, doing the same jobs, in charge of the same projects - talk about featherbedding. I believe that Harvey was actually at headquarters in Langley, over Shackley in Miami.

Blowback, p. 153, says that Pash "...served as the Army's representative on Bloodstone in the spring of 1948, when the tasks of that project, including recruiting defectors, smuggling refugees out from behind the Iron Curtain, and assassinations, were established. In March 1949, Pash was assigned by the Army to the OPC division of the CIA."

Harvey died June 6, 1976, according to Dick Russell, and Pash was in his 80s in 1988 according to Simpson.

END OF PART 27.

PART 28:

GERMAN FLYING SAUCERS

Hitler's advanced technology included intercontinental ballistic missiles, vertical takeoff aircraft, jet engines, cruise missiles, sound cannons, and many other advanced items. The Allies captured plans for what became the Boeing 747 Jumbo jet. Among the most secret items captured were plans for flying disks, that were at first called "Krautmeteors." Based on the evidence, they were built as early as around 1933 and went into mass production in 1940. Scientists involved in these projects were Bellonzo, Schriever, Miethe and Victor Schauberger.

Schauberger developed the "flying hat" type disc that was later seen over the United States. The final version was the Bellonzo-Schriever-Miethe Diskus, as large as 135 feet and some up to 225 feet in diameter. They traveled over 2,000 km/hr and were planned to go over 4,000 km/hr. In 1945 they could reach a speed of 1,300 mph and an altitude of 40,000 feet in less than three minutes. The Germans developed the Delta wing craft, and were working on stealth technology, etc.

Many pilots saw the strange craft over Germany. However, as soon as a craft was built, Hitler ordered it disassembled and shipped somewhere - probably Antarctica. None of the craft were captured by the Allies, although some of the scientists were captured and then mostly disappeared, but can somewhat be traced to Bell Textron and to places such as Area 51, which, surprise!, is infamous for its UFO sightings.

NEW YORK TIMES, December 14, 1944:

"Floating Mystery Ball Is New German Weapon. SUPREME HEADQUARTERS, Allied Expeditionary Force, Dec. 13 - A new German weapon has made its appearance on the western air front, it was disclosed today.

"Airmen of the American Air Force report that they are encountering silver colored spheres in the air over German territory. The spheres are encountered either singly or in clusters. Sometimes they are semi-translucent."

and, "SUPREME HEADQUARTERS Dec. 13 (Reuters) - The Germans have produced a "secret" weapon in keeping with the Christmas season.

"The new device, apparently an air defense weapon, resembles the huge glass balls that adorn Christmas trees. There was no information available as to what holds them up like stars in the sky, what is in them or what their purpose is supposed to be."

FALKLAND ISLANDS WAR

The Falkland Islands War had more to do with Nazis than with Argentina, for more details of what happened please refer to the Phoenix Journals.

The Germans, from their Antarctica base, began to infiltrate into Argentina, Chile, etc., and bought large tracts of land and swept up corporations. They also invested in corporations in Germany and elsewhere, with plans to make a comeback. They used the German treasury, captured treasure from other nations, and counterfeit American currency printed on real U.S. currency printing plates given to the Russians and captured by the Germans.

Some plates were stolen by Assistant Secretary of the U.S. Treasury Harry Dexter White (real name Weiss) under Henry Morgenthau and sent to the Soviets for use in occupied Germany. He also arranged for the mass theft of tons of our special money-paper. When J. Edgar Hoover went to President Truman with all the evidence that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was a Communist spy and thief, Truman of course removed Weiss (White) from his job - and promoted him to head of the International Monetary Fund. I kid you not, look it up. The story has a rather common ending - when a controversy developed in the press concerning this incident, Weiss became a "suicide."

GERMAN ECONOMIC "MIRACLE"

For more information on how the "economic miracle" was accomplished after the war by the Germans, you can read such books as Martin Bormann, Nazi in Exile by Paul Manning ("...Bormann became the guiding force in the 'economic miracle' that led to the rebirth of German industry and finance in the thirty-five years following political and military defeat. In the waning months of World War II, as the Third Reich was tottering and finally crumbling in defeat, Bormann set up 750 corporations scattered among those nations that had remained neutral. Those corporations received the fleeing wealth of Germany and became the power base that enabled Germany to climb back to economic and political strength." From flyleaf). This book expands on the meeting in Strasbourg on August 10, 1944, mentioned in Michael Bar-Zohar's book The Avengers.

In 1986, while researching these subjects, we received 161 pages under a Freedom of Information search concerning what happened to the German treasury at the end of WW II. Many of these documents had been SECRET until declassification to fulfill our request. One document was No. 19,489, November 27, 1944, Subject: Transmitting Intelligence Report No. EW-Pa 198 [?, barely readable] by G-2 Economic Section, the Secretary of State, from Lt. Col. John W. Easton, Economic Warfare Division.

The cover letter stated "I have the honor to enclose Intelligence Report No. EW-Pa 198 by G-2 Economic Section, SHAEF [Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Forces], dated November 7, 1944, describing the plans of German industrialists for the post-war resurrection of Germany. Among the topics dealt with in this report are: patents, financial reserves, exportation of capital, and the strategic placing of technical personnel." It is obvious that Manning quoted from these documents in his book on Bormann.

In describing the meeting of August 10,1944, in Stasbourg, some sentences in the documents stand out: "German industrialists must, it was said, through their exports increase the strength of Germany. They must also prepare themselves to finance the Nazi Party which would be forced to go underground as Maquis (in Gebirgverteidigungsstellengehen). From now on the government would allocate large sums to industrialists so that each could establish a secure post-war foundation in foreign countries.

Existing financial reserves in foreign countries must be placed at the disposal of the Party so that a strong German Empire can be created after the defeat. It is also immediately required that the large factories in Germany create small technical offices or research bureaus which would be absolutely independent and have no known connection with the factory. These bureaus will receive plans and drawings of new weapons as well as documents which they need to continue their research and which must not be allowed to fall into the hands of the enemy" [author emphasis].

The last sentences in this document are, "After the defeat of Germany the Nazi Party recognizes that certain of its best known leaders will be condemned as war criminals. However, in cooperation with the industrialists it is arranging to place its less conspicuous but most important members in positions with various German factories as technical experts or members of its research and designing offices."

Some of the documents were concerning "Looted Gold (1945-1948). Accession Number 56-75-101, Agency Container Number 169, File Number BIS/2/00." These documents concern Germany's "looted" gold being transferred to the Bank for International Settlements in Switzerland. One important paragraph (#9) says: "It is clear both from correspondence and from testimony that the management of the B.I.S. during the war was 'in the hands of the Administration Council, in which the Axis representatives have an authoritative influence,' and that in 1942 the Germans favored the reelection of President McKittrick whose 'personal opinions' they characterized as 'safely known'."

Enclosed in the file is a clipping from the New York Times, date not included but appears to be in 1945, that states: "McKITTRICK SLATED FOR POST AT CHASE. He Will Take Over Duties as Vice President of Bank Here Next Autumn. Thomas H. McKittrick, American banker who has served as president of the Bank for International Settlements [B.I.S.] since the beginning of 1940, will become a vice president of the Chase National Bank of New York next fall, Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board of Chase, announced yesterday." The article ends by quoting McKittrick: "I realize it is my duty to perform a neutral task in wartime. It is an extremely difficult and trying thing to do, but I do the best I can."

Another formerly Top Secret document declassified was "Subject: Conversation in Switzerland with Mr. McKittrick, President of the Bank for International Settlements" from Orvis A. Schmidt to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, dated March 23, 1945. It describes McKittrick's dealings with the real head of the Nazi banking system, a Vice President named Puhl.

"Puhl was described by McKittrick as a career banker who had been with the Reichsbank for some twenty years, who does not share the Nazi point of view... the Swiss National Bank said that in order to be sure they were not obtaining looted gold they had requested a member of the Reichsbank, whom they regarded to be trustworthy, to certify that each parcel of gold which they purchased had not been looted. The person who had done this certifying was Puhl."

Puhl was Reichsbank Senior Vice President Emil Johann Rudolf Puhl. He was in charge of taking booty into the bank and was in charge of it for the Nazis. His Senior Shipping Clerk Albert Thoms said that they needed up to thirty men to help him sort and repack the valuables, which consisted of "millions in gold marks, pounds sterling, dollars and Swiss francs, 3,500 ounces of platinum, over 550,000 ounces of gold, and 4,638 carats in diamonds and other precious stones, as well as hundreds of pieces of works of art" (p. 226, Aftermath, Ladislas Farago, Avon, 1974).

This material was shipped out of the country in Operation Fireland or Aktion Feuerland in German, which Farago explained in a footnote in his book on Bormann: "The transaction was named 'Land of Fire' after the archipelago of Tierra del Fuego at the southern extremity of Argentina and Chile, the area to which some of the shipments were originally consigned" (p. 228). On the next page Farago said: "Only a relatively small portion of the SS treasure was impounded by Bormann and sent overseas in the course of Aktion Feuerland. Much of it is still missing."

Germany had developed self-sufficiency before the end of the war, and was manufacturing their own oil, produced "butter" from coal, invented powdered milk, developed freeze drying, learned to store flour indefinitely, were growing their food in greenhouses on chemical "soil," etc. These projects were also necessary for survival of the secret UFO force, which Hitler called the "Last Battalion," at the Antarctic.

The counterfeiting of British and American money was under Operation Bernhard. The fake British notes have been often discussed in books and articles about Bernhard, but the fake American currency is not as well known. Recently the U.S. announced that it was issuing new money to counteract the counterfeit, which was said to be coming from Saddam Hussein and Lebanon. It would be more correct to say it is coming from South America, but that money is supposed to all be drug money. Life gets complicated.

When CONTACT newspaper first ran the series on Fire From The Sky, it followed with a reprint of the information about the truth about the Falkland Islands War. In that series, it revealed that the Russians, working with Rockefeller forces, defeated the British Bolshevik forces on South Georgia Island.

If you have not read that series, this information may not make sense to you. It is important to know that information, if you intend to try to understand what is happening. Nazi forces were involved in the Falkland Islands War, on the side of the Russians. This is hard to believe if you have no idea of what IS.

The Russians were nationalists, as opposed to the Zionist Bolsheviks who took their country away from them. The Zionist Bolsheviks were trained in the lower East Side of New York City and financed by New York and London bankers. They invaded Russia, killed the Tzar and many Nationalists and took over the government.

Can you begin to see how someone like Boris Pash, with a Russian Nationalist family background, could work with Nazi Gestapo and SS agents? Even the American General George Patton said we should have fought WITH the Nazis against the Bolshevik Communists. Patton said there was an international conspiracy of Zionist bankers who were the world's problem (see Patton's Papers, Vol. 2, p. 735 for example).

In 1982, on April 20, Hitler's birthday, the Russian/Rockefeller/Nazi commando force broke through and inserted a neutron bomb into the underground naval base at South Georgia Island.

For more of the story of what *really happened in the Falkland Islands crisis, read the January 17, 1995, issue of CONTACT: The Phoenix Project newspaper or Phoenix Journal #13, Skeletons In The Closet. (Contact, Inc., P.O. Box 27800, Las Vegas, NV 89126 or call 1-800-800-5565. For Phoenix Journals, write Phoenix Source Distributors, Inc., P.O. Box 27353, Las Vegas, NV 89126 or call 1-800-800-5565. The phone numbers are the same, but the mailing addresses are different.)

Alexander Haig was the General representing the Rockefellers. In his book Caveat, the chapter on the Falklands starts: "On March 28, 1982, a Sunday, the British Ambassador, Nicholas ("Niko") Henderson, brought me a letter from Lord Carrington. A party of Argentineans, wrote the foreign secretary, had landed nine days earlier on the island of South Georgia, a British possession lying in the South Atlantic a few degrees above the Antarctic Circle and some 600 miles to the east of the Falkland Islands, a British Crown colony." I'll bet you thought the Falkland Islands War was about the Falkland Islands!

Much ado was made in the media about the conflict between Jeane Kirkpatrick and Alexander Haig. Kirkpatrick is a Zionist and was the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations. She has a regular feature column in The Jewish Press newspaper, "The Largest Independent Anglo-Jewish Weekly Newspaper." Haig has had a long relationship with Henry Kissinger, to whom Haig became senior military advisor in 1969. Remember that Kissinger came out of the Paperclip Operation personnel.

In January 1982, Reagan replaced his national security advisor, Richard Allen, with William P. Clark, another Paperclip person, and who was Haig's deputy. Nixon said, "When you see the lights burning late in Henry's [Kissinger] office, it's usually Al Haig." (War In The Falklands, the Full Story by the Sunday Times of London Insight Team, Harper & Row, New York, 1982, p. 123.)

END OF PART 28.

PART 29:

If you doubt the fact that the Nazis never gave up and that they planned to continue the war after their defeat in Germany, and planned to make a comeback to finally achieve their goal, then perhaps you should read the following books:

Connell, Brian, A Watcher On The Rhine, William Morrow & Co., New York, 1957. "Old wine in new bottles," how the Nazis have come back into power.

Horne, Alistair, Return To Power, Fredrick A. Praeger, Inc., New York, 1956. "The struggle for unification, rather than any revival of Nazism, may one day force Germany out of the Western camp."

Tetens, T.H., The New Germany And The Old Nazis, Random House, New York, 1961. "A frank and often shocking account which details how 'Hitler's own' have managed to return to power in almost every walk of German life..."

Winkler, Paul, The Thousand-Year Conspiracy, Charles Scribner's Sons, 1943. "Secret Germany behind the mask."

White, Theodore H., Fire In The Ashes, William Sloane Associates, New York, 1953. The fire of Nazism in the ashes of Europe.

Sayers, Michael and Kahn, Albert E., The Plot Against The Peace, Book Find Club, New York, 1945. "...uncovers Nazi Germany's secret plans for a Third World War."

Schultz, Sigrid, Germany Will Try It Again, Reynal & Hitchcock, New York, 1944. Does the title give you a clue?

Dornberg, John, Schizophrenic Germany, MacMillan Company, New York, 1961. "Is the new West Germany of the postwar years as democratic as we have been led to believe, or does Nazism still smolder?"

Lord Russell, Brigadier, of Liverpool, C.B.E., M.C., *Return of the Swastika?" David McKay Co., New York, 1969. Russell was part of the Nuremberg prosecution team.

There are more, these just happen to be the ones in my personal library. I read them, mostly about 20 or 30 years ago. I do not mean to give the impression that Germany is the source of the world's problems; Germany has simply been a part of a much bigger picture. Other valuable books that will give you insight are:

Bacque, James, Other Losses, Stoddart Publishing Co., Canada, 1989. The truth about how Eisenhower murdered thousands of German prisoners of war AFTER the surrender. Many of those starving soldiers and piles of dead bodies you have seen in atrocity photos were NOT Jews, they were Germans. Don't argue with me, read the book. General George Patton wrote in 1945 that Eisenhower was using "practically Gestapo methods" in torturing and killing German POWs. You can obtain the book probably from Spotlight Newspaper if you can't find it otherwise.

Sutton, Anthony C., *Wall Street And The Rise Of Hitler, '76 Press, Seal Beach, Calif., 1976.

ALBERT EINSTEIN

Albert Einstein is a good example of another deception and hoax involved with the atomic bomb program. When many people think of the atomic bomb they think of Einstein. He was presented as the world's greatest scientist, and a hero of the atomic bomb program. Upon closer inspection, you will find that his major contributions were his use of his influence to obtain President Roosevelt's support for the bomb and he was the one personally responsible for bringing the major Communist atomic spy Klaus Fuchs into the Program. The Russians know nothing about the atomic bomb until Fuchs brought it to their attention in 1942. (Heisenberg's War, p. 524).

Thanks to Fuchs, (and to a massive amount of Secret material illegally shipped through Lend-Lease) they were able to explode their own bomb in 1949. Einstein was a communist cell member with Fuchs. Fuchs was the top scientist on the Manhattan Project and he gave the atomic secrets to the Soviets. (Jordan, George Recey, From Major Jordan's Diaries, Harcourt, Brace and Co., New York, 1952.)

We are taught that Einstein is the author of the Theory of Relativity, yet evidence has come for the proving that the real author was Mileva Maric, Einstein's first wife.

Einstein had a reputation at the Swiss Polytechnic Institute in Zurich of being a man with poor work habits and was often reprimanded for laziness during all his school years, including the University. He developed a romance with classmate Mileva who helped him with his math. His autobiography says "In my work participated a Serbian student Mileva Maric who I married later." She had an illegitimate daughter in 1902, which they gave up for adoption. They got married in 1903, separated in 1912 and divorced in 1919. This is when Einstein married his cousin Elsa. The original manuscript of the The Theory of Relativity submitted for publication had Maric's name on it as co-author.

For more proof, see the article "Theory of Relativity - Who is its Real Author?" by Dr. Rastko Maglic and J. W. McGinnis, President, International Tesla Society, in the Jul/Aug 1994 issue of Extraordinary Science magazine, which contains references for further documentation.

Einstein was a hoax and fraud saddled on the scientific community to prevent them from learning too much and to promote Jews as being superior, sort of Nazism in reverse.

Einstein's famous equation "E=MC squared" is WRONG, or at best only partially correct. His definition of energy is WRONG, his definition of mass is WRONG, C is defined as the top speed possible for anything, then it is squared, which would be even faster and thus contradicts the definition. Light is described as a constant, which is WRONG as defined. In a higher understanding, light does not move, our perception of the speed of light is WRONG.

Those who REALLY understand, and who can prove it by creating matter out of "nothing" for instance, say that the original WHITE LIGHT is invisible and still. Read books by Walter Russell for more information.

Einstein was a Zionist with membership in at least 16 Communist front organizations such as Friends of the Soviet. Einstein was head of the Jewish Black Book Committee, which was listed as a Communist front in the 1947 House Un-American Activities Committee Report.

The correct science being discovered and revealed by such as Nikola Tesla, Walter Russell, Tom Bearden, Andrija Puharich, etc., was suppressed to prevent humanity from achieving energy independence (and thus political and military independence) from the Rockefeller/Rothschild oil/nuclear energy barons. This same technology leads to understanding of good health, and thus independence from the drug/medical crowd, who happen to be the same oil crowd crooks.

PAUL ROSBAUD

Rosbaud was one of Britain's top spies in Nazi Germany. He worked as scientific adviser for the publishing firm of Springer Verlag. He came to know Albert Einstein, Peter Kapitsa, Niels Bohr, Ernest Rutherford, Leo Szilard, Otto Hahn, and others of importance in the quest for the Bomb. Kapitsa was the one later credited by Tom Bearden with creating Russia's advanced Tesla technology weapons. Kapitsa won the Nobel Prize in 1978 for his work on the physics of low temperatures and very strong magnetic fields, areas that were pursued in developing anti-gravity platforms.

Rosbaud was code named The Griffin. History books say that the Allies found out from The Griffin that Germany did not have the atomic bomb, and thus the military could advance with more confidence. A book entitled The Griffin by Arnold Karmish (Houghton Mifflin, Boston, 1986, on page 199, chapter titled "Double-Cross" tells of this):

"On Sunday, December 26, 1943, the day the Scharnhorst was sunk, the major headline in the London Sunday Express was THE SECRET WEAPON MAY NOT COME OFF. Beneath it was a long and accurate feature article by Kai Siegbahn, the son of Lise Meitner's reluctant host, Manne Siegbahn. He explained the fundamentals of nuclear energy and described the prewar research. As for the bomb, Siegbahn concluded: 'Despite all the secretiveness about researching in the uranium problem, I venture to say that the uranium bomb is still non-existent, except as a research objective It is rather difficult to say if it is possible at all to construct such a bomb, but for the present it seems as if an essential link is missing for making the uranium bomb a reality.'

Even more remarkable, the Sunday Express went beyond Siegbahn's opinion to assure its readers that 'it may therefore be a source of consolation to know that able Swedish atoms-scientists believe that the Germans have not succeeded in creating atom explosives.' The Express explained its sources for the information by saying, 'Swedish scientists had close contacts with German scientists until the Germans recently arrested Norwegian professors and students.' Among those recently arrested was, of course, Odd Hassel.

"Press security on the atomic bomb was extremely tight in the United States and even tighter in Britain, so the article's appearance seemed at first a puzzle. The Express was owned by William Maxwell Aitken, Lord Beaverbrook, formerly minister of war production and now lord privy seal. Lord Beaverbrook was intimately familiar with the history of the atomic bomb project and its present course, and he was in constant touch with his editors about what they should print. It was quite clear, then, that Kai Siegbahn's article was no accident - but what was its purpose?

"It was not hard to discern the reassuring purpose of the message to the British public. Rumors about Hitler's secret weapons had been rife, and the actions against Rjukan had focused attention on the bomb. But the Gestapo and the Abwehr also read the British papers.

"From the exploit of Jacques Allier to the attacks on the Norwegian installations, the Germans had kept reading the lesson that heavy water was essential for atomic research and that the Allies would do anything to halt production. Now, an article by a distinguished neutral scientist - apparently published with official approval - carried the strong implication that the British were still in a research stage and without much hope of 'making the uranium bomb a reality.'

"The article was, of course, a deliberate SIS plant, conceived in the Double-Cross Committee (The XX Committee), chaired by John Masterman of MI-5."

Lies were and are standard operating procedure for both sides. The article continues: "The top SIS expert on the Abwehr was Frank Foley [who worked with Masterman] of Section V, so he was recruited to the XX Committee as a senior advisor. In the early months, his work was interrupted by a special assignment, conducting the lengthy interrogation of Rudolf Hess. When he returned four months later, Foley took up the deception business once more."

So you see that the ones involved with lying about the bomb were the same ones very interested in what was said by Rudolf Hess. Hess' information remained highly classified long after the war, until he was recently murdered so that they could close Spandau Prison and keep him from talking. In the book Journey Into Madness, The True Story of Secret CIA Mind Control And Medical Abuse by Gordon Thomas, p. 152, tells of one of the heads of the CIA mind-control programs, Dr. Grant Cameron, going to Nuremberg to "establish the state of mind of Rudolf Hess." I wonder if that is "establish" as in "to determine," or as in "to create."

Rosbaud was a close friend with Goudsmit who ran Operation Alsos with Boris Pash. Goudsmit "formed a close friendship with Rosbaud that endured until Paul died" (p. 241).

After the war, Rosbaud formed Pergamon Press with Robert Maxwell. Maxwell went on to become a British "press baron" (p. 250, The Griffin) and was working with the Israeli Mossad selling Israeli briefcase nuclear bombs like the ones used in the New York Trade Center bombing. (Interview with Galen Winsor by Tom Valentine, Radio Free America, March 23, 1993. These bombs were used by Special Forces as early as 1960 per Sgt. Joe Garner, "Army vet tested nuclear 'suitcase bombs' in 60s," Houston Chronicle, January 23, 1995. Also see "Backpack Nukes for 'Nam, Inside SF's Super-Secret A-Bomb Project" in Soldier Of Fortune, May 1995.)

The information that spy Rosbaud, who was Jewish, provided is mentioned in a U.S. Department of Justice memorandum dated April 26, 1955, which reads: "[Rosbaud] returned to Germany determined to assist England and its allies at all costs. This he accomplished. The records in this matter contain official corroboration that Dr. Rosbaud remained in Berlin during World War II for the purpose of obtaining certain technical intelligence for the United States and the United Kingdom. This information was extremely useful and invaluable for the allied cause and involved great risk on the part of Dr. Rosbaud. His activities on behalf of the allied cause were successful and of such importance that even today they cannot be disclosed and are still highly classified."

When you read the book, you see that the most important information that Rosbaud provided was the non-existent status of the German bomb. Yet, the exact details are still "highly classified." So what's the big deal, why is the information still above top secret (top secret items have been declassified)? Makes one wonder, doesn't it?

Another curious "coincidence" is that, after Samisdat published the Nazi UFO information, two journalists from Springer Publishers flew to Toronto to interview Ernst Zundel (head of Samisdat) in person. Samisdat used to sell an audiotape of the interview.

SAMUEL ABRAHAM GOUDSMIT

Another curiosity is Goudsmit. He turns up in interesting places. He supported Oppenheimer during Oppenheimer's espionage trials. The APRO (Aerial Phenomena Research Organization, founded in 1952) Bulletin, August 1975, contained information obtained from declassified (and well sanitized) CIA records concerning the Robertson Panel which was convened in 1953 to study UFOs. Dr. H.P. Robertson was an expert in cosmology at California Institute of Technology, director of the Weapons System Evaluation Group in the Office of the Secretary of Defense and a CIA classified employee.

The panel was convened by the Office of Scientific Intelligence of the CIA and included Dr. Samuel Abraham Goudsmit, theoretical physicist and Chairman of the Physics Department, Brookhaven National Laboratories. Goudsmit was rather a heavy dude to be "wasting" time on UFOs that the government maintained did not exist. Other OSI panel members were Panel Chairman Dr. Howard Percy Robertson, on leave from his job as professor of Mathematical Physics at California Institute of Technology to be full time to OSI; physicist Dr. Luis Walter Alvarez, University of California, Berkeley, a specialist in magnetism and microwaves (it was speculated that the Roswell UFO was shot down by microwaves) and according to UFO researchers a member of Majestic-12 and the Jason Group; geophysicist Lloyd Viel Berkner, President of Associated Universities, Inc., which operated the particle accelerators of the Brookhaven National Laboratories (according to David Jacobs, The UFO Controversy in America, Berkner "accompanied Admiral Byrd" on Antarctic expeditions. Berkner is generally listed as a member of Majestic-12 and the Jason Group); astronomer Dr. Thornton Leigh Page, Deputy Director, Office of Operations Research, Johns Hopkins University and formerly a physicist with Naval ordnance.

Others included Frederick Clark Durant, a rocket engineer; astronomer Dr. Joseph Allen Hynek, Ohio (home of Wright-Patterson) State University who was also a consultant to the U.S. Air Force Air Technical Intelligence Center (which did the UFO Blue Book Project). The Panel interviewed a long list of Generals and Chiefs and other Big Boys and Heavy Dudes.

Fred Durant met regularly with Stuart Nixon, assistant to John Acuff, head of NICAP. (Timothy Good, Above Top Secret, William Morrow & Co., New York, 1988, p. 349.) Durant worked with von Braun, Krafft Ehricke, Harvard astronomer Fred Whipple, Maryland physicist Fred Singer, Navy Commander George Hoover and others on Ehricke's Moonbase and Marsbase projects.

Army General John Medaris was in charge of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency over von Braun and on March 20, 1959, received a directive for a study of a manned lunar base. "General Medaris organized a crash effort to carry out the study, which became Project Horizon. Less than three months later, on June 8, the study was completed.

On the first page of the study (four or five volumes of which have been declassified), the conclusions are stated: Military, political and scientific considerations indicate that it is imperative for the United States to establish a lunar outpost at the earliest practicable date... Project Horizon represents the earliest feasible capability for the U.S. to establish a lunar outpost" [Project Horizon 1959, vol. 1, p. 1]. (Marsha Freeman, How We Got To The Moon, The Story of the German Space Pioneers, 21st Century Science Associates, Washington, D.C., 1993, p. 210.)

Ehricke worked with Dornberger at Bell until 1954 when he went with Convair Astronautics in California which was in charge of building space stations and the lunar base. The Washington Star, December 29, 1958, described the Convair station as "the brainchild of Krafft Ehricke." Durant, Whipple and George Hoover were part of the Office of Naval Research. Whipple's assistant, J. Allen Hynek, was part of the Robertson Panel, as was Durant.

In UFO researcher William Steinman's correspondence with Grant Cameron, he states: "I contacted Dr. Alvarez in private, when he admitted that he did take part in the recovery of a saucer in Mexico. He would not go into detail concerning the events and who else was involved." Steinman wrote the book UFO Crash At Aztec which is an excellent source for more information on these men. Unfortunately it is a large, heavily documented book but with no index.

Dr. Lloyd Berkner is also listed in Assault On The Unknown, The International Geophysical Year as the head of the American part of the International Geophysical Year study. He was radio man on the first Byrd Expedition to the Antarctic and developed the sounder that charts the radio-reflecting layers of the atmosphere. Berkner was Chairman of the Space Science Board of the National Academy of Sciences. Operation Highjump is not mentioned, but Berkner was part of Operation Deepfreeze at the Antarctic in 1957-1958, headed by Byrd until his death, as were Werner von Braun and Frederick C. Durant. Berkner became a Navy Rear Admiral.

Another Antarctic scientist was Dr. Carl Augustus Heiland, who worked with Vannevar Bush and who was part of the on-site recovery team of the Aztec UFO crash (p. 85, UFO Crash At Aztec). He appears to be a Paperclip scientist, as he received his Doctorate from the University of Hamburg. Another very important scientist was Dr. Eric Henry Wang. I will not go into his story at this time, except to quote Steinman: "The subject of Dr. Eric Henry Wang remains one of the most touchy and sensitive areas in all ufology" (p. 282). Dr. Eric Wang was head of the Office of Special Studies of the Air Materials Command at Wright-Patterson AFB. He was an Austrian-born graduate of the Vienna Technical Institute and "a close associate of Victor Schauberger." (Hamilton, William F., Cosmic Top Secret, Inner Light, 1991, p. 23.) Steinman's book has a whole chapter on Nazi German "flying disk" projects, many of which used Schauberger's designs.

Goudsmit concluded that UFO sightings were "due to a formation of ducks or other birds." The official conclusion of the panel was that interest in UFOs was dangerous and that the situation should be downplayed and covered up. Jacobs said that Robertson showed the final report of the panel to General Charles Cabell, director of Air Force intelligence and later Deputy Director of the CIA in charge of clandestine operations, "who expressed satisfaction with it."

Cabell's brother Earl was the Mayor of Dallas during the Kennedy assassination, and apparently was the one who ordered the motorcade to change routes into the ambush area. Earl later went to work for Howard Hughes. General

Cabell was the person who briefed President Kennedy prior to the Bay of Pigs invasion. Robert Groden in High Treason quotes Victor Marchetti as saying that Clay Shaw, David Ferrie, E. Howard Hunt, Frank Sturgis, Bernard Barker, Charles Cabell, and Richard Nixon "were all working together in the CIA's Bay of Pigs planning operation."

Kennedy later fired Cabell. Cabell and Richard Bissell were in charge of the U-2 program. Lee Harvey Oswald was given a job within one week of his arrival in Dallas working on maps for the U-2 flights (Jim Garrison, On The Trail of The Assassins). In 1957, Oswald was a radar operator at the U-2 base in Atsugi, Japan.

General Cabell ordered the re-activation of Project Grudge on October 27, 1951, and on December 11, 1951, Major General John A. Stamford, "having replaced Major General Cabell as director of intelligence, was given a full briefing of the service's UFO program by Captain Edward J. Ruppelt and Colonel Frank Dunn, chief of the Air Technical Intelligence Center." (Flammonde, Paris, UFOs Exist! Ballantine Books, New York, 1976, p. 392-393.)

According to Leonard Moseley, Dulles, p. 366, Bissell "was a friend of Frank Wisner, and had first met Foster [John Foster Dulles] when Eleanor threw a party at McLean for her brothers, Vice-President Nixon, Bob Bowie, and other members of the administration." I don't have the proof, but I'll bet that Cabell and Bissell and Boris Pash were very cozy, especially when Cabell was second in command under Allen Dulles. Recall that Wisner was the CIA head of the Gehlen Nazi spy group.

END OF PART 29.

PART 30:

THE KENNEDY-NAZI CONNECTION

JFK's father, Joseph Kennedy, had a reputation of being pro-Nazi or at least pro-Hitler. Joe was a bootlegger and a member of the Mafia, although he hated the Jewish Mafia (Mishpucka) boss Meyer Lansky (real name Maier Suchowljansky). He was U.S. Ambassador to Britain but was recalled because of his pro-Hitler viewpoint. His code clerk was Tyler Kent, which is a story in itself.

In the book Final Judgment by Michael Collins Piper, you will find a story about DeWest Hooker. Hooker was a good friend of both Joseph Kennedy and George Lincoln Rockwell, Commander of the American Nazi Party. Piper tells of the arrangement made with Hooker and Rockwell to help JFK get elected. Hooker said, "Frankly, as far as I'm concerned, it was my work that got Johnny Kennedy in the White House." I suggest you read the book, it is available from Spotlight Newspaper or Liberty Lobby. If I quote small portions from it you probably would find it too hard to believe! I assure you the story is true, for I know well the man who was the bodyguard and stenographer/scribe to Commander Rockwell.

When Senator Joe McCarthy was conducting the hearings on Communists in the government, his assistant, seated at the same desk beside him, was Robert Kennedy. The Senator at the desk beside McCarthy was Senator John F. Kennedy. JFK was an insider who KNEW the source of the problems. When he became President, he fired the CIA heads, installed his brother as Attorney General, and said he was going to put the United States back on the silver standard, stop the Vietnam War, eliminate government involvement with the Mafia, and eliminate the Federal Reserve problem. It has also been reported that he was going to tell the truth about UFOs. Ten days after he gave a speech at Columbia University making these statements, he was murdered.

NAZI IMBECILES?

When Dornberger went to work for Bell, Bell recruited another former German army scientist, Krafft Ehricke, "who had been an adviser on the German wartime atom bomb project" according to Jack Manno, Arming The Heavens (Dodd, Mead & Co., 1948). We read a book that says Germany had no atomic bomb project, we read another that says they did. Manno said that Wolfgang Noggerath was brought in and put in charge of what became the Polaris missile. Willy

Fiedler was brought in and made chief of planning of the underwater launch systems for submarines.

Let me summarize for you the story as presented. We Americans were far ahead of the stupid Nazi Germans,although we had not yet made any atomic bombs. As the war was ending, we sent in teams and frantically searched for the German atomic scientists. We captured some of those dumb, incompetent scientists, quickly brought them to the United States in top secret programs that are still highly classified, we put those stupid losers in CHARGE of our projects, and we suddenly started making Atomic Bombs. An missiles - and satellites - and whatever else.

I just want to be sure you got the story straight.

COVER AND CONCEALMENT

Speaking of lies and deception, it would be reasonable to think that if our spy satellites were destroyed in 1977, as stated in Fire From The Sky, then there would have been all kinds of repercussions and a lot of people who depend on those satellites would know about it. How was the truth kept secret?

One part of the answer is revealed in a book called The Falcon And The Snowman by Robert Lindsey (Pocket Books, New York, 1979). This book tells the story of Christopher John Boyce. Boyce went to work for TRW on July 29, 1974. TRW is the company that made the Viking probe that went to Mars and the satellites which provided General George Keegan with information on the Russian activities at Semipalatinsk and such.

Boyce worked in the top-secret "black box" section, he was the man with the keys and codes to access the vault. He had access to Projects Rhyolite, Argus, Pyramider and "Project 20,030" files, projects which involved spy satellite data coming to the American base at Pine Gap (code named Moreno), Australia, near Alice Springs. He learned things that upset him, such as the CIA interference in Australian elections, the U.S. was lying to other governments, etc. Read the book for more of the story. He began stealing and selling secret documents to the Russian Embassy in Mexico and in January, 1977, he was arrested and charged with espionage.

"It came out during the Boyce-Lee trial that data from these satellites goes to a readout station in Australia - but not the one that monitors the early warning satellites. Instead, the data goes to a CIA-run complex in a valley called Pine Gap. After the Pine Gap computers have processed the data, it goes to the TRW Defense and Space Systems headquarters in Redondo Beach, California" (p.111, The New High Ground by Thomas Karas).

It was claimed that as a result of his selling secrets to the Soviets, the Soviets changed and encoded their transmissions, camouflaged their facilities, etc., so that the spy satellites suddenly no longer worked. Stansfield Turner, director of the CIA, said the results of Boyce's spying were "distressing, perhaps appalling."

As a result of his spying, we are told, the CIA no longer had satellite coverage of Iran, for instance, leading to the Iranian hostage crisis. Do you remember when the CIA was criticized for being surprised at the fall of the Shah and for not foreseeing the Iranian Hostage Crisis? In truth the U.S. DID know beforehand, as they orchestrated those events, but it is too much to try to cover here. Oh, what a tangled web... NOTHING is as it is presented to the public by our media and leaders.

"Our intelligence community is in disarray. A major satellite intelligence system, developed and deployed at a cost of billions of dollars over the past decade, without Soviet knowledge, has been compromised by intelligence procedures as porous as Swiss cheese." This was a statement made on December 8, 1878, by William Clements who was Deputy Secretary of Defense at the time Boyce worked in the Vault and who later became governor of Texas.

Would you be surprised to learn that Boyce may have been manipulated/set-up? Even the author of the book noticed mysteries: "Why TRW would place a $140-a-week, twenty-one-year-old college dropout in such a sensitive national-security position in the first place is, at least in retrospect, a puzzle. Circumstantially, TRW's decision to leave the Pyramider papers unlocked in the vault where Chris could read them shortly before his departure suggests they could have been left as bait. And there was the mystery of Daulton's [Boyce's assistant in crime] fingerprints on the circuit boards.

An FBI fingerprint expert testified that he had found Daulton's prints on a circuit board from one of the encrypting machines in the vault. Yet both the two spies, when denials meant nothing regarding whether they might be convicted or not, insisted that Daulton had never entered the vault nor had he ever touched the circuit boards. And certainly, the presence of a U.S. Embassy official at the Soviet Embassy on the morning of Daulton's arrest added another curiousity to the case" (p. 422).

Boyce's partner Daulton claimed that all along he was working undercover for the CIA. "The affair of the snowman and the spy who called himself the Falcon was an episode that demonstrated amazing ineptitude on the part of the Central Intelligence Agency" (p. 423).

Boyce's defense attorney George Chelius later developed a lucrative law practice in Orange County, California, catering to businessmen and land developers (p. 427).

A similar event was when William Kampiles sold the Russians a complete manual on the KH-11 (sometimes called the Big Bird, but technically not the same) satellite in March 1978. Kampiles was an operations clerk at CIA headquarters and resigned in October 1977, just after the Russian destruction of our satellites. In February 1978 he went to Athens, Greece. On February 23, he went to the Soviet Embassy and started making arrangements to sell them the documents. He was arrested and went to trial in November 1978 and was sentenced to 40 years.

The facility at Pine Gap, Australia, is something that needs a closer look. Stan Deyo, in The Cosmic Conspiracy, tells of a multi-national consortium at Pine Gap that have "radical atmospheric vehicles." In other words, UFOs have been seen going in and out of Pine Gap. Deyo mentions that Dr. Vannevar Bush (claimed to be a member of MJ-12) made repeated visits to the area. Deyo says they are conducting research on crashed UFO residue at Pine Gap.

I will close this section with something to ponder: Astronomer Dr. James Greenacre and four colleagues at a conference on "Moon Problems" in New York in 1964 said that on 29 October 1963 they observed several colorful spots on the moon that moved in formation. One month later Greenacre observed the same phenomena.

The May 1966 issue of UFO Nachrichten. Vol. 117, said: "Prof. Dr. Greenacre saw on or close to the moon at least 31 space craft of gigantic size. Some were from 300 meters to 4.8 kilometers long. They were in motion while being observed through the telescopes. Also, clearly discernible were numerous smaller craft approximately 150 meters in diameter, which moved past or alongside the huge craft, the 'mother craft' occasionally changing color, as in the often-reported, pulsating style."

Keep looking up.

-Caveat Lector-

Dale, I am on the Conspiracy Theory Research List and saw the message you sent. I have to smile at your statement "Calvin is quite sensitive about any questioning of his conclusions about the world" and you said I stopped communicating with you because of something you said.

No, my friend, the medium of email does not convey the nuances of messages and people often misunderstand. If I was sensitive about what people thought about what I write I would not write it. I have no ill will nor any other negative feeling against you or your questions! I am just very busy, and I routinely get about 50 to 150 emails A DAY (many from this list) and I simply cannot keep up with all of it.

By the way, I appreciate your posting the Fire From The Sky document on the internet, at the time I did not know how and was not even on the internet (except for some business networks that technically was internet I suppose).

As to Bush, Hoover, etc. being shape-shifters, I did not think that was a question -- how would I know whether they are or not? Although in fact the Russians made their breakthrough in scalar technology in the 1970's and developed clones in the late 1970's using physics that involves holograms, which could lead to more understanding of the shape-shifting phenomena. At some point, everything in the universe is a shape-shifter. You can find more than you wanted to know on this from Tom Bearden, Walter Russell and David Icke.

Since I am the "One Who Knows" of the original Battle of the Harvest Moon document, how about I make some statements to clear up some points (which will only cause more questions, I know).

The name "One Who Knows" was not my idea, it was given to me by a man who was in solitary confinement in prison as a direct result of what he knew about the Mena, Arkansas, Bush/Clinton drug operation. It is explained in my Fire From the Sky document, the various internet versions of it may or may not contain the story.

In the 1970's I worked in the secret section of Control Data Corporation in Sunnyvale, Calif. CDC had the world's most powerful computers at the time: the Cyber series, the Star 100, the Cray (Seymour Cray worked for Control Data. Later when he started his own company, Norris the owner of CDC financed the Cray Corporation and owned part of it). As a direct result we worked on the United States' most secret projects. Such as weather satellites -- which do more than weather, such as the computers under Cheyenne Mountain, and such as spy satellites. I had two security clearances, one official and one unofficial.

The security clearances and all are really beside the point, because most everything I wrote was already written somewhere else. Although I am the author of the Fire From The Sky document, I point out that it is just quotations from others. I was a compiler more than an author.

You stated that the writings were channeled through George Green and Doris Ekker from Hatonn (pronouncedd Aton). Well, Green was just a publisher, Doris was the channeler and the channeled material was mostly spiritual. The Battle of the Harvest Moon material did not come from Hatonn, it came from Dr. P. D. Beter who was involved in clandestine activities for MI6 and the Queen of England, he was assigned to the Export/Import Bank by President Kennedy.

Beter praticed law before the U.S. Supreme Court, he knew Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff General George Brown personally and had secret contacts with Brown. Beter also had contact with extraterrestrials, he was the go-between between Brown and Hatonn. Brown got canned and later murdered because of that contact.

Yes, some of the Nazi's escaped and made contacts that lead directly to Ronald Reagan and George Bush. I am sure you know this already.

Yes, the astronauts went to the moon - but NASA lied about the whole program and gave us a false story. Check with Richard Hoagland, R. Rene, etc. Many have seen that the NASA material is hoaxed and have concluded that we did not go to the moon. We went to the moon all right, but that true story is highly classified. One of the original plans for the moon program is in the back of the book The Day After Roswell by Philip Curso.

I used to get a note every week from a man who was the camera operator for the moon landing hoaxed films. He died a few months ago now so I can't refer you to him. Just do your homework --the year that Gus Grissom, Edgar White and Roger Chaffee (Chaffee was U2 pilot with Frances Gary Powers and pilot that took the pictures that led to the Cuban Missile Crisis. The man who read the pictures and reported to the President is one of my customers, he works for the Texas Department of Transportation, and another of the U2 pilots is a friend of mine who is also my competitor, his business is the same as mine and his shop is across town from me) and a total of 8 astronauts were MURDERED the same year because they resisted the hoax. The rest of the astronauts got the message and went along with the program.

You stated "neither interviewed anyone with first hand knowledge." Well, talking about real first hand knowledge can get you suicided. I was first hand and I saw some of what was happening and I just point out to others some of what is going on. In fact, I know more than I tell but no one would even understand it if I told it much less believe it. So it is no different from if I knew nothing -- just do your own homework and I can help you know where to look if you wish.

"Contact was financed primarily through money provided by a wealthy eccentric from Austin, TX." Once again, no. Dave Overton the "wealthy eccentric" was my friend and customer, he bought the gold from me. When he died, the newspaper interviewed me and then printed a fantasy story that had little to do with the truth. They did not use ANYTHING that I told them, as far as I rememember and could tell. Dave tried to give the gold to Contact, but George Green stole it. It was not used in any way to finance Contact, they never got it. Just recently the gold was disposed but it still did not go to Contact.

When Contact Newspaper printed my letters to the man in solitary confinement which became the Fire From the Sky document, even they got some things wrong. One thing that comes to mind, I wrote that the National Reconnaissance Office developed the KH-11 satellite and I said it had a Byeman name Kennan. The proofreaders changed that to "by a man named Kennan." No, it was right exactly as I wrote it, the Byeman names were a method of code nameing. One of the projects that I worked on at Control Data was the KH-11. They also had SI (Special Intelligence) and TK (Talent-Keyhole) codenames, but that is ancient history now.

The U2 was Byeman code named Idealist and the SR71 (I did the billing for the SR71 program) was Oxcart. Tony Craddock, researcher and web master for CSETI told me that he has contacts in the NSA, Pentagon, CIA etc. and they all confirmed that everything in the Fire From The Sky document was true. Even the cloning of humans which began in the 1970s. You might contact him and see what he is willing to tell, and while you are at it, consider supporting CSETI, they have given presentations to the United Nations, the Pentagon, all the Chiefs of Staff of the military, etc., trying to break the secrecy seal on the UFO subject. Once the seal is broken, you people are going to be shocked, I can assure you. He is at http://www.cseti.org.

Best to you and all.

INTRODUCTION

Dear Reader,

Let us introduce ourselves. We are two old women in our seventies who are still laboring and fighting in the trenches of the psychological and spiritual war against the evils of mind control and ritual abuse.

Wendy Hoffman, LCSW-C, is an American licensed clinical social worker who, more importantly, was a victim of organized mind control and ritual abuse from birth. She lived most of her life with her brain segmented and partitioned into thousands of parts, each trained for a specific task by the mind controllers. Struggling to get free, she eventually found the way to access her dissociated memories and reunite her brain. She has written two memoirs about her life experiences, The Enslaved Queen (2014) and White Witch in a Black Robe (2016a), as well as Forceps (2016b) a book of poetry about the rebirth of her self.

Alison Miller, PhD, is a Canadian clinical psychologist who worked initially in child and family therapy and parent education but, since 1990, has worked with survivors of mind control and ritual abuse. She has written Healing the Unimaginable: Treating Ritual Abuse and Mind Control for therapists, and Becoming Yourself: Overcoming Mind Control and Ritual Abuse for survivors.

We connected initially as therapist and client, and worked very hard to undo Wendy's mind control. Over the past few years, as our knowledge and understanding of these evils have increased, we have each been writing small articles or essays on various topics connected with the battle we are fighting. We have gathered these essays together into this book, From the Trenches. Rather than having a logical development of ideas from chapter to chapter, this book has collected the essays into topical sections, ending with Wendy's odes to the different kinds of inner parts, some of who lived her mind-controlled life, and also live in other survivors' inner worlds.

You may read them in any order you wish. Some of these essays are directed primarily to survivors, others to therapists and support people. If you are inexperienced with the subject matter, you might want to read our other books first, since some of the material in this book is quite advanced and will make the most sense to someone who understands how mind control works and what atrocities the mind controllers perpetrate.

We want to encourage survivors to find their whole selves and not give in to the fears perpetrators put in them, therapists to brave the complexities and horrors of this challenging and fascinating work, and supporters to rally to help those who have been victimized from infancy for the misfortune of being born into the wrong family. Every time someone gets free or desires to be free, victims, their therapists and helpers make another tear, another slit in the membrane of the soul of evil. We are all in this together, and together we can bring this empire down. It may not be completed in this generation, but it has begun.

Protest

Ella Wheeler Wilcox

To sin by silence, when we should protest,
Makes cowards out of men. The human race
Has climbed on protest. Had no voice been raised Against injustice, ignorance, and lust,
The inquisition yet would serve the law,
And guillotines decide our least disputes.
The few who dare, must speak and speak again
To right the wrongs of many. Speech, thank God,
No vested power in this great day and land
Can gag or throttle. Press and voice may cry
Loud disapproval of existing ills;
May criticise oppression and condemn
The lawlessness of wealth-protecting laws
That let the children and childbearers toil
To purchase ease for idle millionaires.

Therefore I do protest against the boast
Of independence in this mighty land.
Call no chain strong, which holds one rusted link.
Call no land free, that holds one fettered slave.
Until the manacled slim wrists of babes
Are loosed to toss in childish sport and glee,
Until the mother bears no burden, save
The precious one beneath her heart, until God’s soil is rescued from the clutch of greed
And given back to labor, let no man
Call this the land of freedom.

SECTION I

UNDERSTANDING MIND CONTROL

A dozen myths therapists might believe

Alison Miller

Therapists with the usual kinds of training believe some myths that can impede their effectiveness in treating survivors of mind control and ritual abuse. Here are some I have heard.

1. Myth: DID (dissociative identity disorder, which used to be called multiple personality disorder, MPD) is rare, if it exists at all. The reality is it that it affects at least 1% of the population. And if you include the people whose hundreds or thousands of segregated and organized parts are hidden behind a deceptive front, it is probably a much greater number. Many more people have ego states from unhappy or frightening experiences and can be overcome by strong emotions or false beliefs without actually having DID. They do not have access to the original cause of those emotional states, so tend to blame them on the present.

2. Myth: Hearing voices always indicates psychosis. The term "schizophrenia" means "split mind," which means having a dissociative disorder rather than a brain disease. Historically, the two conditions became mixed up. Now we are aware that dissociative people, whom I shall call multiples, are survivors of severe childhood trauma, whereas genuine schizophrenics might well have a brain disease. Many people who hear voices are dissociative, and are hearing other parts of themselves talking to them or to one another. Other people hear thoughts out loud in their heads. This does not mean they are psychotic. Hallucinations can be flashbacks of abuse, and apparent delusions can be beliefs implanted by perpetrators (See the section on Lies.) Many people who have dissociative disorders are misdiagnosed as schizophrenic, especially if they talk about demons, or Satan, or the CIA, or mind control. They are likely to be survivors of organized abuse, and might be trying to tell their story to people who just write them off as deluded.

3. Myth: People who frequently change their mood and emotional state, their perceptions, and their attitudes suffer from bipolar disorder and/or attention deficit disorder and/or schizophrenia. Before diagnosing someone with any disorder that requires chemical treatment, it is important to rule out dissociative disorders, the conditions in which someone has many, relatively independent, "selves." Apparent attention deficit disorder can also really be hypervigilance, someone who has been abused constantly looking around for danger. Apparent bipolar disorder, especially the rapid-cycling type, can really be dissociative switching as different parts come to the forefront.

4. Myth: There are effective brief therapy methods, such as cognitive–behavioral therapy, which will cure survivors. When a person is severely abused on a regular basis for his or her entire childhood, and usually beyond, it is dishonoring to the survivor to suggest that three or four, or even a dozen, sessions of some special technique will clear up all the effects of this abuse. Victims of mind control and ritual abuse have suffered more than any other group of victims that I have heard of. We rightly make a big fuss about post traumatic stress disorder in military veterans and victims of rape. But what about victims of complex trauma, including emotional abandonment, infant and ongoing torture, child prostitution, and forced perpetration for years on end? Let us not kid ourselves about brief magic cures. "Empirically validated therapies" are useful for single contained problems. Recovery from mind control and ritual abuse rightfully takes years.

5. Myth: The front person ("host") in a dissociative individual is real and the others are not. All parts of a person are parts of the same brain, whose electrical circuits were segregated by severe early trauma. The front person is just a part who is specialized for dealing with daily life, which means that this part knows little or nothing about the trauma or the life of the other parts. The average multiple has a series of front people at different stages of life. They are no more real or unreal than the other parts. Front people often say that they feel unreal, because they are only a small part of a person.

6. Myth: Therapists should always work just with the front person, not talk to the "alters." Multiplicity cannot be resolved without communication with the inside parts who hold the memory narratives, body sensations, and feelings from the trauma. The front person is sometimes too fragile to handle knowing those memories, and, in any case, he or she cannot find out what happened without communicating with the inside parts. Therapy with just the front person will get nowhere, because symptoms such as anxiety and depression, flashbacks and nightmares arise mainly from the hidden parts.

7. Myth: All ritual abusers are satanists. Many different groups use mind control on children: extremist political groups, intelligence agencies, organized crime, child pornographers, and, yes, satanists. All these groups also attempt to control the general population via the media.

8. Myth: Survivors do not have the ability to recognize whether their memories are real. Perpetrator groups put a lot of effort into convincing their victims that the memories that pop up unbidden are imagination, or something they saw on television, or anything other than reality. They also put a lot of effort into convincing society that certain kinds of bad things do not really happen, so if someone believes they happened to him or her, that person must be deceived and be having "false memories," possibly suggested by a therapist.

The reality is that survivors have very real memories, but these include memories of deceptions such as simulated murder and people in costumes. They also have memories of being told, while under the influence of drugs, hypnosis, and torture, that something quite different happened. Perpetrator groups work hard to make sure that what survivors believe to be their memories are distorted. They disguise identities. They often tell their lies to child parts in adults, as well as to actual children, giving false interpretations of what happened, interpretations which the child or child part has to accept or face dire consequences. It is, therefore, a very difficult task for a survivor to put together the entirety of a memory accurately. It requires bringing together all the insiders who have any part of that memory, including the part where they were taught false interpretations.

Still, many survivors know from bodily sensations as well as emotions that they must have had such experiences, regardless of whether the general public believes them or mother says they are invented. The body does not lie. Survivors can be strong and persistent in sorting out reality from the distortions taught to them by the perpetrators.

9. Myth: Ritual abuse survivors are overly concerned about holidays and special dates, and these do not really matter. These dates matter most to survivors of abuse by ritualistic, usually satanic, cults. That is because these groups expect their victims to attend rituals on these dates, which include the victim's own and family members' birthdays as well as major Christian and pagan holidays. Sometimes, a survivor is actually safe, but even then he or she is likely to have flashbacks and nightmares of the abuse that happened on these dates. More often, the survivor is still in touch with family members and is expected to attend the rituals.

10. Myth: Demons attached to, or inserted in, children are real and must be ousted. While I recognize that we cannot say with certainty whether or not evil spiritual entities exist, I can say, with quite a bit of certainty, that the "demons" that are attached to, or inserted in, children by ritually abusing perpetrator groups are simply child parts of the person, split off by a combination of drugs, threats, torture, terror, and forced perpetration. I have been working with ritual abuse survivors for twenty-seven years, and I have never met a real demon, but I have met a considerable number of fake demons. I have had clients on whom exorcisms or deliverances were performed, and the result was that "demon" parts went into hiding out of fear, taking with them the memories which needed to be processed for healing. They were afraid to be known to me because of the fear that I might try to destroy them. I have heard of other cases where these parts became angry and punished the rest of the personality system. Would you not do that if someone tried to kick you out of the only society you knew?

11. Myth: Most survivors are not currently harassed. Perpetrator groups who deliberately create dissociative disorders in their victims are very concerned about keeping their criminal activities, such as rape, murder, child prostitution, and pornography, secret. If a survivor begins to remember and tell about things that the group wants kept secret, parts of the survivor report this to a group member, and harassment begins. There is re-abuse, along with serious threats to the survivor, the person the survivor tells, and anyone the survivor loves. Harassment of survivors is very common, and might be lifelong. Survivors tend to believe the threats, including those to therapists, so might not tell their therapists about what is happening in the present. It is important to realize that physical harm to a therapist is very rare, because it can compromise the group's security. Perpetrator groups prefer to remain hidden from therapists, and find ways to discredit effective therapists, such as inducing clients to sue them or making complaints to their licensing boards.

Therapists, pay attention to subtle changes in your clients. If a client is suddenly angry at you without cause, as in the example I give in "Therapists' responses to survivors" (later in this book), it could indicate that perpetrators are trying to turn him or her against you. If a survivor client has physical symptoms which do not appear to arise from a physical cause, he or she could have been beaten up and not remember it. These things could arise from cult-loyal parts of them doing their jobs, but if that is not the case, the next possibility is current harassment that they do not remember. Wendy had persistent ear pain, especially when she took a plane journey to a conference and when she flew to visit me. The doctors could not find the cause afterwards. She was unaware that she had been beaten up just before taking the journeys. Doctors do not look for adults' symptoms being caused by current abuse.

12. Myth: Survivors of mind control and ritual abuse cannot recover. This is what the perpetrators want them, and you, to believe. Yes, people whose brains have been subdivided from birth through horrific experiences will need to undergo a long journey of recovery. But they can recover, their minds can be whole again, and they can become the persons they choose to be. The younger they begin this process, the longer they will have to live their own lives.

Pieces of self

Wendy Hoffman

If you are going to have a brain that is smashed into pieces, your perpetrators have to start when you are young—in infancy or before. The first splits are usually done when you are about one month old or under. Perpetrators create thirteen distinct sections of the mind then, one after the other, sometimes without a pause. Jobs will be assigned to each division and extensive trainings will begin as the infant victim ages. They teach visual and aural cues to trigger the robotic parts the mind controllers created. Years later, the perpetrators might braid and twist together pieces from some of the thirteen columns, or "edifices," or "rivers" to be used for more complex and secret criminal tasks. Life does not improve as you age unless you achieve prolonged physical safety.

Your task, if you are a victim attempting to find your way through these mazes of torture and dissociation, is to find the very young infant parts, and the memories of the infant splits. Just acknowledging that these splits exist helps loosen the whole internal mind control structure.

As you get to know the older parts created to do horrendous jobs for no money or reward and without you knowing what you had done, as you begin to take in the reality of your life as a blind automaton, as you realize you have been only a mindless puppet with tight strings intact, you will find all that overwhelming. Despair can be great, anger greater. Plus sadness that you have not had a life you can call your own. Integration—when the divisions of the mind self-erase and you get to know your abused selves—usually occurs in waves. After the one or two tidal waves when most of the pieces of brain come together, you often find fail-safe measures. There is should-you-ever-integrate-programming. Mine was placed under layers of psychedelic plastic sheets. Here, my infamous mind controller sectioned off little pieces of my main role—that of being one of the Illuminati queens—and hid them "never to be found" under these toxic barricades.

First, you work either up the internal hierarchy to the leaders of the system or down the hierarchy to the tortured infants. These parts spontaneously meld together. There might be one or more tidal waves of coming together. Always be on the lookout for a section or sections you have not found yet. Huge drug and electrical walls separate internal sections. The sections of your mind weave and braid together. Even if you do not want one solid chunk of mind, it will happen. Roots gravitate to water. Birds copulate in the air. Our minds want to be whole. We were created to be whole. Nature is stronger than crime. We can go back to our evolutionary beginnings. We can become both a new person and who we were from the beginning, as if untampered with. Humans cannot fight nature. Humans cannot fight God. Our lives can be un-usurped.

Look for the little pieces of self that are hidden away even after the major integrations. Even if these parts seem dead, carry them home, no matter how heavy they are. Lug them down masonic steps, out of burning buildings, unlock prison gates, open freezer doors, rip open barricades. Have a joyous celebration of reunification. Now you are whole. Now you are you. No one took your soul away permanently. You are the more powerful.

How to talk with a multiple*

Alison Miller

We tend to assume other people are like ourselves, unless they are in some way visibly different. For example, when someone has a different skin color or a strong foreign accent, we are aware that they may be different. But when they look and sound the same as us, it is difficult for us to understand that they may be different in their background and way of thinking.

One of the kinds of people we often have difficulty understanding is the person with a dissociated identity, an identity split into many selves rather than a single one. This condition used to be called "multiple personalities." In this essay, I am using the term "multiple," because some of my clients who are multiple prefer it to the more general term "dissociative," which can have many meanings. Everyone dissociates to some extent—for example, many people dissociate certain emotions and never consciously feel them. Everyone also has different parts of the self, but most of the population is not multiple.

People who have been through severe childhood abuse or other trauma have often learned to handle life through several different

* Much of the material in this chapter was also in Chapter Three of Healing the Unimaginable.

"selves" rather than a single unified self. Becoming many selves rather than one is a biological process in the brain that results from severe early trauma, which is often life threatening. Becoming multiple is not something that the person chooses, and it cannot begin in adulthood, only in early childhood. It is not just a product of creative imagination. Although all these "selves" are really parts of one person, they may experience themselves and one another as separate people.

A multiple's experience of life is very different from that of someone who has never been multiple. For someone who has always been a single personality, it is difficult to understand how a person who is multiple thinks. Often relatives and friends of a multiple, as well as support people and even therapists and other professionals, are unclear about how to talk to such a person. Here are a few thoughts which might help you understand the people you know who have multiple, rather than single, identities.

Talking with a multiple is like talking with someone from another culture

Although a multiple might not be visibly different from anyone else, the way he or she thinks is incredibly different, at least as different as the way someone thinks who comes from a completely different culture. We do not (or, at least, we should not) blame people from other cultural backgrounds for being different from us and for not completely understanding our culture. It is important to treat a multiple person with dignity and respect, just as you would someone from a foreign culture whose values and customs you do not yet understand.

First of all, do not assume that a multiple is really like you. They may look the same, but they are different. The dominant culture is one of non-multiples, so multiples have learned to hide their multiplicity and imitate those of us who are have a single personality ("singletons"). But it is only an imitation. Survivors of the kind of enforced mind control addressed in this book are all multiple, whether or not they are aware of it. They are programmed to hide their multiplicity, as mind control depends on multiplicity, and the people who abused them to make them multiple do not want any visible signs of the abuse.

A person who has a single personality cannot become a multiple at will. It requires many severe early traumatic experiences (such as sexual abuse and/or torture) to make a person's brain put up the barriers which give them several or many identities. Survivors of childhood mind control usually have hundreds of separately trained parts. Similarly, a multiple cannot become a singleton until and unless the barriers between the parts of the self ("alter personalities" or inner selves) are removed. Those barriers were put up for a purpose, so that the child could survive the abuse (from the victim's perspective), and so that the child will not remember what happened (from the abusers' perspective.) People who are multiple cannot think like us, and we cannot think like them, but we can learn to understand one another with respect for our differences.

Once you recognize the multiple is different from you, it is important to ask him or her to be your teacher about being multiple. You cannot just guess about it; you have to ask. Those multiples who are aware of their condition are usually glad to be asked. They get very lonely because they are not understood by other people. Child personalities in adult bodies, for example, sometimes feel nobody else understands them or recognizes their existence. They often like to be known, recognized, and talked to as the age they feel they are rather than the age the body is. Although you must be careful with this—child parts are all different: some are shy and some are outgoing; some like attention and others hate it.

When you ask what it is like to be multiple, be careful not to treat the person as if she or he is a curiosity. I remember how embarrassed I felt on my first night as a student in India, when I got changed for bed in a university residence, and a crowd of young women gathered to stare at me to see whether I was the same color all over! Just because a person is different does not mean she is less than human. I did not like having to "perform" (for example, sing English hit parade songs) for other students in India, while they all giggled at me and talked about how cute I was. Similarly, multiples do not like having to "perform" (for example, let child parts come out) for the entertainment of singletons. They are people, too, and their human dignity is important.

For a multiple, being multiple is his or her normal state of mind. It is difficult for him or her to understand how singletons think, and he or she may think it is you who are strange. That is, if he or she even knows that you are not like him or her. I have met several multiples who just assume that everyone else "loses" periods of time (when another "front person" part is in charge of the body), finds themselves in places without knowing how they got there, and/or hears voices or audible thoughts inside their head.

We singletons are well adapted for living in safety, being conscious of everything that happens to us. A multiple is well adapted for living with ongoing trauma. I once heard a prison psychologist say he would not treat multiples in prison, because to survive well in prison you needed to be multiple, as prison is so traumatic. Even in normal life there are sometimes advantages to being multiple. I knew a multiple who had a part called "Brain" who memorized all her textbooks and was able to remember everything on exams word for word. I knew another who had parts with all kinds of special "idiot savant" abilities. When a part is able to focus on only one thing, without the distractions of emotions, everyday life, and other thoughts, he or she may be able to perform that task exceptionally well. Abuser groups use this to train parts in special skills such as memorizing information to deliver to politicians.

Just as you should not assume that someone from another culture should want to join your culture and give up his or her own, do not assume that a multiple wants to become a singleton. Some do, some do not. Many well-adapted multiples, whose parts cooperate well, prefer to stay as a community of coordinated selves rather than become a single self. They feel that they would be lonely without insiders to talk with. They forget, however, that many of those insiders are still in pain or trapped in horrible memories, and also that leaving programming untouched can put them in danger.

Talking with a multiple is like talking with people who change places undetectably

Imagine there are a number of identical brothers or sisters who impersonate one another. They are able to change places so fast that you cannot detect it, so fast that you may talk to many within one conversation. However, if you know them as individuals, you learn to recognize them not by their physical appearance but by their characteristic moods, tones of voice, facial expressions, and other body language. It is the same with alter personalities (parts) of multiples. They look the same, but they act differently. You may also see physical evidence of them changing places in eye movements, body tremors, losing track of conversation, and other subtle signs. Most multiples, however, do not show dramatic physical symptoms of “switching.” Many (but not all) deliberately designed multiples have a “front” or “shell” part who is out all the time, along with other parts who change behind the shell. The shell part bridges the transitions smoothly so the individual does not appear multiple at all. However, such people sometimes have parts who can take over entirely, with the front part disappeared inside and unaware that time has been lost. The larger the number of parts, the less detectable will be the switches. And the more inner communication is established between the parts (usually through therapy), the easier will be the transitions between parts being “out” (in control of the body), since some may listen in on others’ conversations in the world. Often, the only sign of a switch might be the body language of another part. Survivors of complex mind control may be trained to switch seamlessly and to sound like adults at all times, except when their external controllers call out hidden child parts for torture, training, or reporting. Others are designed to look “crazy” through constant switching.

One confusing thing about many multiples is that at one time they may completely know and believe that they are multiple, and at another time they may deny it completely. Most multiples have at least one “front person,” whose purpose is to deal with the normal outside world and handle everyday normal life. When a child is being abused on an ongoing basis, he or she needs to be able to function even though the abuse is occurring. So, the child develops a “front person” (formerly known as the “host” personality, in contrast to the “alter” personalities) who is unaware of the abuse and also of the multiplicity. The term “host” is a misleading term, developed by singletons who assumed that the front person is more real or more important than the other parts. That is why I prefer “front person.”

Sometimes there are several front people, each of whom assumes he or she is the real one and is amnestic for the existence of the others. Some front people have a great deal of difficulty accepting that they are multiple. The word “personalities” or “alters” might frighten them. Whether the person acknowledges that he or she is multiple, then, depends on who is “out” in conscious control of the body and on how much contact the front person has with the “inside world.” Some multiples always have the front person present in everyday life and in therapy sessions, even when another part is in control of the behavior and feelings. These people are generally not diagnosed with dissociative identity disorder (DID), and do not "lose time" in the same way that those who are diagnosed with DID do, in the middle of a regular day. Some people used to be visibly multiple when they were young, but with maturity and a stable, safe life, have developed a strong person who handles all of present-day life. Many things are easier for such people than for DID multiples, because they do not lose time or find money has been spent on toys. However, it is easier for such a person than for someone with DID to assume that negative feelings are caused by present situations when they actually come from old traumas which have been triggered by something in the present. Parts with these feelings are often lurking just behind the front person. One such multiple described herself as having someone like a plastic lens in the front, with four chairs just behind it, and different people occupying those chairs at different times.

Multiples who have accepted their multiplicity often call their parts "people"; this is who they are to them. They are just as real to them as people on the outside. Other multiples, who are less aware of those on the inside, find "parts" or "inner children" more acceptable terms. Although the parts or "selves" feel themselves to be complete persons, each tends to have a specific function and most of them are, in a way, one-dimensional. Do not assume that the front personality is the "real" person and the other personalities are less real. A question such as, "Is this Jane, or one of the alters?" is very irritating to multiples, especially if it happens not to be Jane who is "out." The front person is just a part, often one with little power in the system, little memory of what happened, and limited energy or emotions. In my experience, multiples in whom there is one strong front person tend to be those who were abused or traumatized for only a brief period of time, usually outside the home. Their long period of safety allowed them to build a strong "outside world" personality, but they still have hidden split-off parts, who either come out only occasionally or never come out but influence their behavior and feelings from time to time. Do not assume that the front person is able to control the behavior of the other parts if he or she only "takes responsibility." If a multiple's front person tells you that someone inside wants to kill her, for example, she is telling you that she does not have control over it, and telling her to take control will not help.

Since parts change places a lot, you should not assume that the person you are talking to remembers what the body has seen, heard, done, or said, even five minutes ago. Amnesia is a major distinguishing characteristic of multiples, especially if they have DID. If the part who was "out" when something happened has "gone inside", the person will not remember what happened. Multiples learn to cover up for loss of time. It is common that a multiple who does not yet know he or she is multiple does not realize time has been lost, and will deny doing things he or she has been seen doing, leading to a reputation as a liar. When a multiple realizes that another part may have done it, he or she will often pretend to remember the incident to hide the time loss. However, the awareness may spur some on to delve into their minds and discover dissociation.

When meeting new inside parts, do not assume they are orientated in time and place. They often believe they are still living in the situation where the abuse occurred, or some other past time. Often, they do not know that the body has grown up. I find it helpful to have a newspaper or magazine with a recent date to show them the year, and to have a mirror so they can see what their body looks like now, though sometimes this is too great a shock for them if many years have gone by, and many multiples are afraid of mirrors because mirrors were used to deceive them.

Kinds of parts or personalities

Many, usually a majority, of the parts feel themselves to be children, so you should not assume you are talking to an adult at all times. There could be some who are too young to talk or to understand language. Although it is controversial among therapists who treat people with dissociated identities, I believe that child parts of a multiple split off during childhood, not later, and are still developmentally children. They are not "normal" children, however. The "happy" ones tend to deny negative reality and get themselves into abusive situations. The "unhappy" ones hold strong emotions such as fear and anger. Child parts are often concrete and literal in their thought processes and awkward with their bodies, and might hold superstitious childish beliefs, communicated to them by abusers during the person's actual childhood. I have had the experience of an adult woman sitting on the floor and putting out her feet for me to tie her shoes, assuming she was in preschool. I have been with an adult man when he stood on his head on my office couch, because the child that he “was” at that moment preferred that position. I have been with adults whose “out” personalities knew no English, but spoke languages the person had learned in early childhood and then forgotten. I have had a woman fall down my office stairs because a baby part who did not know how to walk came “out” at the top of the stairs. (After that, I started making home visits to her.)

Some therapists who work with dissociative disorders believe that child parts are actually adults’ conceptions of what children are like, rather than actual children. I do not believe this myself, but I do believe that a part who says he or she is older than the body is not really older, but is a child’s, or a young adult’s, conception of an older person. And an opposite-sex part (a male in a female body, for instance) is more like a young girl’s idea of what a boy is like than like a real boy. Boys in women’s bodies usually represent the part of the person who has traits that are traditionally considered masculine, such as bravery or anger; girls in men’s bodies often have supposedly “feminine” traits such as fear. It is not worth arguing with parts about whether they really are what they believe they are. It is more important to treat the whole person with respect, in whatever aspect he or she presents to you (though it is important for all parts eventually to learn that they share a single body in the real world). The person had very important reasons for making parts the way they are. For example, a part may be a boy because boys do not have vaginas so he cannot be vaginally raped.

Some parts experience themselves as blind or deaf or mute, often as a result of a literal response to their abusers (“Do not talk about this” or “Do not look”). Some are “copy” parts (the technical term is “introjects”) who believe they are someone else entirely; for example, a relative or an abuser. Do not deny the experience of any part. Each genuinely believes it is the person’s mother, or a person of the opposite sex, or a dog, even though they are mistaken.

Some multiples have parts who think they are supernatural beings, such as demons. If they say this, they are mistaken. Often a child who has been shamed, verbally abused, and told they are evil, or made to do evil things by an abuser, can believe him or herself to be a demon. Some perpetrator groups actually tell child parts they are demons or devils or ghosts. Trying to exorcise “demon” parts of a person will only hinder their progress. Such parts need to be cared for like any child, and the responsibility for their abuse given back to the abusers rather than to any part of the child.

It is important to realize that parts have separate memories, feelings, and approaches to life, and do not necessarily know what the other parts do or think, even though they are actually all parts of one person. Each part, including the front person, is very limited. Although he or she has a sense of separate identity and agency, he or she is unable to feel some emotions or engage in some behaviors. Many parts, especially front people, feel hollow, depersonalized, or uncertain of their identity, precisely because they are just part of a whole. Nevertheless, they and others in the system experience them as separate (wounded) people.

Multiples and responsibility

Alter personalities (parts) hold memories only of the experiences in the person's life which those parts have actually lived. One part cannot be held responsible for events they actually do not remember or had no control over. I once treated a ten-year-old girl who had just one inner part in addition to the main person, a three-year-old with the same name as her. When she got bored in school, the ten-year-old would "go inside" her head, and the three-year-old would come "out" into the body and behave like a three-year-old, which was inappropriate for the classroom. The ten-year-old would then find herself in the school office in trouble with the principal, without any idea of what had happened. While the whole person could be said to be responsible for the behavior, the ten-year-old was not, and the three-year-old was too young to realize what was wrong with her behavior. Sometimes, when an inappropriate behavior happens, the front person just does not know about it, and is only aware of "lost time." At other times, the front person may be conscious of what is happening but unable to control it.

Be especially careful about assigning responsibility and blame—the part you are talking to may not be responsible for a behavior or even know about it. Most multiples have been abused emotionally as well as (usually) physically and sexually, and are very sensitive to blame. The whole story of their lives in the "outside" world is of being held responsible for things they do not remember doing. They are accused of lying and manipulating. They might, at times, lie and manipulate, especially when parts are out who are very young or who cannot feel pain or cannot feel guilt. But much of the time they just do not know what happened, or know but had no control over it.

If you want to deal with issues of responsibility, find and talk with the part who is actually responsible. This may be either the part who performed the behavior, or another part who made him or her do it. Remember to be gentle even with the part who is responsible. People who lie and manipulate, whether or not they are multiple, have usually learned to do this because of living with severe punishment. It takes experience in a safe world to learn more direct strategies of getting needs met.

Talking with a multiple is like talking on the phone with a group of housemates

Although only one part at a time can control the multiple's voice and actually talk with you, many can hear you and can send messages to you. Talking to a multiple is like being on the phone to someone in a large house. Only one person at a time is able to speak to you but the house phone has a speaker which broadcasts your words to others in the vicinity, so that they can hear you and can speak to the one on the phone and send messages to you. The person who was on the phone a minute ago may be nearby listening or may be completely out of the room. Those outside the range of the speaker cannot hear you, but someone can be sent to get them.

Do assume that some others inside can hear you even when one part is on the outside, or can be sent a message. This applies even when the presenting part is deaf, catatonic, or a baby. You can talk through the presenting part to others in the system. Not everyone can hear you, but many, especially the important ones, can. Especially with a mind-controlled multiple, the important parts are always listening in order to guard the person's safety and the perpetrator group's security in the outside world.

When multiples begin therapy, they often do not have very good internal communication. It is important to assist them in improving this communication. I frequently ask other parts to speak to the one on the "phone" to me, letting this one know the answer to some question I asked. For example, when a part was grieving because she did not remember what her dead mother looked like, I asked the others listening to give her a picture of her mother, and she not only saw a picture, she heard her mother's voice. I encourage the one on the "phone" (talking with me) to "ask inside" to the others and get to know them. I respect the ones who come out spontaneously to talk with me, but I also ask to speak to others, and if they will not (or are not permitted to) speak to me directly, then I ask that messages be relayed back and forth to them.

Talking with a multiple is talking with someone who has been badly abused

Although DID stands for "dissociative identity disorder," I regard it as mental injury rather than mental illness. The way a person becomes multiple is through severe and prolonged early trauma, usually child abuse. Many of the parts of a multiple have known nothing but abuse. So they will expect you to abuse them, since they assume this is the normal state of affairs. I remember informing one seductive child part that I was not going to have sex with her. She responded indignantly, "Why not? That's what kids are for." Other parts have cowered, waiting for me to hit them, or been afraid to look up lest I look scary, or waited suspiciously for my next move.

Many multiples have lived with people who were themselves multiple, and changed unexpectedly from warm and loving to cruel and abusive. They will expect you to change in this way, and only time will prove to them that you do not. Do not take a multiple's negative expectations personally. Be consistently warm and respectful, and keep your promises, so that parts can learn to trust you. It is also important to take responsibility and apologize for your mistakes, so that the multiple's true experience of your mistakes is validated, and he or she learns the difference between mistakes and deliberate cruelty. Most multiples have been severely punished for making mistakes, and the example of someone who can acknowledge her or his own mistakes without dwelling on them is a healthy one for them.

Do not ever tell a multiple to "grow up." One teenage multiple who became my client spent a long time with a previous therapist until finally a young part gained the courage to come out and sit at the therapist's feet. The therapist told her to grow up and act her age. It was devastating to her, and prevented any disclosure of what had happened to her.

Do not ever tell a multiple to “forget the past.” The past did unbelievably serious damage to the person, so much damage that parts of him or her are still stuck in childhood and are unable to grow up without help. Non-multiples often assume that the front person is able to control the behavior and feelings of the other parts, and is “living in the past” by “allowing” them to exist. This just is not true. The dissociation that split off the parts happened as a physiological process in early childhood, and cannot be dropped at will. The front person is often one of the least powerful parts in the system.

There is a difference between spontaneous multiplicity and deliberately designed multiplicity. Organized perpetrator groups use drugs, electricity, and torture to create the kind of personality system they want. People abused by these groups may have a set of parts created by abuse at home, but they also have complicated organized personality systems.

Talking with a multiple is like talking with a family whose members usually do not get along

Do not expect the person who is multiple to be consistent or to have internal harmony. At the start of therapy, most multiples have internal battles for control. The front person often has little or no control over switching. The parts may fight to be “out”, or may push others “out” in order to stay inside. Decision-making is difficult, and decisions made by one part will be reversed by another, until internal communication and problem-solving have been learned. Simple things like shopping or eating can become incredibly difficult. Other survivors are, at least apparently, high functioning.

Democratic decision-making is not usually learned in the childhood of a multiple. Their families are typically arbitrary dictatorships, in which adults demand that they constantly obey out of fear of punishment, even when the rules are inconsistent. It is not, therefore, surprising that, until the person has been in the recovery process some time, parts often cannot agree on decisions. That is the nature of multiplicity. “Eww, Jane got us dressed this morning,” or “I do not like her having sex with my body” are typical comments of parts about one another. They will often express anger and even hatred for one another. It is hard for them to realize that they all represent legitimate parts of one person, and to respect how each part helped the person survive the extreme situation in which they grew up.

Helping a multiple

The very things which helped the person as a child survive extreme trauma now get in the way of their effective living as an adult. If a child has to live with carers who hurt her, and cannot escape it, it is better for her not to know it some of the time. But when she is an adult, it does not work very well for her not to remember some of what happens in her everyday life. It does not work very well for her to have different inside "people" make opposite decisions for her life, and reverse one another's decisions, spend her money on things that different parts of her would never buy, take her places that other parts of her would never go, and so on. If an adult is still being abused, it is better for that person to have conscious awareness of it so he or she can decide what to do about it.

Those of us who were more fortunate in our early experiences can help the parts of the multiples we know to learn about love, trust, and cooperation. We can do this by being loving, trustworthy, and cooperative.

A first step in teaching cooperation is to be careful not to show favoritism among parts. Every part is there for a purpose, and is an important part of the system. Most hostile parts are using anger to protect vulnerable parts inside, usually young children. Do not be afraid of hostile parts. "Every persecutor is a misguided protector." Acknowledge that they are protectors, and offer to work with them to improve their, and your, ability to protect the client and the hurt parts. Especially in ritually abused clients, hostile parts (including demons) often turn out to be young children. If they seem dangerous, talk with them at first through another part. But do not act scared, or it will be a self-fulfilling prophecy. If you like all parts, it will help them learn to like and accept one another.

Help them "talk inside." Although talking internally may seem to make the person "more" multiple, in that they will hear voices and become aware of more parts, it will actually improve communication between the front person and the other parts, and the long-term result will be that they will become better organized and work more like an integrated person. The goal is "co-consciousness," with whichever part is "out" in the body being aware of the needs and viewpoints of all the other parts, so that effective decisions can be made by the whole person rather than by just one part at a time.

Do not talk too much about integration or fusion between parts, especially at the start. In many cases, parts are afraid that if this happens they will die. It works better to talk about walls between "inside people" no longer being needed than about the "people" disappearing or merging. Respect their choice not to fuse until and unless they are ready. My experience is that as parts share experiences and memories, the walls between them dissolve, either gradually (when they are co-conscious much of the time) or suddenly (during a major piece of memory work), and the integration naturally happens when they are ready. Not all survivors will be capable of integration, and it can be dangerous to insist on it. It takes inordinate strength to tolerate awareness of all of a life of horrendous abuse.

Imposed internal and political structures

Wendy Hoffman

As soon as children have any capacity to understand shapes, their programmers begin to install imagined geometric structures within them. Different groups use different structures and arrange and layer them in specific ways. I can only talk about the one installed in me, which started out as a pyramid or triangle. Although other survivors may have different structures, they may have similar sections and types of training since these groups employ proven formulas for mind control. Perpetrators record most mind control interventions in official books that are now computerized.

The programmers show a small child a physical representation of the geometric shape that they plan to use, and tell that child to imagine that shape inside his or her mind. This shape will be the centerpiece of the internal structure within which the various mind-controlled parts of the person will be lodged. Programmers will add other shapes in various sizes and orientations later, but the first shape is usually most dominant.

My central pyramid was right side up and divided into five horizontal sections. The first installed section was the Kaballah, a corruption of the authentic Kaballah. Originally known as the "tree of life," the real Kaballah is a mystical religion that aspires for purity. Those groups that hijack this ancient philosophy turn it on its head and render it a means for achieving evil. Here it breathes its beliefs into the whole interior system. The Kaballah tree has branches that extend throughout the body and life, and its many leaves hold numerous divisions and programs.

If the child-victim is one of those who is designated to have the Kaballah system installed, when the mind control begins, the programmer tortures the infant-victim until thirteen personalities or brain splits are achieved. Each split in the infant is assigned a color and a letter (mine were in a foreign language) and (in my case, at least) given a doll representing it as an internal "person." Each doll was placed in a container on the bumper guard of my crib. These original parts become the basis for future mind control. The basic structure of the infant's fractured mind becomes cemented about a year or two after these initial splits.

The Kaballah tree has branches which are represented as pathways, and in their hidden cult life, children are forced to walk along pathways which represent these branches. During these pathway trainings, the leaders traumatize the toddler or child to teach lies such as that the child will never escape, is worthless, will always be watched, and that they belong with these cult members and not with regular people in the outside world. This constitutes the Kaballah foundation. All its training is torture-based.

In my internal structure, the next lower level going upward toward the apex of the pyramid was Luciferianism. This sub-religion permeated my whole structure. These cults, including some Masonic groups, worship Lucifer. Little distinction exists between Lucifer and Satan, though Satan is represented more in nature and Lucifer in politics. Perpetrators and unwilling members can come from two groups. Luciferianism is usually one of the groups dominating people from multiple groups of this criminal world.

Within the pyramid, next came the Illuminati, with deep roots in the Kaballah groups. The Illuminati use multiple innocuous names for themselves such as "Pinnacle of Small Changes" or "Movement of Small Increases." These titles disguise its ruthless ambition to conquer and dominate the world. I'll use the commonplace term 'Illuminati' in this essay even though this popular term is not how the original group identifies themselves.

On top of that horizontal division was MKUltra, indicating secret experiments in mind control. The perpetrators who created this division steal children's minds and render them unknowing slaves who perform roles that corrupt governments need for their continuation in power. People continue these hidden crimes today. This group has no overt religious affiliations.

The apex of this pyramid within my internal system was Nazism. I am writing primarily about western "democracies" and their groups vying for supremacy, because that is the part of the world I was trained in. In my memoir White Witch in a Black Robe, I write that the racism this group is known for is a golden apple thrown out to distract the angry masses from its real purpose. Like the Illuminati members, the Nazi group wants to conquer and control the world. Nazism is in competition with the Illuminati, sometimes one or the other being in power politically. People would be amazed how many twenty-first century Nazis exist. Many look like ordinary people, some even show leftist leanings. When some of the cruder members slip into their Nazi personas and drop their masks, they stalk about in a bullying way as their true natures are exposed. Some people belonging to minority groups have been coerced into working for Nazis. Both the Nazis and the Illuminati worship Lucifer (even if some of their leaders don't believe in the religion). Traditional organized crime (called the Mafia, although it is not necessarily Italian) with its money-making demands for child prostitution and pornography, smuggling illegal goods and drugs, stealing babies, mounting animal fights and other crimes, were located in the Nazi section of my internal structure and were conducted by people connected with the Nazis in my life. Depending on which group has political ascendancy in a particular country, that section of mind-controlled people's inner structures will be placed above the section created by other groups.

The programmers who inserted the right-side up pyramid internally could also turn it upside down to reflect external politics. That means that sometimes the Illuminati with its roots planted in the Kaballah group would be higher, and sometimes the Nazi would rule internally and in the world. Both the Illuminati and Nazi groups believe they have the right to impose such a structure on the universe. We see this push and pull in world politics as at least the developed world becomes steadily more satanic. The stereotype of a few hidden individuals making decisions and ruling the world is an accurate portrayal. Sometimes persons who are hidden Illuminati leaders rule, and at other times those who are hidden Nazi leaders rule. This tug of war shows in political elections, even recent ones. The groups vie with each other. Each group wants exclusive power. But they are all Luciferians the way denominations of other religions are still under the same umbrella, and they often work together.

All the groups consider a mind controlled person a worthwhile specimen to own, and they secretly steal from one another. One group can plant parts with codes and triggers in victims' minds, and other groups may suspect something, but won't be able to find them. These thefts are not recorded in the victims' general records but only in the records of the group that conducted the theft.

There is a boom of conspiracy theories, as people try to figure out what is behind frightening global events. Few people realize that these satanic groups order assassinations. Isolated and unattached assassins are rare, if they exist at all. Many if not most of the political assassinations are from one of these groups fighting the other, using mind-controlled people as assassins. The conspiracy theorists, who are often good-hearted people who try but can't conceive of the extent of human evil, get that wrong, and the people who know through experience are unable to provide proof.

Who an infant born into these groups will become and how they will be used are set in its earliest days of life. There are no choices. Only mind control.

What countries become depends on which group's candidate wins an election with a pre-arranged agreement of who will win. It seems pre-arranged by hidden rulers and the groups appear to take turns, though not in a neat order. On occasion, a candidate without satanic affiliations runs in an election. That candidate will either be persuaded to withdraw or will lose, sometimes by a small margin. Citizens are looking for change and a better way, but Illuminati and Nazis don't want to give up their grip. And people adamantly don't want to hear this truth. Their resistance makes it easy for the criminal groups. Some people notice that the wealthy have entitlements but not the poor, or that the climate has changed and the environment is perhaps permanently spoiled, but they don't want to know the true nature of their elected officials. If a government official who is from satanism appears to do something right, it will be a matter of throwing the masses a crumb. Rulers from satanism do not mean to do good.

Even though some important world leaders are satanists, it doesn’t follow that they have permanently won this battle. People can still object, rebel and protest. Even if leaders have sold out, the world is not forever lost. There are far fewer satanists than ordinary life people. Courageous citizens of the normal world can rise up and demand safety and justice.

Hand signals

Wendy Hoffman

After those who are chosen to be victims of mind control have just been born, perpetrators immediately begin fluttering their hands in the infants' faces. Of course, the infant victims have no idea what the hand movements signify. The programmers are sensitizing the babies to hand motions and teaching them to watch hands closely.

By the time these babies are toddlers, perpetrators begin to attach assigned meanings to the movements. Over time, the children learn the specific hand sequence to sit, go, lie down, fall asleep, be quiet, run, leave, enter, drop the evidence, hide something in specific places, such as under the steps, deny, murder, shoot, kidnap, steal, poison, drop a pill in a drink, forget everything, or remember nothing. Each one has its own configuration of fingers, wrist motions and right- or left-handedness. Parts of the person can be called out by pressure on the victim's left shoulder. A hand signal coupled with a visual cue or sound is sufficient for a trained, programmed assassin part of a person to perform a murder in public, and I believe this has happened.

Before I began my authentic recovery and was still thwarted by close-down specialists, something occurred that stunned me. I was a graduate student studying social work. My field placement was in Harlem. I led a group of parents who had lost their children to government agencies, addicts trying hard, or not so hard, to stop drinking and drugging, and people straight from the ghettoes who had few, if any, social advantages. We explored the outside world. We made trips to the library, which most had never visited, walked around the neighborhood, talked about the emotional issues plaguing their lives. Our bonds became closer. At the end of the term, I had to leave because I was a student. They gave a party for me on the last day, paying for refreshments with their own meager money. This would be our last time together and was a tender time for us all. During the party, a secretary stood in the doorway, called my name and simultaneously motioned with the middle finger of her left hand. Had she used her right finger, I would not have risen like a mindless robot and left the room. Had she not innocently combined my name with the hand movement, I would not have had a hidden part emerge, obeying what some inside child part thought was a handler's order. By the time I came out of my trance, the members of my group had dissipated. I missed out on my last goodbye and they missed out on all of my gratitude. I did not consciously know yet of all the mind-controlled parts inside me. I had not yet met the several thousands of them, but I knew then that something was terribly wrong with me and that I was vulnerable to any wind, that I was not my own person.

When people who have been mind-controlled begin their journey into knowledge, they are often afraid to go outside because they fear hand signals. At survivors' conferences about mind control, victims are sent to give vulnerable speakers and participants hand signals. An administrator might ask the audience to cease using hand signals and, as happened at a recent conference, many in the audience persist in trying to trigger people. One older woman claimed she had a skin problem that made her scratch her face repeatedly. That seemed like a reasonable explanation and people felt sympathy for her. However, during a break in the conference talks, she sought me out, switched, and performed elaborate hand signals inches from my nose. Her programmed hand signals meant that I belonged to the cult and should return. Some of the hand signals meant that I should commit suicide. Most of the people using their hands in this way do not know what they are doing. Their front person is oblivious and the parts of them performing these actions are responding to programmed commands.

Perpetrator groups are serious about making their victims sensitive to responding to hand signals and also accomplished in demonstrating these signals to others. Perpetrators can, thereby, control people in public without saying a word. They also teach and practice foot signals and many other visual cues. Some groups are more intent on using hand signals than others. For example, the ritually abusing group of Masons use them extensively but most perpetrator groups rely on them to some degree.

Survivors who received hand signal trainings cannot be fully free until they associate how they were trained to respond to, and give, hand signals. This remembering is a giant step toward not being an automaton, and it makes going out in public safer. When someone makes a deliberate hand signal in my face now, the muscles around my brain tense and my mind slides into a memory of when that signal was programmed into my brain. I am then not vulnerable to it.

At times, it can be helpful to use a hand signal to avoid danger. When I was working as a therapist, a client stood up during a therapy session and advanced toward me with her arms and hands out. It was clear to me that she intended to strangle me, not because she wanted to, but because she had been given instructions to do so. I did a hand signal back to her, and she switched and took her seat.

Disinformation*

Alison Miller

Today, I looked at the description of yet another book about mind control and ritual abuse, purporting to describe what really goes on and offering a cure. Books, websites, YouTube videos, speakers at conferences, you name it—plenty of information is out there. But how do you tell the difference between genuinely helpful information and disinformation, which means information that purports to be true but is designed to mislead you?

The trick with disinformation is to include lots of correct information. However, that correct information consists of things that are already known, so the writer is not revealing anything new. When you have become hooked on reading the writing of someone who seems to know the truth, you suddenly discover that the truth you know has been mixed with something you have not heard before, which might, on first reading, seem utterly outrageous, such as "All ritual abuse and mind control is being managed at the highest level by aliens," or "The cult is breeding half-human, half-animal creatures [chimeras] and keeps them in secret underground locations." Besides disinformation about what the abusers do, there is disinformation about the healing process, such as "The true subconscious can instantly heal all the parts if they just say they want healing," or "The way to resolve dissociated traumatic memories is to just avoid the negative and focus instead on the details of positive memories," or "If you rebalance your body's energies, you will be healed."

* A version of this chapter was published in the online journal Survivorship, Summer 2017.

In order to sort out truth from deliberately planted fiction, you need to engage your critical thinking skills. A philosophy web page (http://philosophy.hku.hk/think/criticalct.php) defines critical thinking as "the ability to think clearly and rationally about what to do or what to believe. It includes the ability to engage in reflective and independent thinking, and includes understanding the logical connections between ideas, evaluating arguments, and detecting inconsistencies and mistakes in reasoning." These are skills the abuser group did not want you to develop. They wanted you to believe what they said and obey them without questioning. Learning critical thinking is an important part of recovery.

Let us apply critical thinking skills to the examples I gave above from disinformation sources. "All ritual abuse and mind control are being managed at the highest level by aliens." Some versions of this one involve human-sized lizard-like creatures, others the gray aliens we see in abduction stories. I have been a reader of science fiction since I was about fourteen, and one thing I have learned is that creatures from other planets would not be two-legged and two-armed creatures like us, or like the lizards and grays. Genuine aliens might well breathe other gases than oxygen and have different shapes from any living earthly creatures (see the film Arrival for an example.) However, human beings could easily put on the kind of rubber masks you can buy around Halloween in order to look like aliens. Which is more likely?

How about "The cult is breeding half-human, half-animal creatures and keeps them in secret underground locations?" You cannot disprove this. However, I know (because my son is a researcher on the human genome in the world's leading university for this subject) that genomics has not advanced anywhere near the point where something like this could be done, and this would hold true even if there were secret cult or government research somewhere else. The speaker I heard on this topic believed she had given birth to such beings and was communicating with them telepathically. She was very sincere.

Very sincerely deluded. When I spoke with another ritual abuse survivor who had an inside part who believed itself to be a chimera, I investigated a little more and discovered it was a young girl who could run fast and was told she was half horse. As for the speaker who heard her "children" telepathically, my logical thinking tells me that the voices she heard were probably dissociated child parts of herself who had been told they were her children and were chimeras.

Another purpose of disinformation is to make the general public, including therapists, believe that if they think ritual abuse or mind control is real, they also have to believe in things they find completely impossible, such as some of the more outrageous claims made by the disinformation websites. So they dismiss the truth along with the falsehoods.

What about the healing methods that might be disinformation? As a survivor, you are hungry for anything that will help relieve your distress, especially if it is quick and easy rather than requiring you to work through what really happened to you. So you seize upon the correct descriptions of your experiences, and then think that if the author was able to describe what happened to you, he or she must be offering a correct understanding and proposal for cure. But this is not so.

Perpetrator groups are very eager to divert survivors away from anything which will genuinely help them heal, as healing will involve discovering what happened to them and even why it happened. These are secrets the perpetrator groups guard closely. The disinformation books and websites are meant for you to discover and share with other survivors, and they will lead you away from the truths you do not yet know, not towards them.

"The true subconscious can instantly heal all the parts if they just say they want healing." Apply your critical thinking skills and say "I wish," but know it will not happen. This one seems a bit more plausible: "The way to resolve dissociated traumatic memories is to just avoid the negative and focus instead on the details of positive memories." There are plenty of therapists who try to do this. If you have had such a therapist, you may be aware of whether or not it actually works. Many mind control and ritual abuse survivors have to struggle very hard to come up with any positive memory, and might end up inventing one to please such a therapist. Finally, "If you rebalance your body's energies you will be healed." This requires moving your body in certain ways and allowing someone to touch your body. Such new approaches are currently quite popular, and have replaced the Christian "deliverances" as the favorite of cult-involved therapists. Be very careful about this: body movements and touches and signals can actually set off programming in survivors. Some "energy therapists" are very sincere and accidentally do this; others work for the bad guys, and what they do will close down your personality system and prevent you from healing.

Apply your critical thinking. Years of research have shown that the way to resolve dissociated traumatic memories is, first, to develop communication with your inside parts, and second, to put the traumatic memories together. See http://www.isst-d.org/default.asp?contentID=49, which are the guidelines for therapists put out by the International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation. Every survivor would like to find a solution that did not involve getting near the horrific content and overwhelming negative feelings of the traumatic memories. It is tempting to jump at the chance of an easy and positive way of healing. Unfortunately, it does not work, and anyone who tells you it works is either misled or trying to mislead you. It might even cripple you.

When you go online, or purchase books, or attend conferences teaching about mind control and ritual abuse, keep your critical thinking abilities in the forefront of your mind. You can learn to distinguish between information and disinformation.

The choice

Wendy Hoffman

My therapist and intelligent, informed friends who know about this field have told me for years that I am not responsible for what cult perpetrators do. "They did that, not you," they say. Of course, I do not believe them. It just did not sink in or I would not let it sink in even after I heard it multiple times. Media messages sink in after two exposures, sometimes three, but I just could not receive that all this evil was not my fault. Ridiculous, I know.

Then one day, by chance, I read an interview with the Iranian Shirin Ebadi in the March 2016 issue of TIME Magazine. Even non-skeptical people realize that all forms of popular media are now controlled by criminal groups who distort the news and give us false messages. So it is particularly ironic and strange that a turning point for me came from a typical popular media publication. The interviewer asked the Nobel Peace Prize winner, whose family suffered because of her quest for freedom and justice and whose colleagues were jailed, whether she felt responsible for the prison sentences that followed her revolutionary work. She answered it was not she who harassed the victims, but the government. "It's the Iranian government that has to feel the guilt," she says ("13 Questions with Shirin Ebadi," March 17, 2016). Something clicked in my fragmented brain.

The credit goes to my therapist and friends who coached my thinking for years. The lawyer's comment was the tipping point.

I had escaped from my criminal group. Probably the leaders punished people I loved and had to leave behind unwillingly, just as they had with Ebadi. It is not I who tortured them. It is the criminal group. My heart is finally absorbing this lucidity.

I have a small garden behind my new home. Being a city person, it is a novelty for me. I did not even know what slugs and snails were, though I knew that snails are considered a French delicacy. At first I mistook the slimy slugs for my dog's feces. Experienced gardeners told me how to eradicate them. Put out shallow containers of beer. Sprinkle salt on them. I could not use the chemical poisons because of my dog. I also had tall, elegant lupin plants in my garden. The slugs and snails destroyed them and others. I had to cut everything back. I experimented with the recommended means of death. The beer worked in the beginning, but then the network of insect communication must have tipped newcomers off. I only found bits of leaves in the beer. I preferred the salt. The snails went back into their portable homes and the slugs shriveled to look like fetuses. The insects shrank into themselves the way I did when I was tortured. Like me, they looked for a place where only they could reside no matter what happened to their bodies. I noticed that baby snails and slugs fought harder than the grown-ups. One day, my soul rebelled. I asked myself what am I doing? I asked myself, why does my lupin have more of a right to life than the preying insects? The lupin is gorgeous, the insects disgusting to me, but who am I to choose one over the other?

The criminal leaders and experts evaluate their members whom they consider their property when they are infants and young children. The evaluators are looking to see what will motivate each individual. One aspect of the evaluation is to see which of these brand new human beings will place their own survival above others', and which will place others' survival above their own. The groups feel that is an important distinction. Their methodology is to threaten and terrorize each child. "Do this or we will kill him," they say. "Do this or we will skin him alive." Some children will do anything to spare another's life. That spared life could be a loved one's or not. It could belong to a stranger. Perpetrators can threaten to bomb the whole world, and these sensitive ones would sacrifice themselves to that lie also. As we saw in Alison's essay, children believe lies.

Some children put themselves first. They might not want their family and friends skinned alive and murdered, but mostly they do not want to be hurt themselves. They have to be manipulated in a different way. Usually, they are bribed. “Do this and we will give you that,” evaluators say. Everything is for self-aggrandisement. They become the people who are given the important, well-paying jobs in society even though they are often not particularly competent and not equipped to be leaders.

This assessment period is short-lived. Children show their deeper natures fast. A normal person told me that children growing up in normal environments take much longer to find this preference out about themselves. They go through developmental stages and finally choose how they want to live. Cult children are born onto a battlefield. They have no childhoods. They make adult-type decisions as infants. They are a different kind of person.

Executioners use small cult children’s hands to perform the slaughters during rituals and organized killing events. The executioners usually wear massive black leather gloves for their effect, insert the ritual knife into the child’s hands and cover the child’s hands with their own. “It’s your fault we had to kill this person.” “It’s your fault we had to kill this animal.” The animal is often a beloved pet. These lies will fill the first kind of child with unbearable guilt and grief. The second type of child will also despair and come to look for ways to build him or herself up. Neither type of child is particularly resilient after extreme trauma and will most likely carry these traumas throughout life.

Whether people put themselves or other people first is not caused by their being born into this kind of cult. The tendency may be genetic and from other early environmental influences. The preference has nothing to do with intelligence, analytic ability, creativity, or education. It is a primal tendency closely linked to survival—either the survival of the soul or of the body. People with no connections to criminal perpetrators eventually display the same distinctions. When the sensitive children realize they have done something wrong, they can become suicidal. When the self-important ones become agitated, they might have homicidal ideation.

I was controlled for the vast majority of my life by the fear of causing others to be hurt. I lost the one boy who loved me when I was four and a half. I do not cry easily, but I still cry when I think of him, almost seventy years later. I lost all my children, one after the other, but the inside part who lost one of my eight children did not know about the others. Each mother was isolated and uninformed, even though we all shared the same body. So I engaged in the same mistaken thinking time and time again, wanting to save a child. Finally, because I had some help, I extricated myself from my desire to try to save my adult child and left my grandchildren, too. It was difficult to leave them all, even though they had been programmed to hate me. Even as an escapee, I felt guilty that I might be causing them harm.

The Iranian lawyer, instead, was empowered. "It's not I who . . ." That statement did not lead to my freedom, which had already been achieved, but it stripped away layers of guilt and despair from my heart and even my brain.

We act according to our conscience and principles, not according to evil's attempted manipulations.

Even after recovery, instances reveal themselves from the deep layers of brain, instances where the fear of hurting others (or being hurt yourself, for some) had been used to control you. The life review of the freed entails many times when wrong decisions were made, and a few when right decisions were accomplished. It only takes one or two crucial correct choices to gain freedom, to leave behind the threats and manipulations. With freedom, you have the time to find yourself, long ago lost to perpetrators. You can make the choice to turn your back on your perpetrators fast, but it does take a lifetime to digest all that has happened. You can work through the shock of each tortuous event that occurred in the past, but the post-recovery shock of what your life as a whole has been could stick throughout the rest of your life. Some might be able to shake it off. I have not been able to.

After recovery, you stand as if in shock. This shock will not dissipate by itself. To lose the shock, you have to accept your life. How could anyone accept a life like those that I describe? This is where the flow towards healing can stop. There is no way to accept what happened to you and countless others. No way.

And so we continue. Still grieving and in shock, but we take one step and then another. We have this awful knowledge, but life is calm now and we can help others. We make the best of this life.

The extra danger of character flaws

Wendy Hoffman

The criminal groups test their victims from early childhood on. They want to know what talents and interests they inherited so that they can usurp them for their own purposes. They also want to know what weak spots each personality has in case they need to be punished. Therefore, they ascertain whether a victim will suffer more if he or she is humiliated professionally and in public or whether physical torture would be more effective. Ordinary life schools do not do such thorough investigations.

From my observations, it is survivors' character flaws that keep them attached to the perpetrator group. These blemishes could go unnoticed in ordinary life. Most people have some personality frailty or vulnerability but when unravelling mind control, these deficits can become deadly.

Starved of real recognition (a need of every human), some survivors end up overly hungry for attention, feeling special and important. Perhaps someone held a more special role earlier in life and then lost it. A girl was told to function as a sex goddess and then lost her looks and was demoted. A boy was trained in activities requiring strength but then did not grow very big. A young child showed potential to be a psychic or a witch and these abilities did not develop and crashed. There are many other scenarios that can leave adult survivors longing for some singled out recognition or sense of special importance.

If the cult wants to use the person's abilities in cult life only, the programmers will say, for example,

"Here, with us, you are important."

"We need you."

"You are special."

"Only you can help us."

"Only you have the knowledge and understand."

But if the person is no longer needed or used, he or she is just dropped, humiliated, and closed down, experiencing a hole that flails around to be filled. Only the wrong people will want to fill it.

If you spot this kind of yearning emptiness in yourself, be on guard. Do not fall in love with the handsome leader who tells you you are beautiful. He means you no good. Do not accept that function at a ritual. It is meant to manipulate you. Do not want to be a valued member of a group more than anything. The group will lead you to destruction.

There are survivors who never experienced compassion from others. They were left alone as small children even though their bodies had been tortured. They called out and no one came. No adult. Not even another child. As adults, they remain in that child-state of yearning for comfort from another human being.

We know that in these criminal cults there are programmers who know how to separate victims' brains into slivers and render them unthinking, hypnotised automatons.

There is another group that is not as powerful as programmers but is still used extensively. Members of this group are called "matriarchs." People describe them as being "natural mothers." They have an intuitive sense of how to court people, build them up, and make them dependent. Soon, the comfort-seekers find these matriarchs and stop seeing clearly. They are finally getting the comfort their child selves craved and that blinds them, one hopes temporarily, to the dangerous pit they have fallen into. Apparently supportive partners or spouses can also give comfort while keeping the dependent survivor in a helpless, childish state.

If you are arrested in a small child state of complaining and wanting everyone to comfort you, know that you are courting danger. The wrong people will be happy to rescue you from loneliness and isolation and keep you trapped as a slave who carries out enemies' bidding.

There are adult survivors who, as children, were stripped of any remnant of self-esteem. They believed what their adult and peer torturers told them and think that they have nothing to offer the world. These are the people who will go after the positions of power in these criminal groups and will let sail down the river any whisper their souls or their higher wisdom selves deliver.

If you are a person with such horrendous self-esteem, know that having a position of power in these groups will often seal your fate and render you a doomed victim.

Be aware that you do not feel good about yourself, and protect yourself from enemies who will prey on your lack. Try to spot aspects of yourself that you admire. Remember when you acted with integrity. Yes, there were such times. Push away people who tempt you with destructive forces.

If the cult offers to place you in a high level administrative job in the real world, be cautious. The criminal leaders are not honoring your abilities, though you might want to think so. They are using you as a stooge. They will tell you exactly what to do and how. You might get a large salary but you will remain a puppet with no conscience.

Know your limitations. If you would not be able to achieve such a high position on the basis of your own abilities, do not let empty ambition leave you vulnerable to being used even more and contributing to more of the evil in the world.

Many more character flaws can lead people further into being a puppet of these criminal groups. If you have justifiable rage attacks, the controllers may make you into an assassin. If you tend toward addictions, they may make you into a prostitute or drug pusher or both. If you often become hysterical, they will send a partner who can balance you out and support you but who will not be a friend. The person who helps you cope with histrionic reactions will probably become your handler or programmer. That person may level out your instability but will not want your welfare and will order you to do things to your detriment.

Try to know and accept yourself even though you are mind-controlled and your mind might still be in slivers and pieces. Try to heal your childhood of torture and deprivations so that your enemies cannot place you in an even deeper hole.

Healing from this kind of mind torture is one of the most difficult recoveries. I do not think anyone would disagree about that. Some may even say it is not possible. However, enough people have healed to say definitively that it is possible and happening right now. Minds are becoming integrated.

Satanic mythology vs. genuine evil

Alison Miller

A long time ago, people thought bad/unfortunate was the same as bad/evil. So, if someone suffered, it must be a divine punishment for something they had done wrong. Even today, we sometimes confuse these things. People who survive earthquakes, for example, feel especially chosen by God to survive, and thank God for this, without realizing that they are, by implication, thanking God, for killing all those who did not survive. Until recently we called natural disasters "acts of God."

When ancient people realized that what happens to someone is not always his or her fault, they looked for external causes. Many things do have external causes. Not having the science to discover bacteria and viruses and faults in the earth's crust, early people invented mythical beings to account for all the things that go wrong. Ancient religions tend to be filled with deities that are a cross between human beings and animals, some beneficent and some malign. This is probably because, in ancient times, wild animals were one of the greatest threats people faced. A person merged with a powerful beast would have great power. Among other supposedly supernatural beings, people invented a red devil with horns and a tail and a vaguely human or bipedal goat-like body. As time went on, they added more demonic beings, also tending to be red and horned. Recently, in an attempt to explain ritual abuse, some writers (notably David Icke) have added bipedal lizard-like aliens.

Unfortunately, ever since the poet John Milton wrote Paradise Lost in 1667, one particular set of mythical beings seem to have won out in the popular imagination. Milton combined three ideas from the Bible to fashion a tale of an entire class of supernatural beings like the Greek or Roman or Egyptian gods, one of whom rebelled against God and took others with him. The ideas he combined were:

1. The adversary or tempter character ("Satan", e.g., in the book of Job, or the story of Jesus in the wilderness) who has the job of testing people's motives to strengthen their character.
2. The notion of "devils" (external forces causing unpleasant effects such as diseases—nowadays we would identify many of them as bacteria or viruses, and others as natural phenomena like the shifting of the earth's crust).
3. A brief reference to Lucifer falling from heaven. Lucifer, the light-bringer, usually referred to the planet Venus, the brightest star in the sky. In its context, the prophet Isaiah was prophesying doom for a foreign king who was oppressing his people, a man who appeared temporarily bright but would be brought down.

Milton, 450 years ago, put these together into an impressive and exciting narrative about an evil being, Lucifer/Satan, who rebelled against God's rule. Many Christians think this story is actually in the Bible; it is not. Satanists, like evangelical Christians, believe it but think the rebel, rather than God, deserves to run the universe. The story is not all that different from similar stories in more ancient mythologies. Ritual abusers who worship Satan or Lucifer often also worship Egyptian or other pagan deities as well. More recent Christians have elaborated on all the demonic entities that supposedly work on behalf of Satan's kingdom.

When I hear the acronym "SRA," standing for satanic ritual abuse, I shudder. People who call what we are dealing with SRA frequently equate mind control abuses, including those engaged in by religious Satan-worshippers, with the involvement of a host of supernatural entities, most of them red and horned and having some kind of a physical body which gives them that appearance. Many such people believe that victims must experience “deliverance” from possession or oppression by such entities.

Various polytheistic religions involve rituals in which people dress up as gods or demons, and go into alternative states in which they are supposedly possessed by the god or demon they represent. Satanism does this also, according to Stella Katz (Chapter Seven of Healing the Unimaginable). A man in a devil suit (skin-tight and red with horns and a tail) rapes a toddler in the satanic baptism ceremony, and rapes a nine-year-old painfully (he wears a penis sheath with spikes on it) in the ceremony of marriage to Satan. People wear costumes impersonating demons, and rape a child of about three in order to create demon parts in that child. The child passes out, wakes up costumed as a demon, and is shown a “mirror” on which a picture of demon is painted. It is given a demon name and taught how to behave like a demon.

Most of us do not take literally the various gods and demons of religions other than the ones we are familiar with, Christianity and Judaism. We do not assume that when an ancient Greek or a Mayan dressed in a costume, he actually became, or was possessed by, the entity that costume represented. Yet, somehow, some of us believe this about the demonology we have inherited within Christianity.

Surely our understanding of dissociation can inform us about what has happened within a little child who is raped and tortured into inviting in a “demon” or signing an agreement to serve Satan. The child’s brain, in the interest of basic survival, has split off a part that will say or do whatever it is told to say or do. Are we to really believe that some named demon has entered this child, and the only solution is to oust it through “deliverance” or “exorcism?” Surely we are beyond that. Surely we can see that what happened was a dissociative split caused by overwhelming trauma.

Nevertheless, we are faced with the reality that what people do in this kind of religion can only be described as evil. It is impossible to experience or work with victims of mind control abuses, especially ritual abuse, without becoming sickeningly, and frighteningly, aware of the existence of evil. We have to grapple with the reality that the things that happen to mind-controlled and ritually abused people are not just unfortunate examples of “hurt people hurting others.” There is deliberate evil intent on the part of perpetrators. Perhaps many or most perpetrators have split minds themselves, so they are unable to feel empathy for their victims. Even the "conscious" ones have hidden child parts, but have lost contact with them.

Forced perpetration is, in my view, the most evil of all the things ritually abusing cults engage in. A little child's hand, in the hand of an adult abuser, is made to stab another creature, perhaps even a person, to death. Older children are given choices between two evils. "Kill this animal or we will kill your baby brother." "Cut this person or we will cut her much more painfully." When they choose the lesser evil, they are told how evil they are for making this choice.

Whenever I hear (or read) someone referring to this kind of abuse as "SRA," I hear the implication that an actual supernatural being who looks like the guy in the red suit is involved. This bothers me immensely. There might well be evil forces beyond our understanding that vie with the good for the heart or soul of each human being. However, literalizing them into physical beings with red skin, horns, and tails takes our focus away from what these abusers may be doing to the humanity of their victims, and what is necessary to restore that humanity.

A client of mine who grew up in a satanic cult family had a near-death experience, in which she died temporarily and had to be revived. When we processed this memory in a therapy session, she went through all the traditional components of the near-death experience, including leaving her body, passing through a tunnel, meeting a being of light, and finally experiencing a review of the choices she had made in her life with regard to whether they were good or evil. In the life review, she reported being shown that some of the evil things she had been made to do by the cult perpetrators were not considered evil choices on her part, as she had not really had a choice between right and wrong. But some smaller decisions in everyday life in which she had chosen to be mean or petty were shown (by the being of light) to be wrong.

Abusers can make very young children believe they are evil or possessed on the basis of the actions those children are forced to commit. But why do we adults believe it? We should know better.

As we learn more about mind control and ritual abuse, we are forced to think through our view of evil, of right and wrong choices, and perhaps of what Christians call "sin." How does a person come to choose evil? How does a person become a perpetrator? Leave aside the forced choices and forced behaviors. What are the choices that count?

Read Wendy's essay on "Character flaws" again. She is talking about temptation, in the traditional sense. The temptation to boost your self-esteem by lording it over others, to deal with your financial insecurity by turning to greed and exploiting others, the temptation to deny your vulnerability by torturing and raping others, the temptation to get love by imprisoning someone and forcing them to "love" you, the temptation to achieve safety by compromising with abusers. Evil enters through temptation, the temptation to violate the Golden Rule, which is "treat others the way you would like them to treat you." A person becomes a perpetrator through a series of such choices.

The cults know this. Forget the trappings of satanism, the costumes, the supposed legions of demons. These are mere window dressing to confuse and deceive and distract children and onlookers. The temptations, even within satanism, are the same old ones that exist anywhere, but with heightened possibilities. Someone who wants to aggrandize himself by making others feel small might, in regular life, become a spouse abuser; in satanism he might become a torturer. In regular life, a smart person who wants to exploit others through greed can become a real estate magnate; a less intelligent person might simply become a loan shark. In satanism, the less smart person can become a university president (with manipulated promotions), the smarter person a master programmer who directs torturers and can rape anyone he wants, including helpless children. In satanism, a person who will sacrifice others in order to avoid personal suffering will become an obedient torturer or a stealer of children. In regular life, he might become a politician who tries to keep vulnerable refugees out of a "safe" country, or a devotee of such a politician. The choices that lead to evil are the same within and outside satanism.

The people who direct the international perpetrator networks know this. They are not deceived by the trappings. As Wendy wrote, they look for the person's individual vulnerability to temptation, and they provide precisely the type of temptation to which each individual is most vulnerable.

As an Illuminati "queen," Wendy was chosen to assume a high position in the international cult network. For this position, she was supposed to be possessed by myriad demons which were simulated through deceptions such as we have previously discussed. But, to her mind, the real evil was not in these supposed demons, it was in the temptation to power and cruelty. Throughout her life she was invited to accept and enjoy the power her position would give her if she would only become a “conscious” perpetrator and identify with the goals of the perpetrator group. Choosing to kill with her own hands was particularly important to the group, and because she steadfastly refused to do so, she was eventually discarded by the group. The boy she grew up with, who was designated to be the “king” to her “queen,” lusted after power, and was given significant authority within the group.

Walt Kelly’s “Pogo” cartoon for the first Earth Day in 1970 has a caption: “We have seen the enemy, and he is us.” There are many people who live regular lives who would become perpetrators if given the opportunity. It is repeated yielding to temptation that destroys the soul. This is a primary objective of satanic groups. The truly demonic takes control of us when we repeatedly yield to what is commonly known as sin—envy, lust for power, control, cruelty, sexual perversion, material possessions, or status. This can happen to anyone, regardless of whether they are exposed to satanism.

SECTION II

LIES

Fifty lies they might have told you: why they told them, how they made you believe them, and what you can do about it

Alison Miller

Child abusers who use mind control, whether they belong to a cult, a military or government group, or an organized criminal group which uses children as sexual slaves, all attempt to brainwash their victims to believe certain lies. "Mind control" refers to deliberately splitting a child's brain circuitry into different parts, training all parts to obey, and indoctrinating and training each part so that he or she will do a specific job assigned by the abusers. The abusers who do this tell the children many lies, for the purpose of controlling the children and preventing them from speaking out about their abuse, even after they grow up, so that the abusers can continue perpetrating these abuses without being caught. In addition, each specific lie has a specific purpose, which benefits the abusers but not the children.

The creation of these false beliefs and trained behaviors is sometimes referred to as "programming." These abusers use trickery (fake stage magic, illusions, and drugs) as well as torture and threats to make children believe the lies. They also deliberately create new parts ("inside people") in each child they abuse. The one or ones who live most of their daily lives and function socially in the outside world often do not know of the beliefs, training, or even the existence of the other parts. This is important for the lies and tricks to be effective. This article summarizes some of the most common lies told by these abusers, the purpose of each lie, and the methods they use to make children believe the lies.

If you are a survivor reading this, I suggest you might want to write down some thoughts you or your parts have that could possibly be lies the perpetrators told you. Then see whether those thoughts are in this list. Or you could ask your inside parts to listen while you read each lie out loud, and note which lies they believe so you can read the explanations of these lies to them.

Lies about the reality of the abuse

1. Lie: You got the idea that you were abused from something you read or saw on television, or from someone else's experience, or from your therapist.

The truth: Many people read such stories or watch such programs, but know that these things did not happen to them. All qualified therapists have been trained not to make suggestions that will influence clients' beliefs about what has happened to them.

Why they told this lie: They wanted you to believe that your memories were not real, so that you would not try to find out more about them or tell anyone else about them. They also did not want anyone else to believe you.

How they made you believe it: Survivors of extreme abuse often do not remember much of their past, so it is very easy for people who have power in their lives, such as their parents, to convince them that nothing bad happened to them. Most people want to please their parents.

What to do about it: You might want to avoid reading other people's stories of abuse, or watching television programs about these abuses, whether or not the programs suggest that these things really happen. Then you can be sure that you are not picking up ideas from these sources.

Think seriously about who has made suggestions to you, either that you were abused or that you were not. Can you trust their word? Has anyone pressured you to believe one way or the other? If so, you might want to make it clear to that person that your thoughts are your own and you do not appreciate their suggestions. Possibly the people who deny what you say are part of the perpetrator group.

2. Lie: If you get flashbacks of awful abuses, they must be dreams or imagination or signs that you are crazy. Nothing bad really happened to you.

The truth: Flashbacks do not come from imagination, especially if they have body sensations as part of them. Dreams can be related to things you have seen in films or on television, but they might also be related to things that have happened to you. If you have seen screen images which remind your inside parts of their experiences, a dream might combine the story on the screen with actual memories.

Why they told this lie: They wanted you to believe that your memories were not real, so that you would not try to find out more about them or tell anyone else about them.

How they made you believe it: If you had a dream or a memory of the abuse in childhood, they would tell you that it was a dream or that you had an active imagination. It was reassuring to you to believe it was not real. They may have simulated a murder that you attended, and then you saw the person alive the next day. When you told this to your parents, they said you must have dreamed the murder.

What to do about it: Pay attention to dreams and flashbacks; write them down and see what information they give you about your life experiences.

Lies about your abusers' powers and character

3. Lie: The abusers know things and do things by real magic.

The truth: The abusers had lots of training in how to deceive children. They used "stage magic," hypnosis, and drugs, as well as torture and threats, to make you believe lies. They did not have any real magic.

Why they told this lie: They wanted you to always be afraid of them and to believe they knew what you were thinking and saying, so that you would not reveal the abuse.

How they made you believe it: You were a child, and children do not always understand adults' tricks. You did not know whether magic was real or not. Stage magicians deceive children for fun; abusers have learned to use this stage magic to deceive children for their evil purposes. For example, a client of mine believed “Satan’s eyes” were always watching her. This was a memory of being outside in the dark with the “eyes” she saw being flashlights surrounding her. Another client as a child was put in a room with plastic ears glued to the walls, and talked to someone while a hidden microphone recorded what she said. She was then punished for what she had said, and told that all walls had ears, though some are invisible.

What to do about it: Communicate with your inside parts to find out how each apparently magic trick was done. This article has told you how some of them were done. You may have others. You can find out the tricks by talking inside. The abusers set you up so that each part knows things that other parts do not know. You can find out the truth when you share your knowledge with one another inside your head. You can also look up the comedy duo Penn and Teller, who debunk apparent magic.

4. Lie: Everything the abusers told you was true.

The truth: Some things were true, but many things were not true. You can only find out which was which through internal communication.

What to do about it: Think for yourself, now that you are an adult, and critique the information the abusers gave you to see whether or not you now think it could be true. If something is really true, it will resonate as a truth for you. You might find that when something resonates this way, you feel angry or sad, and you might want to avoid thinking about it any further. If this is the case, it will be helpful for you to follow the thread of emotions and thoughts and ask yourself why you are avoiding this. Shed light on it so that you can find the real truth, which is the only way you will be able to heal and to move forward in life. Recognize that if you were deceived, you were a child, so it is not your fault you were deceived. As an adult, you probably still have child parts inside you. Be determined to get at the truth. If one thing the abusers said to you was a lie, then perhaps other things that were said to you were lies or tricks (fabricated events).

5. Lie: The perpetrators or the group will always know where you are and what you are saying.

The truth: This was true when you were a child and the abusers had control of you, but it is not true now. They do not have the time or resources to keep track of everyone they have abused, especially people who have relocated to another place, so they train some parts of you to report to them. Older survivors who are far away from their origins might now have no one to report to.

Why they told this lie: They knew they would not have the time or resources to keep track of you at all times once you grew up, but they did not want you to know that and disobey them.

How they made you believe it: (a) They knew where you were in your childhood. When they had you in childhood, they were adults and you were a child. When they abused you, it was in a place that they were in control of. You could only hide in places they knew, so there were not any places you could hide successfully. When they found you, they might say it was by magic, but it was not. Phrases like "Mothers have eyes in the back of their heads" reinforced the belief.

But now that you are an adult, it is unlikely that they can find you easily, especially if you have moved to another town or country. Some of your "inside children" may believe they still live in the places where they were abused; they do not know that your body has grown up and moved to a place where the abusers are not around. Some survivors, though not all, are left alone in adulthood, after the abusers close down their personality systems. They are found only if some part of them tells the abusers they are remembering and talking about the abuse.

(b) Other people. Sometimes, other people, such as your own family members, may have had the job of telling the abusers where you were or what you said when you were a child. They might still have this job. If you are not telling these people things now, the abusers will not know. Often, survivors feel an urge to call a "safe" family member, who is actually not a safe person. Such people also notice and report changes in your energy, hopefulness, body care, friendships, concentration, and learning.

(c) Reporter parts. You probably have one or more inside parts or people who have the job of reporting to your abusers if you ever begin to tell or remember what they did to you. Here's a question to think about: Why would the abusers need parts of you to report to them where you are or what you have said, if they already know? The answer is that they would not. They gave parts the job of reporting because they knew that when you are an adult they would not be able to keep track of what you do or say. If there is some part of you who feels he or she just has to tell your mother, brother, uncle or somebody from your childhood what you are saying or what you do in therapy, be suspicious. Make sure that part does not act on this impulse.

(d) Hidden microphones. Reporter parts are trained through tricks usually involving microphones. When you were a child, they might have put you in a room where they had hidden a microphone. They would listen to whatever you said when you thought they were not listening, and then they came in and punished you for what you said. They might have told you that they knew by magic, or that some small animal or bird or insect told them, or that they watched from the shadows, or that there was something like a microphone or transmitter which they put in your body which let them know your location, or that the walls had ears. All these were lies. The reporter parts were the ones punished, and they were told they always had to tell what they had said or where they were before they got punished for not telling. The truth is that the rooms you are in now do not have hidden microphones so no one outside these rooms can hear what you say.

What to do about it: Look for your reporter parts and explain to them why they should not report anything you have told anyone about what happened to you. If they report regularly, have them just say that nothing has been done or said against the rules of the group who abused you. The truth now is that if your reporter parts do not tell the abusers things, the abusers will not know. So, it is very important that the reporters stop reporting the truth to the abusers. If they are supposed to call at regular times, they can just talk about unimportant things or even tell lies. The abusers lied to you, so why should you not lie to them? See Lie #6 about lying to abusers. If the reporter parts do not believe they are safe and refuse to cooperate, do not disclose abuses until you and your therapist have worked with these parts sufficiently to get their cooperation. They might agree to be put to sleep when you talk to your therapist about what happened to you, or to have their memories wiped by other parts who know how to do it, so that they will not have to report about disclosures. Or you can have them report to "inside copies" of the abusers.

6. Lie: Your abusers always know if you are lying, so you must always tell the truth to them or you will be punished.

The truth: There has been a lot of research into whether or not people can tell when other people are lying, and they cannot. Your abusers cannot tell if you lie to them.

How they made you believe it: When you were a child, your family and/or abusers knew a lot about your life. They may have set you up to lie to them about something they already knew, then punished you for lying.

What to do about it: Realize that although in most situations telling the truth is the right thing to do, there are some situations (when someone's life or health, including your own, is at stake), it may be right to lie, especially to people who cannot be trusted. If you decide to lie to your abusers, practice that lie so you can do it effectively.

7. Lie: You can trust the people who abused you, your "family," but you cannot trust anyone else.

The truth: There are many people who are trustworthy and will not betray you or let you down. You cannot trust people who are part of a group that abuses children. Your abusers are the very people you can never trust, whether or not they are your biological family. They are the people who abused you, and who made you watch or take part in abuses of helpless children, adults, and animals. How could you possibly trust people who have behaved like this, regardless of how "nice" or "normal" they might seem at other times? You can rely on the fact that they will hurt you and lie about it!

How they made you believe it: They had someone whom you believed was not one of them hurt you or betray your trust. That person was actually one of them. They may have had a family member or a cult member rescue you. They arranged your personality system so that the parts who were rescued do not know the abuse which the other parts experienced by family or group members, including the same people who rescued you.

Also, when you were very young, they might have set up some kind of a trick situation, where you had to choose between people whom you believed were outsiders to the perpetrator group or family, and members of that group or family. If you chose to go to the outsiders, they abused you. If you chose to go to the group members, they were nice to you and rewarded you. The trick was that the people who were supposedly “outsiders” were not really outsiders; they were just group members you had not met before. And the group members who were nice to you were not always nice in this way but some part in you created just for this situation did not know that.

What to do about it: When all your internal parts share information with one another, you can discover the lie in this kind of training. Some part who is older than the one trained here can share what he or she knows about what else those “outsiders” and those “nice people” did at other times.

Do not trust anyone who has abused you at any time. Many abusers in these perpetrator groups are dissociative, and their “nice” parts may not even know what their abusive parts do.

With true outsiders, take your time to evaluate whether or not you can trust them. Share information internally so that those parts of you who make the decisions have all the necessary information to know whether people are trustworthy. Many people can be trusted with some information but not with everything you have to tell.

8. Lie: The group can kill you or take you away at any time and no one can stop it from happening.

The truth: It is very risky for an abuser group to kill someone or permanently kidnap them. If that person is known in the world, there will be an investigation, and abuser groups do not want that to happen. The victims they kill are usually street people or unregistered children (whom no outsiders know exist), not people with real-world identities. Groups can temporarily kidnap survivors to re-abuse them, but they let them go. In the past they kidnapped children and sometimes killed adults with known identities, but it is now almost always too risky for them to do this, particularly if the person has disclosed abusers’ identities to an outsider like a safe therapist or doctor.

How they made you believe it: You probably saw the abusers appear to kill someone, or even kidnap a child, back in the days when parents did not watch their children as closely as they do now.

What to do about it: Know that you are very probably safe from being killed or permanently abducted, but if an abuser group actually knows where you are, take precautions so that they will not take you somewhere and re-abuse you.

Survivors who come from very high-ranking cult families, who are being used in important jobs for the perpetrator group, or who have knowledge of publicly known crimes, are likely to be tracked more thoroughly than rank-and-file survivors. Unfortunately, modern technology makes it easier to discover someone's address, or follow them via tracking their cellphone. So if you are one of those survivors who is important to the perpetrator group, you may have to be extra careful not to make yourself vulnerable to abduction. You also have to remember that some cult people are experts in disguises and know how to con people and present a likeable front, and may try to befriend you. For example, if they hear that you are ill, they might move in to "help" you, but will actually torture you.

Lies about obedience and disobedience

9. Lie: You are "good" if you obey the abusers, and "bad" if you do not.

The truth: You know deep inside what is good and bad. It is bad to hurt people or animals. The abusers use "good" to mean obedient and "bad" to mean disobedient. But there is a higher form of goodness, based on the Golden Rule—"treat other people the way you would like them to treat you." If obeying someone means violating the Golden Rule, it is not really good at all. Somewhere deep down inside you, you know this. You did not want to obey many times because you knew what they were doing was wrong. Most of the time what the abusers told you to do was bad, even though they told you it was good.

Why they told this lie: To confuse you and to make you disobey your own conscience. Children believe what adults say, and trust the adults to know better than they do.

How they made you believe it: They said it a lot. They talked all the time, as many parents do, about being "good" in terms of obedience. If you refused to do something you knew would hurt yourself or someone else, they said you were bad. They punished you for trying to escape, for talking to outsiders, for acts of kindness. They punished you for being disobedient, and they sometimes rewarded you for being obedient.

What to do about it: You still have your conscience, and underneath all the training the abusers gave to parts of you, you still know that it is right to care for yourself and other people and wrong to hurt yourself or others. Know that the guilty and fearful feelings you get when you disobey the abusers is just left over from all the punishment and lies they told you. Trust in your own inner knowledge of what is good and bad. If you are in doubt, ask someone you trust who is not one of the abusers. Try to get back to the higher morality of the Golden Rule, and base your behavior on trying to treat others and yourself with kindness and compassion rather than having to obey anyone who would make you do harm.

10. Lie: You have to remain loyal and obedient to the people who abused you, because you made vows or promises to them. If you do not, you are a traitor and deserve punishment.

The truth: Vows or promises made by children are not legally valid. Children who are forced to make vows or promises under duress, including "marriage" vows, are not legally bound to keep those promises. Even if you signed an agreement or contract consciously as an adult, it is not valid if it was coerced or signed by one part of you without the knowledge of the main "real world" person.

Why they told you this lie: They used your desire to be a loyal person who keeps your word, as well as your fear of death and pain, to make you keep their crimes a secret.

How they made you believe it: Many children abused by organized perpetrator groups were forced to watch a supposed "traitor" being tortured, raped, and/or apparently murdered, and sometimes forced to hold the knife or other instrument that was used. Some of these crimes are simulated, but others are real, and the children forced to be there believe they are real.

Under this kind of duress, a child splits off parts that are desperate to be loyal. When these parts do what is required of them, including making vows, they are rewarded by the abusers.

What to do about it: Vows made by a child under duress are not legally valid, so you do not have to do anything other than recognize this.

Some survivors like to make formal statements which deliberately contradict the vows they were forced to make, for example, "divorcing Satan" if they were "married" to him.

11. Lie: If you disobey your abusers, someone you love, or your pet, or another vulnerable child will be punished or will die.

The truth: When you were a child, they could punish someone else to make you obey their instructions. If you are still in contact with the perpetrators now, and they want to continue to use you, they are able to punish someone else (though they are unlikely to actually kill that person). But they will only do it when you are present to watch or take part. If you are no longer in physical contact with them, no one will be harmed because you disobey their instructions. They will continue harming other children, but you have no control over that, only over how you yourself can become and stay safe. Children and adult survivors do not need abusers, even if they are mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, grandparents, sons, daughters, best friends, spouses, or lovers.

How they made you believe it: When you disobeyed as a child, they punished a younger child, perhaps your little brother or sister, for your disobedience. Or they harmed or killed a child or an animal and told you it was because of your disobeying them. They might even have made you harm someone, telling you that if you did not do it they would harm you as well as that person, or they would hurt that person worse than you would. They did this when you were a child under their control in order to make you do things you would not otherwise agree to do. They used your own love and compassion against you.

What to do about it: Refuse to believe this lie, and keep yourself physically safe and away from any of the abusers. Do not return to them and give them the opportunity to harm you or someone else in your presence. If you are unable to keep physically away from the abusers, consider relocating to another part of the country or the world, but only do this when no part of you is reporting your location to the abusers.

12. Lie: Your internal leaders must always make the other parts obey, and punish them if they disobey, or the abusers will find these inner people and punish them severely.

The truth: Your abusers probably did put some inner “people” in charge of the others, and instruct them to keep all parts of you obeying the abusers’ instructions through threats and punishments. However, if you have physically moved away from your abusers, and they are no longer able to physically capture and punish you, your internal leaders no longer have to perform internal punishments and give warnings. The abusers will not punish these leaders if they stop doing their jobs, because they can only punish any parts of you if they have your body to punish.

Why they told this lie: They wanted to continue to have control of you when you were far away from them. They knew that you would grow up and move away, so they gave those parts the job of making everyone inside you continue to obey them.

How they made you believe it: It was actually true when you were a child and under the control of the abusers. Those parts were put in charge and punished if any parts under their authority disobeyed. But the abusers can only do this if they have your body to punish.

What to do about it: Make sure that all parts, especially those who were put in charge, know what year it is, how old your body is, where you live, and how far away you are from your abusers. Many parts can be "stuck in the past" and still think it is 1968 or 1987 or some other year when you were still physically a child and the abusers were in charge of you. The parts who were put in charge need to be fully informed about the situation, and if they realize they are no longer in danger, then they can stop punishing the others and learn to work together with all parts for your safety and healing.

13. Lie: If you do as you are told, you will rise to be the highest member of the coven.

The truth: Ritual abusers say this to every child they abuse. Every ritually abused child has within him or her parts such as the high priest or priestess, the bride of Satan, and possibly the programmers. These lies are told to these parts to keep them in line. The persons to lead the next generation of the group are usually chosen at birth, and no one else can rise to those positions.

How they made you believe it: By creating these parts and telling them these lies. There are many reasons parts of you would want to believe this—it would give them some importance, safety, and a sense of purpose and belonging.

What to do about it: Just realize you were lied to.

Lies about keeping in contact with your abusers

14. Lie: If you go to the abusers, you will not be punished, and if you obey and go back, you will get a special treat.

The truth: If you have been disloyal in any way, such as going to see a safe therapist or telling anyone anything about the abuse, you will be punished when you return to the abusers. The "special treat" could be a chance to harm or kill some creature, with a cheap ring and a fake "promotion" given to you afterward. Or it might be a chance to be hurt. You may be rewarded with sex or given drugs in an attempt to get you addicted.

If you do not go to them, they will not be able to hurt you or to make you hurt any other creature.

How they made you believe it: There might have been an event in your childhood where you were rewarded for going to them.

What to do about it: Do not go to them! Try to educate those parts who go to them about what actually happens when you get there, so they will not want to go there anymore.

15. Lie: If you do not return to the abusers on birthdays and other special dates, they will hurt someone else.

The truth: They will only do this if you are there to watch or to be forced to take part in hurting the other person.

How they made you believe it: On one or more occasions in childhood you were late or did not show up for one of their events, when they were still in control of you. As a punishment, they hurt someone else while you watched, or made you hurt someone.

What to do about it: Make sure that you do not go back to the abusers. They might still hurt other people, of course, but not because of you. You might want to change the date on which you celebrate your birthday, or just pretend you do not have a birthday at all.

16. Lie: If you do not return to the abusers on birthdays and other special dates, they will hunt you down and punish you.

The truth: This might be true if you still live in the vicinity of your abusers. It is not true if you live far away from them. They cannot just leave their lives and travel across the continent or the world to find you, and force you to travel back with them.

How they made you believe it: They played games when you were a child, during which you had to hide and they inevitably found you. They did hunt you down and punish you when you were a child if you tried to be absent from one of their events.

What to do about it: Assess carefully whether you are far enough away from the abusers. You might need to make careful plans to move away from them if they are still able to abduct you easily. If you plan to move away, make sure that no inside "reporter" reports your plans and your new location to the abusers.

17. Lie: If you do not tell the abusers what you have told outsiders about them, the abusers will know you have told outsiders, and will hunt you down and punish you.

The truth: If you do not report to the abusers, they will know nothing about what you have or have not told others (as long as those others were not people sent by the abuser group.)

Why they told this lie: To protect themselves from being punished for their crimes; to stop any possible exposure of their crimes as quickly as possible.

How they made you believe it: See Lie #3 under "Lies about abusers' powers", above. They triggered you to tell someone, and listened with a hidden microphone, when you were a child. Or the person you told was actually one of them. There are no hidden microphones now, the walls do not have ears, there is no all-seeing eye that will see you, and no creatures will report to the abusers if you do not report to them. Those were all lies they told to convince you that they know whatever you say. There are still people who seem safe but are actually part of the group, however.

What to do about it: Make sure that the reporter parts do not report to abusers. If you have to talk to a family member who is part of the abusive group, make sure that reporter parts are ready to lie or do not know anything you have told an outsider.

18. Lie: You always have to answer the phone, or something bad will happen.

The truth: Your phone is under your control. Nothing will happen if you do not answer it.

Why they told this lie: They wanted you to always be accessible to them, to report about your life and any disclosures you have made, and to be told where and when to go back to them.

How they made you believe it: They set up a scenario when you were a child where you were punished by them or by someone impersonating "Satan" when you did not answer the phone.

What to do about it: Turn your phone to voicemail, get Call Display, and then you can decide whether or not to answer calls or to listen to messages.

19. Lie: Even on the phone, inside parts of you have to come out if they are asked for.

The truth: Your abusers do not actually know which part of you they are talking to.

Why they told this lie: They wanted to have complete control of you, and part of that control is getting out the parts who are too fearful to disobey them.

How they made you believe it: They punished you until the part they wanted would come out, so all the parts learned to come out when called out.

What to do about it: Try to avoid talking with any abusers who might call out parts. But if you do find yourself talking to them, remember that they do not know which part they are talking to, and keep a strong part out who will not obey them or is capable of lying to them when they ask questions which could get you into trouble.

20. Lie: You always have to answer the door and open it, even if you do not want to see the person who comes to the door.

The truth: You are an adult and your life is your own. If you have a good sturdy lock on your door, you do not have to open it to anyone you do not want to see, and they will not break the door down now.

Why they told this lie: They wanted to be able to get hold of you and re-abuse you after you moved away from them.

How they made you believe it: They might have broken down a door and punished you as a child if you locked a door against them.

What to do about it: Keep a strong lock on your door and make sure that no part of you comes out to unlock and open the door if your abusers come to the door.

Lies about what will happen if you tell

21. Lie: It is not safe to tell anyone what happened to you. If you tell a therapist or a doctor they will disbelieve you, say you are crazy, and lock you up in a mental institution where you will be drugged, restrained, and possibly abused. They might actually abuse you themselves.

The truth: A therapist or doctor who is not part of the perpetrator group will not personally abuse you if you tell them what happened. There is a chance that they will think you are mentally ill, lock you up in a mental hospital, and/or put you on drugs to treat your "illness." However, it is actually difficult to get admitted to a psychiatric facility these days, and even if you were admitted, you would likely be out in a few days. There is also a chance that they will believe you and give you the help that you need. It depends on how well educated they are about abuse and trauma. You will not be abused in hospital unless the group who abused you has access to that hospital. Some hospitals are safe and supportive for survivors; some are not.

Why they told this lie: They do not want their secrets discovered because their acts were crimes, and they could be tried and imprisoned for what they did to you.

How they made you believe it: When you were a child or a teenager you might have been taken to a "therapist" or a "doctor" who was actually one of the abuser group. They might have abused you in their office. They might have put you in a place you believed to be a mental institution and given you strong drugs which made you feel crazy, and you might have been abused there. This was a trick to make you think that therapists and doctors who are not part of the abuser group cannot be trusted.

(a) Many children who are being abused on an ongoing basis are taught not to go to doctors about their injuries or illnesses. Doctors attached to the abusive group treat them and often abuse them.

Parents who permit their children to be abused, or who abuse them, do not want any doctor who is not part of the perpetrator group to discover injuries, because they could then get in trouble with the law, and their children could be taken from them and put into safe foster homes. If a child is abused so badly that he or she has to be hospitalized, the parents lie to the doctors and social workers, and the child is too frightened to talk because he or she will be returned to the family.

(b) In some cases, the group may have used real doctors or therapists who were members of their group. But this does not mean that all such people belong to these groups. Most doctors and most therapists are sincere, good people who want to help. However, many of them are completely unaware that there are groups who torture and brainwash children, and some might find it difficult to believe and might think you are deluded.

What to do about it: Therapists can be enormously helpful to survivors of extreme and organized child abuse. However, not all therapists understand dissociation and people who have other "parts" or "people" inside. If possible, the therapist you choose to talk to will be recommended by someone you trust (not a family member or another unhealed survivor). Ideally, he or she should have experience both with people with different parts inside and with survivors of the kind of abuse you experienced.

However, do not tell the therapist a lot of information about the abuses you suffered until you know that your therapist is not part of the abuser group, and no inside part of you is reporting your disclosures to the abusers. If the reporters do not report, the abusers do not know you are talking to an outsider. If the reporters do report to the abusers, the group will do something to make you stop talking.

Once you are sure that no part of you is reporting your disclosures to the abusers, go ahead and talk to your therapist. You need to talk about what happened to you in order to recover from it. Your abusers will not know, and you will be safe with the therapist, as long as the therapist is not part of the abuser group.

If you have an illness or injury, it is wise to go to a medical professional to have it assessed and treated. However, do not go to the one you had in childhood unless you are 100% sure that person is safe. Most doctors are not involved with perpetrator groups. A doctor can also document any visible injuries from your abuse.

22. Lie: It is not safe to tell the police what happened to you. They will lock you up in prison because you are a murderer or a rapist. You will be abused when you are locked up.

The truth: A court will never jail someone for crimes in which they were forced to participate as a child. Children are not responsible for these crimes; the adults who made them take part are responsible.

Why they told this lie: They do not want their secrets discovered because their acts were crimes, and the adults could be tried and imprisoned for what they did to you.

How they made you believe it: When you were a child you may have been introduced to an abuser you did not know dressed in a police uniform, and triggered to tell this person something that the abusive group did to you. You might have been triggered to remember and tell about a crime in which you were forced to participate. The "police officer" (who was actually one of the abuser group) then abused you, said you were a murderer or a rapist, and locked you up in a place you believed to be a prison, where he or other "officers" or "inmates" abused you.

What to do about it: It is probably unwise to talk to law enforcement about what happened to you until and unless you have your memories completely clear and you are far away from where the abuse happened. The police will not lock you up or call you a criminal or abuse you themselves. However, police have to talk to the alleged abusers, who will then know you are talking about what they did and could decide to come and punish you. You might need to report your abuses in order to get funding for therapy from a crime victims' assistance fund, and other state or county benefits. This is a safe thing to do as long as you are far away from your abusers. If you do talk to the police, it is wise to have a good therapist with you or at least seeing you regularly when you do this.

23. Lie: There is a bomb inside you. If you talk about the abuse, the bomb will go off and kill you and anyone near you.

The truth: There is no bomb inside you.

Why they told this lie: They did not want the dirty secrets of their abuse revealed.

How they made you believe it: They did a fake operation, putting you to sleep in a place that appeared to be a hospital and having you wake up with a bandage. They might have showed you an X-ray of the bomb inside someone. That X-ray was of someone else's body, not yours. They probably used the same X-ray for all the children.

What to do about it: Help those inner people or parts involved in this memory to discover how the trick was done. Have them share with one another all parts of the memory.

24. Lie: There is a creature inside you. If you talk about the abuse, the creature will eat you up from inside.

The truth: There is no creature inside you.

Why they told this lie: They did not want the dirty secrets of their abuse revealed.

How they made you believe it: They might actually have put a real creature in a body cavity, then removed it when you were unconscious or had a different part of you out in the body.

What to do about it: Help those inner people or parts involved in this memory to discover how the trick was done. Have them share with one another all parts of the memory.

25. Lie: People you tell about the abuse and their families will be hurt or killed.

The truth: Organized abusers do not kill people who have identities in the real world; it is too risky because there would be an investigation.

How they made you believe it: When you were a child, they might have given you someone to talk to about the abuse, and then killed or pretended to kill that person.

What to do about it: Keep on talking to people you know you can trust, especially your therapist. The more you tell, the more careful the group will be not to get discovered. But get all your inside parts to agree to this so that some of them do not punish you for telling outsiders. It may be difficult to get them to agree, but while you wait for consensus, those parts whom the abusers put in charge can give new orders that everyone must obey—that you should talk and not keep the cult's evil secret.

Lies about life and death and reality

26. Lie: Your life will always be so unbearable that it is better to die.

The truth: The feeling that your life is unbearable is a feeling from a memory when your abusers made you feel this way through a combination of drugs and torture and verbal abuse. There may be parts inside you whose job is to give you flashbacks and body memories, especially memories of times when you were made to harm someone. If you have escaped from the abusers, your life can become much happier when these parts stop doing the jobs the abusers assigned them.

Why they told this lie: They wanted you to be dead rather than telling the world about the horrible things they were doing.

How they made you believe it: They put you, as a child, in an unbearable situation, in which you were not only abused but also told repeatedly that you were worthless, a waste of space, and ought to be dead. They then instructed some parts to make you feel the feelings from this awful situation if you began to remember or talk about the abuse.

What to do about it: Find the parts who are making you have these feelings, and help them know that you are now safe and they no longer have to force you to feel this way; nothing will happen to them if they stop doing this.

27. Lie: If you (a particular inside person) kill the body, you will not die.

The truth: If the only body you have in this real world is killed, all parts of you will die. Even if you have a separate body from the others in your inside world, you share the same body with them in the real world outside.

How they made you believe it: They split off a part who could not feel anything in the body, probably because of anesthetic drugs. They told that part that he or she was not one of you, and did not belong to the body. They promised that part a great reward if he or she killed the body. They might have given that part a taste of the reward—strong "happy" drugs or enjoyable sex, or food after being starved. This is no different from the training of the assassins and suicide bombers trained in the Middle East with hashish to believe that they will go to paradise to enjoy sexual pleasures.

What to do about it: Again, do not believe the lies. You can test to see whether any inside being is part of the body this way: Mark something on your hand. Then ask that being to come out and see whether or not what you have marked is on its hand.

28. Lie: It is honorable to die for the cause of the abusers.

The truth: There is no honor in dying for the beliefs of someone who forced you to obey them when you were a child, without knowing whether those beliefs are right. The honorable thing is to find out whether those beliefs are really true and are worth giving your life for.

How they made you believe it: They pounded this idea into your head, telling you not to think, just to obey. They made you repeat their beliefs and your vows of loyalty and your promise to die for the cause. They might have told you that you are a soldier in a great army.

What to do about it: Think for yourself. You have a choice. Decide what all parts of you together believe. Do not give away your most precious possession, your life, for things you were brainwashed to believe.

29. Lie: Dead people can come back to life if they have special powers.

The truth: No one has the power to become alive again once they are dead, although doctors can restart the heart of someone who dies in hospital if they do it right away.

How they made you believe it: You saw someone important killed, but it was actually a trick. Then, when you saw that person alive again they told you it was because he had special powers.

What to do about it: You do not have to believe what adults told you when you were little. Ask your parts if any of them know what trick was used to make you think a person was actually killed when that person was alive later. For example, a bag of blood could be placed on top of the person and stabbed.

30. Lie: Eating someone's flesh and drinking human blood makes you wise and powerful.

The truth: Some occult religious groups and cannibalistic tribes believe this. If this were the case, the people who abused you would really be wise as well as powerful in the real world. Usually they are not.

How they made you believe it: You were a child when they told you this, and you believed what adults say.

What to do about it: You are now old enough to think for yourself and decide the beliefs that make sense to you, not to blindly follow what you were told.

31. Lie: Spiders, worms, snakes, or insects will eat you alive or bite or sting you to death.

The truth: Most of these creatures are just harmless creatures and do not eat people.

How they made you believe it: When you were very little, they put you in among these creatures and told you that if you moved or made a sound these creatures would bite you, sting you, or eat you up. You believed what adults told you.

What to do about it: Read or watch nature shows about the creatures you are afraid of so that you can learn the truth about them.

32. Lie: Everyone you know is linked to the abuser group and knows your every move, and will report back to your abusers.

The truth: Most people do not even know about the kind of abuse you experienced, and would be shocked to hear about it. However, some well-meaning people might not believe that people can do such evil things, and might talk to your family members, believing that you need help for such crazy thoughts. This is particularly true for children and teens. Also, especially if you are of high value to the abuser group, they may have encouraged you to move into a neighbourhood where many people were part of the group, and they may have selected friends for you who were part of the group.

How they made you believe it: They introduced you to people you thought were not part of the group, and they did turn out to be group members, who were sent to you by the group.

What to do about it: Take your time in getting to know people and do not blurt out your experiences to everyone. See whether they can be trusted with smaller disclosures, and if they can, then you can tell them more. However, if you are of high value to the cult and are being pursued in adulthood, it is wise not to speak about the organized abuse at all unless you are certain the person you are speaking to is not part of the group. Be cautious about people who rush in to befriend you if you move to a new location. Watch people for inconsistencies in behaviors or opinions, such as saying “we” instead of “I,” which would show they might be multiple. Notice whether they forget things they have previously said. If you know one person in a group belongs to a criminal cult, be suspicious of the other people in this person’s group. Satanists often cluster together. Make up your mind that being alone is not the worst thing.

Lies about who you are

33. Lie: If you have been made to harm some person or animal, you are evil and a perpetrator, rather than a victim.

The truth: When you were made to do this, you were in an impossible situation, and you were not there of your own free will. You would not blame the knife for what a person made it do. You were in the same situation as the knife, being used as a tool or a weapon rather than choosing to do evil, even though you might have been used by adults to accomplish evil things.

How they made you believe it: They put you in a situation where a helpless person or animal was being hurt or even killed, and they forced you to take part in this, either by physically holding you in position and moving your arm, or by threats of death to you and/or those you loved if you did not comply with their orders. If you refused, they hurt you or the other victim until you split off a part who would do what they wanted. They then told you that you were evil and “special” like them, that you belonged to them, no one else would ever want you, and that if you ever told anyone about what happened, you would be arrested and charged for the crime.

What to do about it: Although you may feel sorrow and remorse about what happened, do not believe the lie that you were responsible for it. You endured spiritual abuse by being made a part of these crimes. Get acquainted with the parts of yourself who refused to do these things, so that you can see that you as a whole person would never choose this evil. Those parts were probably discarded by the perpetrator group, and they will add strength to you when you find them.

34. Lie: Your abusers live inside you.

The truth: Everyone who lives inside you is a part of you and is not anyone else.

Why they told this lie: They wanted you to believe they were present when you grew up and they were actually far away from you.

How they made you believe it: Organized abusers like to create parts who are supposed to be internal copies of themselves. Those parts are supposed to speak to the others in their voice, do whatever they do, and bring back memories of the abuses they have done to the other parts, particularly if the other parts disobey and try to get well.

What to do about it: If you hear the abusers' voices, those are either the voices of the internal parts who are supposed to "be" the abusers, or they are memories of the abusers replayed by parts whose job is to make you believe the abusers are inside you. You may notice that the voices always say the same thing in the same way: that is because they are "playbacks" of memories. There are other parts inside who make you hear these voices. Speak to the parts who make you hear those voices, tell them they are also hurt children like you, and they do not have to be the abusers or obey them any longer. Offer them new names and new things to do, jobs which are more interesting than impersonating abusers who cannot hurt you now. For example, parts who play tapes of scary voices can play relaxing music inside.

35. Lie: God hates you because of the evil you have done—or, God approves what this group does and hates you because you do not obey your orders.

The truth: Those who believe in God, the good force in the universe, believe that He does not hate people; God only hates evil itself. Many survivors, or parts of survivors, never wanted to participate in evil, but were given forced "lesser of two evils" choices. God would never reject them, and would feel only compassion for them. Others may have been tempted by rewards, or traded someone else's safety for their own. Those who believe in a good God would say that when someone is truly sorry for having participated in evil, God willingly forgives them.

Why they told this lie: They wanted you to feel you had been rejected by God so that you would only go to them and their deities (like Satan or Lucifer) for acceptance.

How they made you believe it: Some human man impersonated God or Jesus when you were a child, and told you he hated you and wanted nothing to do with you because you were evil. He might have abused you as well.

What to do about it: Recognize that this was a trick. Try to find your own spirituality by connecting to the powerful and loving force of good in the universe, who will accept you, and forgive you if you are in need of forgiveness.

36. Lie: If you love or get attached to people or animals, something bad will happen to them.

The truth: Nothing will happen to any person you love because you love them, either through you, by the perpetrator group, or by magic. However, the perpetrators sometimes hurt pets.

How they made you believe it: They either harmed or forced you to harm, maybe even kill, someone you loved when you were a small child. They may have held your hands around the knife that the executioner was using. Then they told you repeatedly that you are evil and that the evil in you would harm anyone you got close to. They pretended this was happening, and may have simulated harm to someone who was near you. They may have told you to kill someone psychically, then had someone fall down to make you believe you had killed that person. They may have told you that they will kill anyone you tell about what they did.

What to do about it: Do not believe the lies. Seek out safe friends. Form an attachment to your therapist if he or she is good; this attachment to a good person will help you heal from the evil you were exposed to.

37. Lie: You have animals, demons, monsters, aliens, or other people's spirits inside you.

The truth: Everyone inside you is a part of you, no matter how they behave or what they look like in your inner world.

Why they told this lie: They wanted to keep most parts of you afraid to disobey, so they made some parts look and sound frightening to the others, and told them to punish or frighten the other parts so they would not disobey the abusers' instructions.

How they made you believe it: When you were a young child, they used trickery to make you believe these things. They drugged you, dressed you up in a costume, and told you that you were a demon, an animal, a monster, or an alien. They may have shown you a "mirror" which was really just a picture of some creature pasted on top of the mirror, not a real mirror. They did things to your body and told you they were putting their spirit or their seed in you, so they would be inside you. These experiences were so frightening that you split off parts who believed the lies, and these parts were given instructions to growl or to say frightening things.

What to do about it: Recognize that all parts of you who appear to be something else are really just child parts, who were hurt and told lies. Help them know that you are safe now, so they can take off their costumes, stop doing the jobs they were given, and be children again.

38. Lie: You are the child of the devil and belong only to the abusers who worship him.

The truth: If you were born in a garage, that does not make you a car. And being born into a coven family does not make you their property. You are a free human being and can choose who you will belong to and how you behave.

How they made you believe it: Some of your parts have no memories except the ones of being in rituals or other abusive scenarios. So they believed what they were told about who they were.

What to do about it: Share the other kinds of memories, such as school and friendships, with them, and help them understand that you are all parts of one child who was horribly abused.

39. Lie: You are going to hell, and will be there for eternity with Satan or Lucifer, and your only choice is whether you will be hurt there or hurt others.

The truth: No one in this life knows exactly what happens after we die. Nothing you have done in this life, especially if you were forced to do it, has earned you an eternity in hell.

How they made you believe it: They may have simulated "hell" with fire and dry ice for smoke, and people in devil costumes, in a place here on earth. They hurt you and they may have given some of your parts the choice of doing the hurting rather than being hurt. They might have made a part of you believe she was Satan's or Lucifer's bride through a sexual act by a person impersonating him, and they may have made a part believe he or she was Satan's or Lucifer's child because it was split off by a rape by someone in a costume, putting in his "seed" (sperm). (This can be done to boys as well as girls.)

What to do about it: Recognize that these were all tricks done when you were a child, that "hell" was not really the afterlife but a place on earth, and that your abusers have no control over what happens after you die. Tell the parts who were forced to hurt others that they were tricked, and they do not have to take the abusers' side to avoid being harmed after death. Develop your own understanding of what happens after death rather than taking anyone's word for it.

Recognize that being raped by someone in a devil or Beast costume does not make you either his bride or his child; it makes you his victim. Disown your "husband" or "father" or false "god."

40. Lie: You are going to heaven, where you will have to spend eternity with God or Jesus telling you that you are bad, and punishing you.

The truth: No one in this life knows exactly what happens after we die. It is up to you whether or not you believe in God or Jesus. Know, however, that those sincere souls who believe in God or in Jesus see him as being good, kind, and forgiving, not as punishing through torture.

How they made you believe it: Different survivors' experiences differ here. You may have been sexually abused and/or rejected by a priest, or told by a priest or minister that God rejected you or that you needed to have sex with him in order for God to forgive you. Abusers might have simulated "heaven" with someone in a costume pretending to be God or Jesus. At Christmas, you might have been forced to kill what you believed was the baby Jesus. At Easter you might have been forced to participate in nailing someone to a cross. Then "God" or "Jesus" rejected you, verbally and possibly physically abused you, and may even have raped you.

What to do about it: Realize that the people who hurt you were not God or Jesus, but human beings from the abuser group. Realize that if you had to hurt or kill anyone, it was not your free choice, and that person can forgive you, and that person was not really God or Jesus. That person might or might not have really died, but you were not responsible for it.

Align yourself with the good spiritual force that is within all humanity and all of nature, and reject the evil that the abusers forced upon you. Ask forgiveness from anyone you have hurt, in your imagination if not in person.

41. Lie: You have special powers that can be used at any time to destroy people's lives.

The truth: You have no special powers. Even if you have some psychic ability, many people (and animals) have that and scientific studies show that it is generally not very reliable.

How they made you believe it: They may have staged a situation in which you believed you killed or harmed someone just by being with them or by using the "power" they trained you in. It was all a trick.

What to do about it: Do not be tempted by the illusion of special powers. Instead, learn how to cooperate with all your parts internally so that you can become a peaceful, healthy human being with all parts working together for recovery.

42. Lie: People you know and like or love will always leave you and end up hating you.

The truth: People like those who treat them kindly, and do not like those who mistreat them. However, infiltrators from the perpetrator group usually start by appearing unusually helpful and kind.

How they made you believe it: They told you repeatedly that people would abandon you. They might have allowed you to become friends with someone who then turned on you. This was a setup; the other person was obeying their orders.

What to do about it: Choose your own friends from among the people who treat you with kindness, after checking with all your insiders about whether those people are consistently kind and honest. Treat them the way you would like them to treat you, and they will not leave you or hate you.

43. Lie: Your brain or your heart has been replaced by that of another person or creature.

The truth: Every part of your body is the original part you were born with.

Why they told this lie: They wanted complete control over you, and they wanted you to believe that your body belonged to them rather than to you.

How they made you believe it: When you were a young child, they put you on an operating table and did a fake "operation" to replace some part of your body. They showed you the brain or heart they were supposedly putting into you. You were young enough to believe that this was possible. It is not. It was a trick.

What to do about it: Try to explain gently to the young parts that what the abusers said they were doing is actually impossible. If some inside part was watching from outside the body, that part may be able to show you how the trick was done.

44. Lie: You were abducted by aliens.

The truth: The people who hurt you in childhood were human beings.

Why they told this lie: They wanted to make sure no one would believe you if you talked about what really happened to you.

How they made you believe it: When you were a child, they drugged and hypnotized you, then people in costumes pretended to be aliens, and took you to a place that looked like a spaceship and abused you there. They might have used films while you were drugged so you thought the things in the films were happening to you.

What to do about it: Recognize that although you may remember something, it might not have been what your abusers said it was. Their abuses are full of tricks and lies, and this was a trick to make your memories appear unreal. Do not let this memory make you stop talking about your other memories.

45. Lie: You are a robot, or a computer, or a sex machine, or a killing machine, not a person. Or you have robots inside you who control your mind and body.

The truth: You are a human being, and all your inside parts are parts of that human being.

How they made you believe it: When each part was split off by the abusers' torture, it was told a lie about who or what it was, and the other parts were also told this lie.

What to do about it: Recognize that each part of you, even the ones who have believed they are these things, are human parts, and were created by you, not to serve the abusers but to keep you alive and as safe as possible. Treat the child parts like children, with kindness, and let them begin to play and learn instead of having to do the jobs they were assigned by the abusers.

46. Lie: You are a soldier and your duty is to obey without thinking, and never to cry, vomit, show compassion for others, or show soft emotions like fear or sadness.

The truth: It is illegal all over the world for children to be soldiers. When armies make children act as soldiers, they are violating their human rights. You are not, and should not be, a soldier. All emotions are important and positive parts of being human. In case you did not know, you are a human being and part of being human is experiencing and expressing a whole range of emotions, from joy to anger to sadness. Emotions tell us all what is going on inside us and what the truth is.

How they made you believe it: They dressed you up in a uniform and adults in uniforms who called themselves generals or commanders or captains used their power, their size, and their loud voices to frighten you and make you obey. They made you engage in training just like an adult soldier. They might have made you watch films of soldiers marching or fighting. They talked about pride in fighting for their glorious cause, and dying for it. They gave you fake promotions. They shouted at you and told you to obey, not think for yourself. They punished you if you cried, vomited, showed fear or sadness, or showed compassion for others who were being hurt.

What to do about it: Realize that it was not legal for anyone to enslave a child as a soldier. Children need to play and to discover their own interests, not to obey orders unquestioningly. Realize you are now free, and do not have to obey the people who enslaved you as a child.

Allow the parts of you who feel the softer emotions to share with the others, so that your emotions can guide you to the truth.

47. Lie: If you fight back against your abusers, you are a traitor and should be punished.

The truth: These people were abusers, and it is right to fight against abuse. If you fought, this showed you were courageous, not a traitor.

How they made you believe it: They punished you whenever you fought against them or refused to do what they told you to do.

What to do about it: Reclaim all the parts of you who fought back, and use their energy now to fight for your healing and to stop child abuse.

48. Lie: If you cry or have soft emotions like sadness or compassion, you are weak.

The truth: All emotions are messages to tell you what is going on. Sadness means you have been hurt or suffered a loss; compassion means you care for someone else who is being hurt, and what is happening to them is wrong. Crying is a healthy way to release sad or hurt feelings so you can heal.

How they made you believe it: They punished you severely if you cried or showed emotions like sadness or compassion.

What to do about it: Reclaim your right to cry and to feel what you feel. Recognize that no one will punish you for your feelings now. If any parts of you punish you internally for crying, explain to them that crying is not wrong, that things are different now, and that you will not get into trouble from the abusers if you cry now. Accept and care for the inside parts of you who feel these emotions. Emotions are an important part of your being. Their purpose is to let you know what you need.

49. Lie: All parts of you must stay in their assigned "places" in your inner world or structure.

The truth: No one outside your own head knows where your parts are inside, and once you remove parts from their assigned places and move them to places where they can heal, no one outside you will know where they are.

Why they told this lie: They wanted it to be easy for them or future abusers to find each part they had trained.

How they made you believe it: They trained a part of you when you were a very young child with a model of your inner world or structure, to put every part in its place. They told you that everyone must stay in his or her place. They may have punished your parts when they were found somewhere they were not allowed to be. They may have located some parts at certain locations in the body so that a touch on those spots would bring them out.

What to do about it: You can make all kinds of changes to your inner world, and your abusers will never know what changes you have made, as long as no part of you tells them. You can put in healing places, places for play, and places for learning.

50. Lie: All parts of you were created only to do the jobs assigned to them by their designers, and if they do not do these jobs they will have no purpose.

The truth: The abusers (who may have called themselves "designers" or "creators" or "manufacturers") did not "create" any of your parts, they only split the existing child into more and more parts by means of abuse, torture, and terror. All of you are parts of one person who was not allowed to develop his or her own interests and abilities.

How they made you believe it: When a part of you was newly split off, that part would not remember what happened to the ones who existed before it, so it believed what the abusers told it about who it was and why it was there, especially because of fear.

What to do about it: Let all your inside parts know that they are human, free them from the jobs they were assigned, and allow them to choose new jobs which reflect their own healthy and positive interests and abilities.

These are some of the most common lies that mind controllers tell their victims. It will empower you to know that they are lies, and you do not have to believe them any longer. Deep down inside you, when you share information and emotions among all your parts, you know the truth. You now have choices that you did not have in childhood. If there are other things your abusers told you, you need to question these things, and consult with your inside parts to discover the truth. As you do this, you will regain your freedom and control of your own life.

SECTION III

BONDS AND BETRAYAL

Why and how they prevent bonding throughout life

Wendy Hoffman

There are two kinds of people in the world—those who have had a mother's love and those who have not.

Having a mother's love seems to be fundamental to having a certain assurance. The expanse of life is so vast and overwhelming that infants need mothers to ease them into it. The deprivation can lead to a long insecurity. Despite the physical pain of torture, degradation, humiliation, being forced to do evil to others—despite all this, being motherless is probably the hardest to bear.

The mother-loved seem to walk through life engulfed in a cloud of being valued and cherished. Those who were deprived of this basic attachment, through no fault of their own, have to fight for self-assurance and to eschew a sense of rootlessness.

Mind controllers have to eliminate the sense of primary attachment in order to gain control of the infant's mind. If the mind controllers are to have the perfect specimen, then they must have a tabula rasa (blank slate) from birth or almost from birth. Mind control can be imposed on children and even older children, but infants from multi-generational families are their best bet, because the mind controllers have access to the child from conception, and can prevent the bond that knits together the infant's disparate states.

Bonding permeates all aspects of life, like self-esteem. This essay is about why and how satanic cult perpetrators attempt to prevent its child members from bonding.

Pre-natal and newborn mind control

It is difficult for people to believe that others would deliberately separate children from their mothers physically, emotionally, and spiritually. It is even more difficult to believe that they would start working on fetuses still in the mother's womb. Specific programmers begin the electroshock in the sixth month of pregnancy. They place electrodes on the pregnant woman's skin and thereby blast the fetus. The mother loses contact with the unborn child because of the physical pain on her tender, stretched skin. The programmers have sowed the seeds of an attachment disorder even before the child is born. The effect is somewhat similar to that of the mother who drinks and uses drugs excessively or who becomes seriously ill during the pregnancy. The destructive maneuver of electroshock on the fetus is repeated at intervals throughout the remaining three months of the pregnancy. Persons destined for leadership positions receive this barbaric treatment. Those are the unfortunate individuals the leaders believe must be utterly controlled.

Some mothers, even at young ages, will have insight into the programmers' purpose. Some might even unconsciously remember their own experiences before they were born. Those mothers will stay connected to the child despite the pain. Programmers cannot tell whether the mother has remained connected. Therefore, they cause the infant physical pain after its birth by doing something like pricking its foot. The baby will cry. If it accepts comfort, it is bonded. If it cannot be comforted, it is not bonded. If the infant is bonded, he or she cannot hold a leadership position and might not be allowed to live.

People scheduled to have secondary roles in the cult do not all get this pre-birth torture. But shortly after birth, the perpetrators break the beginning bond with all cult infants. The infants will need comforting in myriad ways and the mothers will be restrained from giving it. A mother will be forced recurrently to starve her baby and render it sleep-deprived. The cult leaders then have the raw material they need, for this child's mind will be far easier to shatter and the child will be more prone to have a trauma relationship with the handler.

Trauma bonds are different from affection bonds. Trauma bonds come from desperation and deprivation, not love and abundance. This first step of deception has been completed. It will be sealed by the time the child is five years old. The emotional pain can shatter the heart. Now the child will have a dissociated brain and a dissociated heart.

In healing from this aspect of this abuse, reach out to these suffering fetuses and newborns within your mind, hold, feed, and comfort them. Tell them you love them. All this is done mentally. Make sure they stay warm and not dehydrated or hungry. Rock and sing to them. Keep them away from mean or toxic people, if possible. Eventually, they will be incorporated into the wholeness of the brain. They have been waiting for the rest of the internal system's acknowledgement all these years.

The bonds between infants and parents, especially mothers, are broken in cult families when infants' emotions are the hottest and most inflexible. While babies are still in their cribs, master programmers set up scenarios to teach them that their mothers do not love or care about them. For example, a handler hurts the child physically, and the mother is forced to walk by the crib without looking at the child who has been starved and is dehydrated and crying. Or the mother feeds a sibling while the starving infant watches.

Children hold on to intense feelings, especially those of rejection and abandonment, which can exist throughout life. When this kind of rejection is repeated often, the child will be wary, reluctant, and later unable, to bond with the mother. Rage then replaces bonding. The drive to be close to people can be strong enough to overcome some of these fearful, angry emotions temporarily, but the fear and anger are likely to surface, along with a conviction that people do not, and will never, care. Survivors might get close to some people, but not thoroughly close. In addition, further programming throughout their lives makes them unable to relax fully with another human being. They can often relate peacefully to animals, however.

All the survivor can do during the healing process is be aware of these parts, talk with them, listen to them, offer them comfort and, if possible, safety from perpetrators. Try to find out, meaning let them or an internal witness tell you how this disruption occurred. You can see your mother as forced to reject you rather than as choosing to reject you, and as a powerless victim trapped in a web of evil, at a time when there were not resources or therapists to help.

In another world, your original mother might have been able to love you. That anger from manufactured rejection can be turned into a healthy self-love, looking to the future while understanding the hideous past.

Cult children are taught how to kill themselves. In case these children do not follow the rules or have minds that cannot be split into pieces, programmers have to arrange for their possible termination. Programmers give mothers the job of helping train their children to attempt suicide. The children are quick to understand that their mothers want them dead. Adah Sachs wrote an article about infanticidal attachment in the book she co-edited, Forensic Aspects of Dissociative Identity Disorder (2008). She points out that you cannot switch off bonding. If the parent wants the infant dead, the infant will try to accommodate the parent's wishes, most likely, in an effort to survive. This understanding seals the lack of attachment further. Ironically, mothers might participate in instructing their children to kill themselves in order to save their children's lives. Children who have not mastered the basic rules of cult life are usually expendable. For some survivors, knowing that parents or leaders want them dead is enough to stop suicidal ideations and plans. Why kill yourself because your enemies want you to?

Because life is particularly difficult for survivors, it helps to find one bit of pleasure each day. The pleasure could be in nature, food, animals, hot showers, books, music, sports, and possibly another human, should there be a kind and loving one in your life. Humans who are kind when in their ordinary life personas but not, of course, in their cult personas will not be sufficient. Find a way to allow comfort and pleasure to interrupt the horrors even if the reprieve of pleasure is for a short time.

The sacrificed

Survivors of mind control grow up in a culture that labels some as expendable and disposable. That means their lives are not valued. Leaders can decide when they will die. They can be murdered for disobedience, perhaps for trying to escape, though in general children raised to be expendable do not have the fight left in them to be rebellious. Usually, they are murdered at one of the prescribed ages, such as six or thirteen. Six and sixteen are more common for females; thirteen, eighteen, or thirty-three for males. Their deaths are usually in front of large gatherings—during high-holiday or specially arranged rituals. Some awful lie will be attached to their deaths. For example, children who loved these victims will be taught not to love or those loved ones will be murdered, and other children are told these people were killed because they were traitors, so they should not be a traitor.

It is all orchestrated. Children from birth to about six years old are routinely deprived of love. Then, as if magically, they receive a friend. The cult leaders carefully choose a friend from among their population of sacrificial victims bred for this purpose. Suddenly, for the children who will survive, life is quasi-normal. Someone loves them. There is companionship. They can share with another child and tell their secrets, though they do not know the hidden-life secrets, already well buried and almost irretrievable. Life becomes sweet, worthwhile. They bloom as a person. For about a year. The duration can vary, but at the end of the allotted time, the child who has tasted love is forced to participate in the murder of his or her friend. Naturally, that makes the child afraid to love and guilt-ridden. A particularly compelling account of this cruelty is Stella Katz's "For Miranda," in Alison Miller's Healing the Unimaginable, Treating Ritual Abuse and Mind Control (London: Karnac Books, 2012, p. 211).

The mind control message is that love is not allowed, that the cult leaders will murder any person or animal you love. Is this not the worst betrayal, worse even than not knowing your personal history or what your mind is doing at any given moment? To lose the ability to love or to be afraid to love is greater than even losing the ability to think in an organized way because of the mind control and recurrent concussions administered all through childhood to some. To be afraid to love strips people of humanity, even if the fear of loving is to protect beloveds.

If you were born into a criminal mind control type cult, you have to ask whether there is anything in life that is not betrayal.

The victims' mothers grieve. How do you compensate the mothers for what grew in their bodies? The siblings become more insecure. Will it happen to them? Will they be next? What did their sibling do wrong? Why wasn't I nicer? They swim in grief and guilt, as do some of the parents. What could I have done to protect? they ask themselves.

This is a world where some are not deemed worthy of life, where freedom counts for nothing. Sadness bursts in this world. People here would have wanted more. If some person or animal known to a cult-raised child becomes ill or injured, or dies, the child is told it is his or her fault. This cements the message that it is not safe to love anyone.

Survivors have to steel themselves; otherwise the loss will eat their leg off. Growing up in an evil world can take away hope. The goodness in these "expendable" victims gave hope to the victims who knew them. Now those victims believe that to love will cause death. Survivors become numb, sometimes only feeling their grief and fear at 3 a.m.

People have different ideas about the afterlife and no one knows for certain. It is possible that the special friend who was murdered young protects you during your life, places a protective shield over your body so that you do not feel the injuries as gravely as you would have otherwise. That has been my experience.

As they live their lives as survivors, some remembering what has occurred, many not knowing—as they proceed with their lives, they notice in themselves a hypersensitivity to loss, abandonment, and rejections. Those who have lost these innocent loved ones carry that pain everywhere. When a fickle friend drops them for the new person on the block, they suffer enormously. When their work is rejected or they are fired, the sting goes deep. The foundation of their lives is loss, and that makes a huge difference to how you develop. The survivors of the "expendables" often gravitate to those who will not live long, who are physically or psychologically vulnerable. It is as if their grief searches for an object. Those with pre-natal programming may find abandonment almost impossible to deal with.

Again, knowing the source of these emotions paves the way for healing them. It was not your fault that your friend was murdered. That murder is not sufficient reason to stop you from loving in the future. The more you understand this, the more you can release unearned guilt and try to relate to others in love. This is not your guilt. It is someone else's.

There is much unrequited love in survivors. That love can be given to yourself as a first act in nurturing yourself back into being who you are and are meant to be. When you are young, you have no way of knowing who you really are, but, as an adult, you can figure it out.

You can take a close look at yourself with the purpose of finding qualities you admire. Forget about surface qualities or even intelligence and talents. Go deeper than genetic gifts. Look at what you have done with yourself to have emerged from this background with humanity, strength and the ability to think. Your therapist or supportive friends can help you look deeply into your own soul and pull out the qualities that lead to good self-esteem. There are qualities in everyone that can create self-admiration and a healthy pride. You can learn how to mother yourself. Mothers are meant to make their children feel secure, loved, and capable, with self-esteem the opposite of what happens during mind control preparations.

Survivors, as adults, can do this for themselves.

Good people

In every nook of the world, good people exist. They might be the minority, but they are there. There are rescuers who always have an eye out for how to help people; there are people who grew up in wholesome families and want to share the enormous gift they received of having decent parents; there are benign people with good hearts who want to help everywhere. There are those who admire courage and those who fight to improve and repair the world. There are people who naturally generate wellbeing and love.

Accepting good people into our lives is a challenge for cult torture survivors. We have been programmed to love only our handlers, who control and oversee all aspects of our lives. We do not necessarily love the malicious handlers on our own. We are taught under torture and drugs to transfer our love from a true object such as the child who was sacrificed to the next person assigned to control us. It is no wonder that a handler is often commanded to be a spouse. And when a person from the army of the good enters our lives, we are programmed to reject that person.

Someone good will enter your life when you are a child and an adult and even in old age. This occurrence is an opportunity to find the childhood memory of the one person who loved you in childhood, if you do not have that memory already. You can still bask in that child's love even if they forced you to participate in that soul's death. You tasted love no matter how it ended and no matter that it was prearranged. You know what love is. It can be sifted out from its surrounding tragedies. A good soul touched your life. You were blessed.

The sacrifice certainly constrains the child's ability and willingness to love, but it is not that one-dimensional. The child basked in love for a year. The threat is real, but so is the experience of love's strength.

Children who are programmed not to bond are also placed repeatedly in traumatic situations. Ironically, trauma creates its own kind of intense bonding. War survivors attest to this phenomenon. Their connections to others who share their life-threatening experiences, their sense that only other such survivors can understand, create a bond. Survivors have both an undercoating of not being able to bond and the life experience of extreme bonding—a bonding that untraumatized people probably do not experience and perhaps understand.

Now you might be amazed at what seems to you the fuss normal people make, and, in your opinion, compared to what you have been through, about what seems like nothing much. Remember, however, that normal people think and feel with their whole minds whereas, until you are integrated, experiences in you are encapsulated and felt in only designated sections of the mind. Even small disappointments and hurts are more painful when felt with the whole mind all together.

You can betray your mind control, programmers, handlers, and, unfortunately, your family, know your past and emerge a free person who accepts love and is not programmed to push it away. You can love your child or children. You can finally love yourself. You can stop this dance with betrayal and enter life and become acquainted with freedom and love and with what others consider normal life. They did not have to fight for it with everything in them. You do.

Love becomes a choice. Does one stay paralyzed in fear or go forward to give love to someone else and to receive it? As adults, survivors can go back to those feelings of being afraid to love, see the lies and set-ups and, one hopes, undo the taught and irrational fears.

How they keep you with them

If you were born into a generational criminal mind control cult, your mother might have left you to be sexually abused by other relatives, who may have raped and drugged you; your father might have sold you to scientists who experimented on you; you might have been gang-raped frequently, and you might have been mind-controlled so that you do not know your history or what any one part of your mind is doing at any time. Programmers usurp all aspects of your life and humanity so that you cannot choose a career, or even where to live. They dictate your life and you do not know it because of the mind control these same perpetrators put into you. It does not matter that it is not legal. They have gotten away with it for hundreds of years, and duplicity has increased since families allowed the Nazi scientists and doctors such as Mengele and, now, newer ones to experiment on their children. And currently there is technology to enhance mind control procedures.

Cult children turned adults but still with child parts inside tend to love too much or not enough. They still respond on an infantile level because they have many unhealed, needy infants inside. If they are afraid to love, they may become closed, crisp, withholding adults. If they let their huge infantile need for love be expressed, they will find that partners and friends can never give enough to soothe that need, and they may become ashamed, or blame those who will not or cannot give what a mother should have given years earlier. Then, as they age, they learn to hold back and not give too much, because it will not be reciprocated. Most people have not lived through the heart of evil, or perhaps have had one bad thing happen to them and then strove to avoid any mention of evil in anyone's life. Unlike most normal people, cult people know first-hand what humans are capable of.

From the beginning, survivors have been programmed to believe that their families and cult groups are the only places where they will be accepted. If you come from a cult family and the family members have not healed and are programmed, if you want to be free, it is necessary to leave your family. To leave, survivors have to overcome their fears and this malevolent programming. It might be necessary for them even to abandon younger siblings. The difficulty in bonding makes it easier to leave but it can still be very painful, if not excruciating. Sometimes, a younger sibling will contact the escaped survivor, but the escapee should probably not respond. It could be a setup. The sibling might have been programmed to lure the escapee back home.

Marriage

Many cult marriages are pre-arranged, and people marry other cult victims who also have difficulty bonding. The miseries this abuse causes can seem never-ending. Some cult victims manage to marry a non-cult spouse, and they have a better chance of growing into a close supportive relationship. But the innocent partner will be confused and bewildered and might not be sufficiently protective.

Some people manage to escape their cult families at a young enough age that they can marry unabused mates whom they choose and have children with. They then had a bad beginning but a good ending to their lives, though they will present challenges to their partners through their fear and rage.

As survivors allow themselves to become close to another person, the pain of early disappointments might arise. It helps to have a knowledgeable-about-mind-control, compassionate mate who encourages communication and saying what is held back out of fear. That person can help you break down the walls when your fears become a high tide. You also can drop your mask and be real in that person's presence. As you heal and perhaps bond for real, whirls of pain will swim out of your body. That is the healing process. It interrupts stasis and forces the putrid out. The softness in you that had been frozen can defrost and lead you to the right people. You can feel your heart and mind for the first time.

If you are terrified of bonding with another human, start with an animal. If a dog is too demanding, begin with a cat. Animals can see essentials. They might help you. They know about love, especially if you feed them.

It is unclear whether the deepest fissures in the bonding process can be healed. If people can retrieve the memories of the early programming not to bond, which happens very young, they may be able to heal and erase those scars. Some people can make a commitment to love and even marry. Some need quiet, space around them, and an inordinate amount of solitude to manage the many painful memories each part of their brain is dealing with constantly.

Coming out of this kind of abuse, people often display extremes of behavior. Some become selfish and will do little or nothing for other people. Others work too hard on relationships and/or buy too many gifts for others. Mind control programming forms some of these traits but others are from natural, inherent tendencies. As survivors become healthier, some unhealthy friendships lose their power.

People who have not been loved or properly loved can be hungry and fierce. They can grasp at the possibility of love too hard. Unconsciously, survivors may gravitate to people like their family members. Here is where everyday psychology steps in. Perhaps they want to win over someone with the same deficiencies as their parents or siblings, and make that person more lovable and capable of loving. That is a common and known disaster course. Or, more likely, they were simply mind-controlled to love an undesirable and harmful person.

This kind of prescribed bonding with enemies and simultaneous and consequential pushing away of good people dominate cult members' lives until they untangle the mind control programs and free themselves. You have swung from fierce bonding with enemies to lukewarm bonding with good people. The first part of your life was removed from your control. The second part contains free will. That means you can choose whom to love and even whether to love.

Parenthood

Eventually, children are born to the grief-stricken victim who remains in these criminal cults. Again, that is how cults work. They need something to motivate the victim to be compliant. Having a baby to love ignites the feelings of comfort and security that the original friend brought into the survivor's life. Even a pet can provoke the early knowledge of love. Having a child or pet also creates increased anxiety. You want to protect this being at any cost. You also want to protect your own ability to love.

Many people who cannot bond and cannot love or who overlove can bond to their own newborns. These newborns are often taken away, sometimes the moment they are born. This theft leaves wounds in the mother and child. The leaders of these cults usually leave one child in the biological mother's care, but only so that they have another weapon to control the parent and make her afraid to leave. New mothers sometimes hate their newborns from the moment of their birth, if not before. These mothers realize that their babies will keep them trapped in these mind control cults.

Most survivors unfortunate enough to have had children find it impossible to leave their children or child. They often wait until their children are adults. It is unclear whether it is better for the children if the parent stays in an active cult situation with them. Parents who leave children could possibly return to rescue the children later after they have healed outside this family and cult group. If they stay, they will have to do terrible things to their own children. If they leave, someone else will be forced to do horrible things to these children. The people who keep contact with unsafe family members are usually among those who are re-programmed repeatedly.

Some people leave their families and never really find new families. Families can be insular and not welcoming of newcomers, especially newcomers with such a past. Still, it is far better to be out of a cult family, no matter what the consequences or loneliness. And many people are integrated into other families.

Workplace relationships

The work world can trigger left over feelings from one's family of origin. If bosses and administrators are fair and respectful, they can unknowingly play a strong role in helping survivors heal. They can help teach survivors that people in authority can be just and care about them as individuals. The beginning feelings of the ability to bond can start in a work environment with trust in, and respect for, a boss or supervisor. But if superiors and the overseeing administration are unfair and use people as pawns, for example, overworking and underpaying them while they take the big salaries and bonuses for themselves, or criticizing and micromanaging, then survivors might experience rage and become uncooperative. This kind of work experience can make them rebellious, which is not necessarily bad. If they can object to, and eventually break away from, a disrespectful, hostile work environment, they might eventually be able to break away from programmers, handlers, and abusive families.

When survivors enter the work world, they might automatically treat people who are lazy and not doing their lesser jobs in a cult way, which means abusively and rudely, without even realizing it. The work environment is a place where these actions and attitudes can be brought to awareness promptly and, one hopes, corrected.

Therapy

As survivors grow to want healing, many enter therapy. A major aspect of therapy is learning to bond with your therapist. This is why it is so important for the chosen therapist to be a healthy and wholesome person who does not use people. Survivors have had enough of false bonding with the deficient and sick. There is an element of falsity even with good therapy transferences. A therapist is not seen as a real human being with problems and illnesses like everyone else in the world. It is not a give-and-take relationship. But its one-sidedness can be healing and address the survivor's wounds and deficits in the hothouse type of environment of therapy needed to cure the scars left by grave insults.

The more the bonding issues heal, the freer emerging cult survivors become to have a fuller life, be comfortable with themselves, and become who they were meant to be before the insidious programming and mind control.

When you love, it can hurt your heart, but some pains are worth it. Think of them as birth pains, hard to bear but necessary. We are not really human unless we love. We cannot really parent, or even own a pet, without love in our hearts. It behoves us to undo the programming not to love and join the human race. Grief can overwhelm the human heart, but so can genuine love.

Programmers depend on your remaining unattached and unbonded. Defy them. On the other hand, if you choose to live alone and as a recluse, that is your prerogative and privilege. You deserve to live exactly as you choose.

A drop of color in a glass of water changes the color of the water. Just a drop. I can see from writing about much of my life that my family was trapped under evil. My grandfather was once a scared little boy in Galicia until they forced him to decide to be evil, this grandfather who attempted to destroy so many young minds. My mother was like a firefly closed in a glass jar with only one hole punctured for air. Even when the firefly changed colors fast, it remained lidded and caught. My sister was afraid. My legal father was still a child doing whatever he could not to be a victim. This next generation is under the lid of this oppression. My son and I had a hostile relationship. Now I can see that he was afraid I would be killed, and I was afraid he would be killed, should we show our love. We protected each other by not being close. That's more loving than spending all our holidays together.

I had a year of a boy's love. Sixty years later, I had a friend who nurtured. And another friend who cared enough about me to point me to a therapist who cared that I become free. I had three dogs who loved me. That was all I had. Drops in an expanse but enough to fight the doom that has oppressed my life. A small amount of love can undo what man has contrived for generations, from the beginning of time. Love is that potent.

Family relationships*

Wendy Hoffman

In this whole field of horrendous abuse and evil, the kicker is family relationships. Criminals like the Nazis in Nazi Germany, by contrast, are reputed to have had good family relationships even while they murdered in the cities, towns, and concentration camps. The family relationships in criminal cults, however, are not warm and friendly, except on the surface.

In these families, there are two lives going on simultaneously: the hidden life of tortuous mind control administered in electroshock chairs with drugs and additional forms of torture, secret outdoor and indoor rituals, and inner parts that on command emerge to do an assignment. There is every kind of abuse and emotional, mental, physical, sexual perversion possible. There is also soul-abuse. All that is going on underneath.

On the surface is ordinary life with work and school, family meals, weekends with outings, parties, shopping, films, maybe golf, tennis, or swimming. There's the adults cleaning the house and doing the laundry, the children's sports and music recitals and homework and projects. Cult families do what normal families do in normal life.

* Versions of this essay and the following two were presented at the Survivorship Ritual Abuse and Child Abuse 2016 Conference "Stop Mind Control and Programs", in Oakland, CA.

How do you segue from the worse kind of abuses and torture to an innocent and seemingly normal kind of everyday life? It takes serious mind control starting in infancy not to know the other life. Not only do the abusers usurp your mind and capacity to think and be yourself, they deprive you of a family.

Most survivors of criminal satanic cults do not know how bad their families are. Many idealize them. "I had the best childhood." "My parents loved me." "Life was so peaceful." "My parents cared about me," they say. They recite from their programming to love their families, to idealize their perpetrators.

It is not that they are lying. Some have been trained from birth not to know what is going on, to be blind to reality, not to ever see the whole picture. There are the secret mind control and the innocuous everyday life. Never were the two meant to join hands and live in the light together. There is the family life according to the front person and what society is allowed to see, and life according to the insiders who experienced it.

If there are mind control and torture occurring in what might be called sub-life, this experience has to bleed into everyday life. Parents might have different alters to accomplish hidden cult tasks, but those deeds and feelings resonate in everyday life. The separation between the two lives is never 100%. In addition, some parents will have become "conscious", which means that they will have a partial memory of their secret cult life. They may know consciously how they have treated their children in programming sessions and rituals. Their emotions from one of their roles will leak through into their other roles.

Some relatives are allowed to show kindness, perhaps a grandparent, so that the leaders can threaten to kill that one person if you try to run away, and use that person as someone your inside parts report to about whether you are about to relocate or what you have disclosed to your therapist.

If you have not had adequate family relationships, to recover from this horrendous abuse is to know what your real family life was—perhaps is—like, both the hidden and known parts of it. It is a bit like being a citizen of a country, growing up to believe your country is righteous and fair and discovering later its terrible and criminal abuses of human rights. Organizations created to stop family abuses do not know what happens in these families. Even the victims do not consciously know what occurs in their unfortunate lives.

Incest

Memories of family involvement often start with incest memories. My memories began with bizarre physical abuse—my mother's peeing on me—followed quickly by sexual abuse memories. Incest exists in the normal world, whereas organized criminal abuse with drugs and electroshock usually does not. Incest in cult families can be extensive and involve many relatives. There is also enforced sexual abuse with the family pet. Cult leaders mandate sexual abuse of children for many reasons. They intend to destroy children's self-esteem so that they will start to think of themselves as non-human objects designed to do others' bidding. Incest inserts a rift in family relationships and creates intense jealousy between the incestuous abuser's spouse and the child victim and between siblings. The wronged spouse might take revenge on the child victim, sometimes killing that child or coming close. Incest occurs frequently in families of ordinary life and has similar consequences. But, in cult families, it also begins the preparations for using children as unpaid pornography and prostitution servants for the Mafia groups. Incest teaches these children that their only worth is their use as sex objects. For some satanic criminal cult survivors, there are probably porno flicks floating around the internet today. And snuff porno flicks in which someone is really or supposedly killed.

Children have reporters in them. Those are parts not known to the rest of the internal system. They report everything that happens to them. They can be called out or they can report spontaneously. Parents are told that if they do not sexually abuse their children, their children will be skinned and sacrificed. With the parent watching, the programmers question the children's reporter-parts to ascertain whether they were sexually abused. If the children say they have not been sexually abused, they may or may not be tortured and murdered. The whole thing might be a manipulative lie. But there's no guarantee. Leaders need robots who hate themselves. Parents sexually abuse their children in some cases to save those children's lives. While in a different personality, the same parents might sexually abuse to possess their children and manifest their own hatred.

Love in cult families

Wendy Hoffman

There can be love in these families—deep, genuine, protective love. Here is the love: Some cult parents who are prisoners fight as hard as they can to overcome their mind control, love and protect their children. They have a whole foundational level of destruction within themselves, and still they attempt to be good parents. Surely their children feel the vibrations of that love. Those children may be more loved than even normal children who grow up in ordinary normal families where the parents do not have to fight with everything in them to protect and honor their children. If you are a survivor, you might have had one or two such parents. Or you might be such a parent.

But not all parents are like that. Some, many, children are left with the hidden knowledge that their parents hate and resent them and wish them dead, while, in ordinary life, these same parents go through the motions of being good parents. Unconsciously, children seethe at the hypocrisy.

Love can grow in thick darkness. That love can have the deepest roots. It might not be noticeable, but it is there. It shows when parents mess up a little of their children's programming. When they drop hints about the truth of their lives in normal life. In some cult families, the supposed parent might not be biological. A parent can state in an offhand way who the biological parent is, or whether the child the adult is raising is a biological one.

Those parents might just be blabbermouths, or they might truly want their child to know the truth. They might want their children to know the truth to hurt them, or to help them know reality. For example, my legal father told me who my biological father was. I had thought my legal father was my biological father.

Perhaps the ultimate sign of love is when parents arrange for their children to escape from this criminal world and live far away with a safe family. Cult parents can be like the mother who stood before King Solomon and preferred her child not to be destroyed even if it meant giving up custody of that child. They resemble the parents who lived during the Holocaust and put their children on the transport trains to freedom, not knowing whether they would ever see or find them again and thinking they would not—all so that their children might be safe and live. That's love. Love flourishes in war. Trapped survivors of satanic cult abuse are constantly at war.

Amazingly, love in these cults can also look like leaving your child behind and escaping yourself. The model of escaping into freedom may give a more important message than remaining and suffering and being forced to abuse your children and other people's children. Even grandparents are forced to abuse. I began one of my memoirs with a scene about being forced to abuse my grandchildren.

Family-hunger, planted therapists, and romances

Wendy Hoffman

Some survivors who understand and acknowledge their prior family life, if that family life was horrendous, often remain family-hungry. When you do not have a family for support and love, you are essentially an orphan. Some cult victims are orphans but they do not realize it until they engage in recovery. Many dangers float around the state of being family-hungry. One of the most pernicious dangers of being in this state is the vulnerability to being dominated by cult-planted therapists and handlers. Survivors in general tend to become over-dependent on their therapists. No one else, usually, has heard their stories or understood them. With planted therapists, as with families, two simultaneous relationships exist. There is the everyday, normal life relationship where survivors' front people think the therapist is interested and helping them, and the secret relationship where the insider victims are being closed down, and memories erased from their minds. The hidden relationship is close to murder.

Say you have reported, without your front person's knowledge, to your handler that you are about to have, or are having, significant or break-through memories. From their perspective, you have to be stopped and they will erase your mind to accomplish this. You might get a phone call, probably in the middle of the night or early morning.

This caller will use code words to trigger obedient, robotic inside parts. The caller will call out your memorizers to record the information in your brain and do something like give that part of you a phone number and time to call one of their planted cult therapists, who might not be local. Your front person will know nothing of this conversation. You go to where the voice on the phone tells you to go—to the planted therapist's office.

There might be a hidden black electroshock chair and a team there to program you, depending on their resources and how much of a threat they consider you to be. Then you will be referred to a local planted therapist, medical, Christian, secular, new age, energy specialist—whoever is available and has time in their schedule. The planted therapists are usually paid well, in addition to what they charge you for being mind-controlled. You will end up in what you think is therapy with that person. From there you will have extensive torture sessions to close down any memories of your cult secret life and not to remember that this therapist is a double agent. All while your front person loves and is devoted to the therapist and does not have a clue what is really going on. Your front person will not know that he or she was programmed to love this therapist. But there is one clue. You feel, and possibly journal, chronic anger that never seems to quiet down or resolve. Why should it resolve? This team of double agents is in the process of taking your mind away yet again.

In addition to electroshock, other forms of torture, and drugs, double agents use hand signals, show playing and Tarot cards and other visual cues, and use other nonverbal means and code words to give you close down signals. To the programmed front person, they appear caring and devoted and to give the kind of devotion and acceptance that has not been in your life previously. To the inside parts being worked over, they are vicious and malevolent.

Cult adult survivors long for love, and they also live in normal society in which people get married and start new families. Most marriages are arranged. The two victims usually prefer this marriage to being tortured and murdered. Some marriages occur for social and political reasons and are supposed to look good to the outside world. Some marriages are for punishment, especially if one of the spouses is not obedient enough. Most survivors have handlers to watch them throughout their lives or until they become conscious or trusted. Before marriage, a family member is often the handler. Then the spouse is often the handler. A political leader might have a spouse who is that person's handler. With a spouse as a handler, there is little or no privacy. The handler-spouse does not have to be as bright or ambitious as the watched spouse. The handler-spouse simply needs to know all that goes on in that person's life and know the code words, signals, and triggers that control the victim. The front person of the watched spouse has no idea that the other spouse is a handler. Handler is a new term from military/political circles, and is not necessarily what these cults call this role. There are most likely other, newer terms. Some are made to marry pedophiles who are not cult members. Some cults may allow someone to marry outside their group but keep their affiliations with the group. Other survivors rebel and marry an outsider and get away with it. If a survivor is single, the cult may send a boyfriend or girlfriend—or even just a friend—to get close to the survivor and become the handler.

And so we may be left in a family-hungry state, craving family love, thinking we love our perpetrator families, being bonded to enemies, and hating ourselves and not knowing why our lives turned out so awful. This is all mind control.

Therapists' responses to survivors: countertransference and attunement

Alison Miller

I would like to separate out some particular kinds of responses which are common in therapists treating survivors of extreme and organized abuse. If you are a therapist, you may recognize some of these in yourself, and if you are a client, you may recognize them in your present or past therapist.

Part 1: Countertransference

The term "transference" refers to the way in which a client may project to a therapist things from a previous relationship, for example with a parent. Therapists are expected to recognize this, and gently help the client see what is going on without taking it personally.

A related term, "countertransference," has been used to mean many things, but its primary meaning has been a therapist's reaction to a client's transference. I am going to tell you a story regarding my experience with one client, whom I only saw once for an extended session. I do not know whether she had been victimized by an organized group; if she had, she was not aware of it. But the way she treated me illustrates a very strong negative transference, and my response shows my countertransference.

The abusive client

She called several times over a period of weeks. She was seeking a therapist for early childhood trauma. She was living on a disability pension because her trauma history made her unable to function. She now spent all day, every day, writing about her suffering. Each message said that she was "in a regressed state" when she called. She did not know whether or not to come and see me. We swapped messages for a while. She had a lot of questions for me about how I worked. I offered to see her for half price. One time she reached me, asked a couple of her questions, and made an appointment. Then she cancelled it, saying she had more questions. Eventually, I suggested she come in for a free meeting in which she could ask her questions face to face, and she agreed to do this, and showed up.

She said she'd been in therapy for thirteen years with various therapists. Some of them had triggered her into continuous flashbacks by going into the trauma prematurely. Others had given her advice she was unable to follow, which did not feel realistic for her, such as to go for a walk every day. One had "feelings" for her but kept on seeing her for years after acknowledging this. One of the therapists had worked with her inner child parts, but she had been upset that he talked with the parts and not with her, even though she was present for these conversations. Her most recent therapist had been a wonderful, gentle woman who had discontinued working with her because her neediness had triggered the therapist's own trauma.

As I listened to her talk about the previous therapists, I began to be seduced into seeing all the mistakes they had made, and believing I could, of course, do better than they had. I would be the savior that no one else had been. Though I would not make any of the mistakes they had made. Oh yes, all my years of experience had paid off and I would avoid all these traps.

She stated that she had a lot of trauma about being controlled and disempowered. And she had many young parts that she had to control. She had names for all her "thought patterns" but she did not know whether or not those were the parts. I suggested she think this question in her head, and see whether she would get an answer. She reacted immediately. I was telling her what to do. I said I did not intend that, just a mild suggestion of something she could try if she liked. "Now you're trying to make me feel guilty."

We returned to the parts. She said there was a critic who held imaginary conversations with other people. "You must be thinking I'm very difficult to work with." I asked why she said that. "Because I'm so complicated, because I've had so many bad experiences and I do not trust anybody." She said that besides the early abuse by her father, who lived with her and her mother until she was three, she had a whole childhood of emotional abuse by a controlling mother, who told her what she thought and felt and believed and would do with her life. She explained that her mother's constant control and criticism made her have a constant inner commentary about whomever she was talking with.

I asked what the commentary had said about me. "You were trying to control me when you told me to think a question in my head and listen for the answer." "Your tone of voice on the phone message when you said I should press '1' sounded very bossy." After she came up with each interpretation of my behavior, I would explain it, and she would seem to accept my explanation. We would talk a little more about her and her prior experiences (mostly of therapy). I saw a hurt childish expression on her face, followed immediately by a skeptical expression. "Do you have a protector part around?" "No, I was having thoughts about what you said." "What thoughts?" "I thought you were trying to make me feel guilty." It went on like this. I said "I saw a skeptical expression on your face again. What were you thinking?" "How do you know I was skeptical? Now you're telling me what I think."

I disclosed that I had had a very critical husband, who would tell me his interpretation of my motives and then refuse to hear my explanation. It was like throwing gasoline on the fire. Aha! I had disclosed an area of vulnerability. I could be hurt by people imputing nasty motives to me. I "hadn't worked through my stuff," as she put it. She was yearning for a therapist who had worked through their stuff so thoroughly that nothing she did could upset them. She was the client, they were the therapists. I suggested that statements about how she felt when I said or did any particular thing would be preferable to her telling me what she thought my motives were. No, she was a survivor of child abuse, so she was entitled to behave any way she liked, she could not help it, and any therapist worth their salt had to be strong enough not to be upset by it.

Time went by. I began to feel sucked into a vortex. An old, familiar feeling, which nothing but a divorce had been sufficient to get rid of. No, I wasn't just "getting triggered." It was being done to me. She wanted to take out on a therapist all the anger she had at her mother by treating someone the way her mother had treated her. And any therapist with a messiah complex (which most of us have a bit of) would be seduced into trying to master the situation, work through the transference and countertransference, and would eventually fail. I began to realize why there were so many notches on her gun.

. . . "Well," I finally said, "I do not see how we're going to be able to get through this. I do not have a solution. I cannot work with someone who keeps 'mind-reading,' making statements about my motives, telling me that I'm trying to control or manipulate or induce guilt. And you cannot just make statements about how you feel in relation to my behavior; you need to describe the bad motives you assume I have. I cannot imagine conducting therapy in which I am having to monitor every move and every facial expression so that it doesn't make you think I'm trying to do the things your mother did. Mind-reading is intrusive, and if you cannot or will not stop yourself doing it, I guess I cannot work with you. That's enough; I'm tired." I stood up. It had been two and a half hours, on a day that I'd been going to have off.

She sat there stunned for several minutes. This is not how it was supposed to go. I was supposed to face my challenges and try to work with her, see my own inadequacies and self-deceptions in the process, and let her continue to accuse me of all those things and try to provoke me into doing all those things, while I tried desperately to keep my cool. And instead I said that I would not work with her. She sat there for a while waiting for me to change my mind. I started to pack up. Finally, she said, "Can you suggest another therapist?" I thought about it. "No, I cannot," I said. "You need someone who's less sensitive." "You mean more sensitive," she said. "No, I mean less sensitive. Someone who won't get hurt when they're continuously accused of unkind motives . . . But the problem is, any therapists I know who are that insensitive are also egotistical and controlling, and you've said you do not like those things. So I really cannot think of someone to recommend." She did not know what to say. She left meekly, saying "Thank you for your time" as she went out the door.

I hoped she'd write about it for a good week or two, trying to figure out what happened. Maybe she would learn something. I did. I learned to recognize and refuse an invitation to be abused.

Maybe what this woman was doing was "projective identification"—trying to make me feel as bad as her mother had made her feel. Or maybe she was a victim of mind control who had programming to exhaust or burn out a therapist. Looking at her history of therapists, it could have been either. But I did not see a genuine desire to learn from another person, a recognition that I was trying to help her, or a desire for change.

We therapists have to be wary of being sucked into the invitation to be the great helper who can help when no one else can; in this example, I fell into that trap. We also have to notice our own feelings in response to the client in order to determine whether or not this can be an effective therapeutic relationship. In this case, my own feelings let me know that it would not work to see this client.

Transference and countertransference happen all the time, even within a good therapeutic relationship. During the year that Wendy lived in my city and we engaged in long therapy sessions three times a week, there were a few occasions when she became irrationally angry with me. On one occasion, I recognized that her irrational anger was related to some of her inside parts, but I assumed it was the group of parts we had just discovered. It was not. The big one came on a Friday. I commented on something in the news about Israel. Wendy became infuriated and accused me of being anti-Semitic. It was an absurd accusation, given our history together. I pointed that out, trying to show her the obvious, that if I had been anti-Semitic, we would not have been able to do the work we did together. But she persisted in attacking me about it. While I had no fear of her being physically violent with me, her fury aimed at me felt like a tear-gas assault. This could have alerted me to something very important, but I was too dense to catch on, because I was hurt by the unfair attack. My own past experiences with someone angry at me who became violent had made me very sensitive to blame, and I recoiled at the force of her anger and blame. I asked her to please not attack me in this way. Wendy cut the session short and went home angry. On the weekend, I called her to ask whether she was coming to our Monday session, and she snapped at me nastily, "Of course."

What survivors say to their therapists on the first level is often what they are programmed to say. Underneath that is the story of how they were programmed to say it. If we therapists can recognize when someone is speaking from a program, we can search for the training that made them say such things. In this case, I missed it because I was so offended by Wendy's accusations.

After I asked her to, Wendy held in her irrational anger at me, and stopped writing about it in the journal entries she sent me. What I did not know was that these attacks resulted from current abuse. Perpetrator group leaders (both Illuminati and Nazis) from the east had flown to town and abused her, including (of course) injecting her with what was probably an amphetamine to make her angry, assaulting her painfully, and telling her it was all my fault. Dissociated anger is already violent when it comes out, disconnected from the rational parts of the person; the drug added to that. They wanted her to pick a fight with me. Neither most of Wendy nor I was aware of the current abuse, and we often wondered together why she had not been pursued. The pursuers had accessed a very separate part of her personality system through well-hidden parts, who did not know me. The manufactured feelings against me from those parts, feelings that belonged to the perpetrators, were leaking through. But because, in my countertransference, I shut down her anger expression, we did not access the information about what was happening. Perhaps we would not have anyway, but we will never know. If we had found out about the current abuse, we would have known that the perpetrators were aware of when she had to leave Canada, and would have been suspicious of the American people who offered to help with that. It might have protected Wendy from a great deal more pain.

The therapist's own transference

All therapists are human beings, and our reactions to people are formed on the basis of other people we have known. Over the years, an experienced therapist learns to pay attention to any personal overreactions and deal with their sources, so that they do not contaminate the relationship with the client. In the story of the abusive client, I did notice a reaction of mine based on her similarity to someone who had judged and criticized me in the past. This in itself was not enough to make me conclude I would not be able to work with this person. The fact that I consciously recognized the similarity actually made me less vulnerable to a transference that would make me assume she was exactly like him when she was not.

But we therapists, like anyone else, are susceptible to projecting our own issues and past experiences on our clients. If you are a client and you find your therapist consistently reacting to you inappropriately, you need to pay attention to this. If you bring it to your therapist's attention, and he or she does not take responsibility for it, it is time to find a different therapist. You are not going to therapy in order to have to deal with the therapist's own issues. Some therapists are unhealed from their own pasts. And some are dangerous cult plants.

Part 2: Attunement

Falling in maternal love with a client

There is a phenomenon I have experienced personally, and which I have witnessed in several therapists over the years working with those severely abused as children. I think of it as "falling in maternal love" with our abused clients. Mothers fall in love with their newborn children. That love combines delight in the infant with an intense desire to protect that baby from all possible harm. An article by Chris Woolston, "The science behind love and mother–infant bonding" (https://consumer.healthday.com), explains how this kind of love is biologically hard-wired into us. The sight of our own infant, or the sense of its prenatal presence, stimulates a hormone, oxytocin, which gives us a feeling of intense love. We are fascinated by the baby, and at the same time fiercely protective of him or her. Even men experience this. And the baby falls in love with you, too. I remember how strongly this love hit me when I had each of my own children. It went far beyond anything I had experienced in romantic love.

Any multiple, especially a survivor of mind control and ritual abuse, is full of unloved infant parts, who long for the nurturance they never received when the body was an infant. Those parts do not really understand that they live in an adult body, and that no one can be with them twenty-four hours a day and protect them from all harm.

When I met my first survivors of ritual abuse and mind control, about whom I wrote in the first chapter of Healing the Unimaginable, I was both shocked and fascinated. And I fell in love, maternal love. They were little children within adult bodies, little kids who had gone through experiences far beyond my imagining and beyond anything I had read about or seen on television. They were, in their thinking and behavior, clearly still young children, stopped in their growth by those experiences while the body continued to mature. Two other members of my team at the Mental Health Center also had their first multiple clients, not ritual abuse survivors, but still survivors of extreme abuse, with tortured child parts inside, and they, too, fell in maternal love with their clients. I think it is a biological, hormonal response to the helpless infant in need of protection.

Those were the days of unorthodox family therapy interventions, where it was acceptable to see clients outside the office, and I visited my clients' apartments and took them on outings that their child insiders would enjoy. Somehow, I just wanted to make it up to them for everything they had gone through.

Of course, I was unable to keep up this intensity of relationship. I had to stop the outings when I discovered that my impersonator within the cult was taking advantage of it to take them out to bad places, pretending to be me. I learned of the safety provided by the structured office setting (with a good alarm system). One of my clients kept getting me mixed up with his mother, as a result of cult interventions involving the mother and my impersonator. The feeling of being "in maternal love" with my clients with little children inside gradually wore off, and was replaced by weariness and anxiety. I began to realize quite quickly that even though I felt this love for my clients, I could not keep them safe from harm and I could not give them the attention and caring that they had never received in childhood.

As I moved into private practice, the word went around town that I worked with multiples, and other therapists quickly offloaded such clients onto me. Several of the next survivors I saw came from therapists who had dumped them after becoming overinvolved. One pastor therapist was told by his wife that he could not keep spending all those extra hours with this other woman (who was frequently a little girl). There was no sexual involvement; it was maternal, or perhaps paternal, love. Another therapist mistook his feelings for his attractive client for romantic love, and assumed she felt the same way when her young child alters wanted to be close to him and feel the love they had never experienced. His abandonment of her was deeply traumatizing, and her eventual realization of what he believed was going on just as traumatic. One woman therapist was overwhelmed by dozens of daily emails from her client (resulting from programming to "burn out the therapist"), and eventually dumped the client after a serious suicide attempt ten years into therapy. Each of these therapists made promises to a client that he, and she, could not possibly keep. Then the client was brutally let down. Each of these clients made good progress when my love for them and contact with them were held within safe and consistent boundaries.

My friend who directs a counselling center for refugees tells me that her supervisees frequently become overinvolved with their clients out of this maternal love, the desire to help the wounded and protect them from further harm.

I have seen this maternal love in several therapists to whom I have provided online consultations. They become totally overinvolved with their first multiple client. They try to protect that client from all harm, something that no therapist can do. Their maternal protection takes the place of the adult self-protection that the client needs to develop. It cannot be sustained. We cannot be our clients' mothers. They have to find parts inside who can mother the younger ones. If they do not have a real mother, they have to accept that reality and grieve that loss rather than looking for a replacement. Therapists, watch that you do not respond to your clients' needy and abandoned infant parts by extending yourself further than you can manage or is good for the clients. If you do this, you will end up abandoning them.

When we work with adult or adolescent survivors of child abuse and neglect, we have to help them develop their own inner resources, rather than letting our maternal love lead us to become their leaning posts and to promise them the mothering they never received.

The attuned therapist

The attuned therapist feels his or her client's feelings, without being overwhelmed by them. It is much like what happens in a healthy relationship between mother and child, an attunement that allows the child to be understood and to grow up gradually. Siegel, in The Developing Mind, 2012, p. 69) says:

> For "full" emotional communication, one person needs to allow his state of mind to be influenced by that of the other . . . the therapist's sensitivity to the patient's array of signals allows his own state to become aligned with that of the patient . . . The alignment of the therapist's state allows him to have an experience as close as possible to what the patient's subjective world is like at that moment . . . Such an alignment permits a nonverbal form of communication to the patient that she is being "understood" in the deepest sense.

I can often tell what a client is going through by tuning in to what my own body is feeling. I imagine myself holding the client's feelings within my chest, close to my heart, with a thin but strong barrier between her feelings and my own, so I can tell which is which. This attunement is crucial for a good therapeutic connection. Wendy told me that I was particularly attuned to her very young infant parts; she described it as "the therapist's heart coating the heart of the newborn infant."

Siegel says that the need for nonverbal attunement persists throughout life, and is essential to intimate relationships. He states,

> Even at a physical distance, one mind can directly influence the activity—and development—of another through the transfer of energy and information. This joining process occurs via both verbal and nonverbal behavioral responses, which function as signals sent from one mind to another. (2012, p. 277)

I think that possibly "psychic" awareness of other people's emotional states may be a part of this. When a mother is aware of her connection to her unborn child, it is not through verbal, visible, or audible signals. In my childhood and teens, I experimented with telepathy with my siblings and friends. I discovered that my ability to sense what someone was thinking was most accurate when we communicated mentally about something with emotional content, like choosing one of the people we knew who had been at a particular event, rather than letters or numbers or symbols.

As we therapists work with clients who quite frequently have been trained in what are considered paranormal or spiritual abilities, or who have resorted to using such abilities for self-protection, we need to develop an understanding of such abilities. I updated myself on the research about parapsychology (Carter, 2012) and discovered that such natural (though poorly understood) abilities are widespread among humans and also animals, but are generally quite weak and not necessarily very accurate.

One of my dissociative clients had a five-year-old part who had developed her ability to do something she called "seeing the colors." She would stare at the area around my head for a long time. She eventually explained that she saw colors there that showed whether a person was good or bad, and until me she had never been close to anyone who was not bad. I presume she was looking at what some people call the aura. This little inside girl took it upon herself to train me in becoming aware of what the parts in her system were remembering or thinking, because they were unable to talk about it. She actually expected me to read their minds. She wanted me to sit quietly with whatever part came out, tune in to whatever was going on in her head, then put forward a tentative hypothesis based on my own sense of what parts were around and what they might be remembering. Having been trained not to do suggestive therapy, I was reluctant, but this seemed to be the only way to work with this client, at least in the early stages of therapy; otherwise we could spend over an hour in complete silence. If nothing came to me, she would encourage me to "reach in." Sometimes I would get a picture in my head, sometimes emotions. I discovered that these very young parts would correct me if my perception was not quite right, although they did not understand that I was not actually in their head, and did not get why I could not just walk in and rescue trapped internal children. Now they are able to tell me things without my having to guess, but their training paid off in my ability to sense what is going on in a client. I have had numerous experiences of sensing what is in a client's mind. I can sense whether other alters are listening, what emotions they have, whether they have questions or are making internal comments, and what they need from me. I not only feel my clients' feelings, but I sometimes see what they are seeing internally, or become aware of an answer (e.g., a name) which they are not telling me. I dreamed Wendy's internal structure in which her hidden parts used to live shortly after I began working with her, when she did not know the structure. It was such a vivid and bizarre dream that I knew it did not belong to my own life. If I have a significant dream relating to my life, I usually know what it is about. I told Wendy my dream in case it had significance for her, and she gasped and told me what it was about.

If we therapists can make use of such abilities, it can help in our work, but we have to be aware of how easy it is to be misled by a felt sense of something that might be inaccurate or a projection of our own. Attunement can actually help us get a sense of what is in a client's head.

Survivors and therapists, if you have ability or training in these abilities, do not dismiss them as "satanic," but also do not rely on them as if they are unfailingly accurate, because they are not. Instead, use them to form tentative hypotheses about what might be going on in others, then use regular methods to discern whether these are accurate.

SECTION IV

THE HORRORS OF THE ABUSE

Therapists and horror*

Alison Miller

In 1990, I plunged with fascination into work with my first clients who exhibited dissociative disorders, feeling that at last I was doing "real psychology." Perhaps because I worked with children and adolescents as well as adults, it was relatively easy for me to catch on to the personality switches, and adapt my conversational style and therapy technique to the age of the part of the person who was presenting at the time. What I was not prepared for was the horror of what these people had experienced, and which some of them were still experiencing, as the abuser group that considered them its property was still active. At the time, I wrote in my personal journal,

> I have a reservoir of pain—a head full of horrors—from my clients. I have gone through incredible suffering with people. I have not only listened to them tell about past traumatic events, I have watched them abreact them and used my intuitive awareness of their feelings as a guide to what they are going through. I have watched adults experiencing themselves as infants being choked, electroshocked, subjected to terrible pain, having sharp things poked in them, being smothered > with pillows, having baby bottles and penises rammed down their throats, drowning in semen, drowning in pools and swamps, being beaten up with limbs broken, being tortured with unbearable pain such as nerve gas, and being raped in every way imaginable. I have been their link to safe present reality as they relive these experiences. I have also had to tune into their terror as they watch other people being tortured and killed in slow, agonizing ways, and are told that if they talk about it or are "traitors" this will happen to them. I have also had to deal with clients' memories of such things that have just happened, within a day or two of when we abreact them. I have had to cope with knowing people are not safe in their apartments or on the street, because evildoers can and do abduct them against their will and do these things to them. I have had to cope with not only death threats to my clients, me, and our families, but also with detailed and explicit descriptions of how those murders will be carried out.

I listed many more abuses than the ones I have reported here. I remember the sense of isolation and the feeling of being overwhelmed. I also remember, however, the satisfaction of giving these survivors their first real connection with a safe, caring person who was not part of the world of torturers. Even when some of them were punished with rape and torture for disclosures to me, they kept coming back. And I began to see improvement in many of them.

The sense of overwhelm and being plunged into horror wears off somehow. You get used to it. I do not know whether I dissociate those emotions, or if I just have accepted that these unimaginable things happen, so I need to pull up my socks and get to work on dealing with them, as you would in rebuilding after an earthquake. I know that I can now hear such things without flinching, which is important as survivors test you out to see what you can stand. One survivor described his therapist to me as "too squishy"—meaning too easily affected by what he might want to disclose. With time, you become less squishy.

Someone needs to work with these clients, not just out of compassion but because it is through them that the truth becomes known and the abuse stopped. My books are full of survivors' own stories, as is my client Wendy Hoffman's memoirs, The Enslaved Queen (2014) and White Witch in a Black Robe (2016a). The power to tell one's own story is the power to regain one's life. You can help give this power back to the most abused of humanity. Your biggest asset in this work is not your knowledge; it is your ability to form a solid therapeutic relationship (empathy, warmth, and genuineness). You learn from experience. However, it saves a great deal of time if you have already learned about these abuses and structured personality systems, so that your client does not have to teach you everything.

I recently moved to a very friendly neighborhood of retired people, and when my neighbors held a welcome party for me I managed to tell them that I worked with survivors of the most severe child abuse, and consulted to other therapists doing this work. Someone said something like, "Isn't that upsetting to you?" I lamely said, "Someone has to do it," and another person changed the subject. The question seemed to be "Why would anyone do work that exposes them to horror and pain?" Well, one reason could be that it could have been you who had these experiences, but it was not, and that is not because you are any better than those who went through such things.

On a single day, I consulted to two therapists. The first, a Christian, had been listening to a fourteen-year-old part of her ritually abused client talking about a very traumatic experience. Overwhelmed by the horror and sadness of the client, the therapist suggested a guardian angel might be there for the fourteen-year-old. The client's response was "There were no angels, ever, not at birth, not in this situation." The therapist proceeded to suggest that maybe someday they could let angels be there. The result was that another part came out and did an incantation. The therapist compounded the problem by asking whether this was to send away anything good, and was surprised when the client's protector part became understandably angry. The client sent an email saying just "I HATE ME."

What was this therapist doing? I think she was defending herself against the terrifying challenge to her worldview. The reality that the client had felt completely abandoned by all forces of good was frightening to her. No wonder. I pointed out that she was invalidating the client's feelings and experience, and, furthermore, she was feeding in to the client's perpetrator-induced belief that she as a child was so evil that God would not help her, and her own incantation had the power to drive away God or angels. This well-meaning therapist had taken on this survivor with complete faith in her interventionist God's ability and desire to relieve the client's pain, and now her faith was shaken.

The second therapist, a Jungian, was older and much more experienced than the first. But she constantly went into despair about her ritually abused client, whose functioning had deteriorated, probably as a result of re-traumatization by the local cult group. She admitted to me that she dreaded seeing the client, though when with her she felt a very deep compassion. She was aware that the despair she was experiencing was also how her client felt, and she was also aware that her worldview had changed as a result of working with this client. She did not want to take on another such client, and given her age, it would have been unwise in any case. When I suggested to her that her recoil reaction might be a reaction to evil rather than to the client herself, this made sense to her. She would have liked me to produce some wonderful thing to help her have hope for her client, but the only thing I could say was that often a survivor's apparent getting worse was just a result of the cult-loyal parts of the client doing their jobs, and I did not believe that all her steadfast caring had gone to waste.

It is inevitable that clients who have experienced ritual abuse or mind control will challenge the worldview of any therapist or other helper. We all have to come to grips with "Where was God?" "How can human beings engage in such deliberate evil?" and "What kind of a world is this?" And there are no easy answers. Yet, we cannot turn our backs on those who have experienced these evils. That is what most of Europe did during the Nazi occupation, and the result was the Holocaust. We have to grapple with the unanswerable questions and make sense of them. We have to avoid giving easy answers to our clients, and constantly check ourselves to see whether our fear is being communicated to our clients, who are exquisitely sensitive to people's inability to hear their real experiences. It is our loving presence, not our glib explanations, that will let them know that there is love in the world, and that some people choose good, and do not turn their backs on those harmed by evil.

Therapists, you will be unable to hide your feelings from your clients, but it is important that you process them in private, even if it leads to significant changes in your view of the world. You can tell your survivor clients that it is not them you are reacting to, it is the evil of what was done to them. Some will not be appeased by your saying this.

Survivors, if you see shock and horror in your therapist when you first talk about some of your experiences, this does not necessarily mean that your therapist will not be able to handle what you must deal with. It does mean that he or she is having to come to grips with some realities you have known about for a long time. It does not mean your therapist hates you, just because he or she hates what you have gone through. Try to be generous and patient with your naïve therapist.

The purpose of infant torture

Wendy Hoffman

Infant torture has not received sufficient attention. Not enough victims remember it, or people think it is too gruesome to deal with. Some of the early exposés of mind control and the creation of programmed slaves, such as the film The Manchurian Candidate, avoid infancy completely. Manchurian Candidate is a quasi-fictionalized version of mind control, but this omission is still important.

Perpetrators have to get their hands on infants. For the more strenuous assigned roles, they start in the womb. The programmed newborn is essential for the continuation of these criminal groups. First of all, the child has to be born unbonded, and to remain so. (See "Why and how they prevent bonding" (pp. 75–88.) Then, once a child is born, very serious training starts full blast without interruption. Perpetrators, usually family members whose job in ordinary life would be to love, believe they have to give the unambiguous message to newborns that they are toys, objects, possessions, if these criminal cults are to continue to exist. They set out to overwhelm unattached newborns and do it through torture. They erase any remnant of a soul that may have lingered. As long as they can keep these poor beings away from any source of love, they have a good chance of succeeding. Apparently, you need someone giving and not just taking to let a sense of self flourish. The sense of self is even more delicate and fragile than orchids or creativity. But the human soul is resilient.

How do you torture a newborn? you may ask. Even newborns in ordinary life are tortured. They often die as a result. Torture for criminal cult newborns, however, is more regulated and not a passion crime. There might be some out-of-control torture in these hidden cults but that style of torture is an aberration and not endorsed. It can happen, though, because some programmers are driven insane. But how do these criminal organizations torture their future leaders as newborns? The same way they torture children, older children, teenagers, and adults. The only difference is that newborns cannot yet be seated in electroshock chairs.

As a newborn, you would be placed in a carrier, set perhaps on a dining room or kitchen table. There may be a support under your flimsy neck. You have not been fed or given a drink for many hours, a lifetime for an infant. The underlying landscape of cult victims is hunger and dehydration—both essential for creating a mind-controlled slave. You spend much of your infant time sucking on air. You are longing to be touched and held and someone might start massaging, say, your feet. Soon this same person inserts needles between your tiny toes. You are introduced to the combination of pleasure and pain and pleasure followed swiftly by pain, which will become a life theme. This programmer is not the only person present. Other adults surround the two of you. The programmer is often a relative in ordinary life or family friend, rarely a stranger. In rural districts, a stranger might stop by periodically to supervise. Needles go into other parts of your trembling body. If you begin to cry, a pillow goes over your face to almost suffocate you. You are not allowed to release feelings, which crying can accomplish. It is difficult to believe, but the programmer places a metal head vise around your malleable skull. It feels sharp, digs in, cuts. The programmer tightens and releases, tightens and releases the vise as he moves his giant lips and says words. You do not understand the words, of course, but some part of your brain memorizes them. Later, when you have achieved formal language, that part will translate from sound to words what was said to you. It is usually something like this: “You are our possession. We own you. You will do whatever we say. You are not free. You will never be free. You belong to us.” This message in words is one aspect of programming.

Programmers also use hand signals. The infant cannot understand them but some part inside will memorize the movements and translate them later in life. They are being sensitized to watching hands for messages. Colors, tarot and playing cards, pictures of containers that split off parts will be placed in later are also present.

My programmer also strangled and shook me as a newborn and must have done something like break or dislodge my neck. He molded it back together since his goal was not to murder me.

Programmers also shoot tasers along the sides of the infant's body. Some of the electricity may make infants who had been programmed in the womb remember its former use. They are stunned by the tasers. In addition, programmers spin the newborns on a plank with a neck support. The consequential dizziness also overwhelms the poor human being and makes him or her lose any grip on life or reality and certainly any belief in the self's ability.

The stretching begins now to render the newborn a satisfactory sexual slave. Fingers go into the mouth, rectum, and, for females, vagina. The stretching that renders infants rapeable creatures in programmers' opinion has begun. Even chronically raped people can have touch deprivation.

A good example of how programmers overwhelm these unformed, unloved beings is their trainings to pee on command. When I told Alison, my enlightened therapist, that cult children have to control their pee before the age of six months, she did not believe it was possible. But Alice Miller (1983, 1997, p. 88) writes about German mothers with a compulsion for cleanliness teaching their newborns not to wet or dirty their diapers by the age of six months.

If a cult baby wets, the programmer slaps and beats the infant, punching it in the stomach. This happens over and over again. The sharp infant figures it out after months of being hurt. The duller ones just get hit continuously. Either way the programmer wins. This is another example of the infant's being overwhelmed and taught that it has no power, no rights, no entitlement, no human dignity that would be a natural response to early life. It is helpful if survivors find these infant parts who were prematurely toilet trained, to reduce their despair.

Newborns might or might not have a concept of death. If they do, they would want to die. At least they want to go away. This underlying coating of not wanting to be alive or to be here stays with them on some level throughout life, perhaps until they are fully healed.

From pre-birth to birth to after birth, this is the message, this is the rule. The torture and lack of caring produce the kind of pain that eats away bones. These infant feelings form an unrelenting sack placed under the solar plexus that can follow the survivor throughout life, unless they locate these parts, rescue, and heal them.

In Illuminati programming, the thirteen splits formed are accomplished by the victims' sixth month of life. They are separated and placed in containers. For me, it was a coffin. The containers are sealed and placed below the structure that has yet to be built internally, starting at three years old. These containers below the structure will feed the subsequent structures with feelings of hopelessness and despair. If survivors are ever unfortunate enough to be under the influence of close-down specialists who want to reignite programming and keep them slaves, those close-down specialists will make their way to this structure and try to make sure the designated newborns and infants stay in their sealed containers.

During all this early torture, it is most likely that there will be some natural splits. Even without the torture, the heartbreak, sadness, fear, anger, and loneliness the infants experience are enough to cause a shredding of the personality system.

As the months go on, programmers will do all they can to cement these splits. They will color-code them and assign them visual cues and hand signals. They have the foundation of a highly programmable slave.

The hunger, dehydration, and torture destroy the will. But, apparently, it has not been completely destroyed, because so many victims are becoming free, telling their stories, and emerging as true survivors. They are overcoming their infancy.

More good news is that there are cracks. Sometimes programmers deliberately and secretly leave in cracks. Other times the cracks come from programmer incompetence. The times are ripe for those cracks to open wide. I hope all the people who died slaves can hear. We are making our way toward freedom.

Spinning

Wendy Hoffman

Years after a cult "therapist" was hired to close down my recovery process, years after I had been living like an empty shell, a mindless robot, the memories began to fight their way to the surface. As they tried to creep out, episodes of dizziness assaulted me. I would hold onto my bed and try to steady myself. I had to wait a long time until the feeling that I was being spun round and round subsided before I could start my day or even get out of bed. I clung to the mattress. The feeling became more intense as the weeks went by. I went to my doctor, who referred me to a neurologist, who ordered thousands of dollars' worth of MRIs and MRAs. They revealed nothing to account for the feeling of intense spinning. I did not even know that I could call it a feeling of intense spinning. I thought it was merely dizziness without a known cause.

After every programming session, the programmers spin most infant, child, adolescent, or adult victims in electroshock chairs, in rotatable floor chairs, or on spinning boards. They have spinning boards for infants. The spinning is meant to be a barricade to keep you from knowing what happened to you. Programmers feel that their victims will not be able to quiet the spinning and thereby reach the harrowing memory.

I did not need a neurological workup. I needed to quiet the spinning so that I could discern the programming to feel spinning and also what lay underneath it.

The most effective way to stop the feeling of spinning and the memory of having been spun is to find the part whose job is to release these sensations should the memory become close to consciousness. This is not the part that holds the sensations and memories but, rather, the part that floods the victim when the victim comes too close to knowledge. The part who allows the dizziness to overtake the victim is not dizzy but has the control to get other parts to release dizziness. That part is like a conductor of an orchestra. He calls out the musicians who play instruments but does not play an instrument him or herself. Reassure, reason with, and educate that part. This feeling comes from an event in the past (unless the event just happened). The extreme dizziness in the present results from this part doing his or her job to cover over the memory and block it with this distraction. Talk to this part about the benefits of healing and freedom.

The spinning also spreads the feeling or message of the memory to which it is attached throughout the system. One part may hold the feeling of the spinning while another distributes it throughout the system, or one part may hold both jobs. When you find the parts who spin in order to distribute, you can substitute pleasant, warm, or courageous feelings for the destructive ones which are being spun.

In the meantime, if you are experiencing the spinning sensation, stand up straight, do not slump, focus outward, do not look down. Fight to hold onto the center of your body from the brain to your groin. Dig your feet into the ground. Drink a glass of water for grounding. The spinning episode is over. Fight for control. Focus on a large object in the room. Try to make it stand still. Focus on a medium sized one. Make it stop moving in your mind. Then a small one, then many small ones.

Try to walk to the bathroom. Count your steps. Stay away from the staircase. Eventually, the dizziness should stop. It pays to master the spinning because it could stop your process cold if you do not.

Give yourself permission to go beneath the spinning to the covered-over traumatic memory of being programmed.

This breakthrough can lead to an unravelling of memories that can set you on a path of listening to all your parts and coming to a most worthwhile freedom. It is one of the early steps to be mastered as fast as possible.

Sexual horrors

Wendy Hoffman

Survivors of mind control and ritual abuse usually become either promiscuous or averse to sexual expression and touch. They have suffered horrendous sexual abuse, more harrowing than most people would imagine. Their responses are inevitable. Anyone would react as they do.

Those pioneer therapists who treat survivors often try to help them bring back their sexuality in the hope that they will have a full life. Books have been written about reclaiming sexuality. Some of the earlier books address incest survivors. Incest is sufficient for ruining a life. Mind control victims also endure incest. Mind control victims grow up largely in electroshock chairs. Some are taken around the world to be programmed and tortured. Their minds are considered disposable software, their bodies toys for others' use. Perpetrators view them as servants or slaves with no inherent worth.

If you are a victim, keep in mind that you probably do not know the depths of your abuse, because you have been programmed to know nothing. If you are a therapist treating survivors, be aware that you do not know what your clients have been through. You may have a vague outline, but you will not know the chronic devastation and inconceivable abuses. The worst part of the sexual torture and training is well hidden in victims' internal systems and may be among the last portions of their history to emerge into consciousness. So, while the victim and his or her therapist(s) may strive to transform the victim into a normal functioning person or a focused sexual being limited to one partner, it might be useless because neither the victim nor the therapist knows what they are dealing with.

Sexual trainings take place in electroshock chairs. There, small—smaller than you can believe—children are masturbated. When their stirrings are achieved, programmers electroshock them—on their sexual parts. This is done for both boys and girls. Experts introduce children to premature sexual feelings, which are immediately coupled with physical pain. Children are sexually stimulated while viewing violent films or watching others tortured, to pair their sexual responses with violence. They are sexually stimulated while being placed next to dead bodies. They are forced to engage in sex with animals. They are forced to sexually abuse animals and other children, and may be sexually pleasured while they do it, to turn them into perpetrators. And, of course, they are forced to pleasure their handlers in whatever way those handlers want.

The combination of humiliation, violence, and physical pain creates confusion, then horror. Most children become divorced from their bodies. It will be a long, slow, circuitous route back. Take your time. Therapists—you cannot know. And if you are a bystander, support person, or witness, do not gawk.

Other child victims whom the leaders of these cults consider property are also used to stimulate the child victim in the chair. This is only one way perpetrators turn children against one another. At the end of these continuous sessions, the victims have lost their identities and function as created prostitutes, spies, tempters and temptresses, thieves, murderers, pornography players, and breeders.

What I am describing is official programming. The leaders never let programming go to waste. Cues such as the three of clubs and the queen of clubs are shown to the victims as they are tortured sexually. Victims then associate that card with the sexual torture and the behaviors they have to perform. In addition, as a small child is being prepared for a life of sexual slavery, the programmer will snap his fingers and point to a person in the room. Eventually the child learns to direct his or her sexual stirrings to that target pointed at.

Programming is un-American in that nothing goes to waste. The association of visual cues such as cards with the significance and memory of the programming mean that programmers and handlers can access and put into effect the programming at any moment of the victim's life. These sexual programs are sometimes turned on accidentally. Victims then have to deal with embarrassment and another kind of humiliation as well.

Some groups also make children copulate with animals. All groups favor penetration at an age considered too young by modern-world standards. Groups bring in mentally deficient males to rape ten- and eleven-year olds brutally and continuously. They drug these males so that they can hold erections. No one listens to these men when they do not want to hurt others and when they resist.

Victims sometimes do not understand why they have an aversion or addiction to touch and sex. Understanding some of the standardized training may help victims explain themselves to themselves and be more self-forgiving. A first step is always to bring abuses to light.

Survivors, though many do not realize it, live in stunned skin.

They have survived many invisible deaths.

To try to heal from the impossible, touch any innocuous place on your body. Notice whether the rest of you hops away. Do that until you can stay within yourself on that spot that you touched. Go on to other discrete spots.

Touch again. Do you associate touch with physical pain? Does some part of you shake as if in the after-vibrations of electroshock? Do you visualize many perpetrators? Gang rapes are common during and after programming sessions.

Do you associate touch with death? Orgies begin after the sacrifice(s) during rituals. Eventually survivors' crying in the present will most likely stop on its own, though it may take many years. Many survivors cry after orgasms in the present. That, too, might eventually cease.

This is the deep recovery work of a lifetime. You can decide whether to master it or not. It is your decision and no one else's. If you are in your twenties, thirties, or forties, your hormones may decide for you.

People can live without a sexual life. Or people can live with one. Sometimes things are ruined for good, and sometimes they are not.

The most important issue is to come back to your body gradually. Living within yourself is what is most important—living attached to yourself, owning yourself, belonging to yourself and having an aware mind. An aware mind is a solid single piece, and no longer fractioned.

Should you have a sexual body memory, pursue it, follow it to its end. Knowing what happened to you, what you endured, has to fill you with the self-esteem that has been stolen. You may come to love and cherish, honor and obey your own self.

Anger displacement training

Wendy Hoffman

Children's intense feelings are the seeds programmers work with. They take these emotions and direct them where it will profit the criminal group.

Programmers manipulate anger in children, starting almost at birth. They deliberately frustrate and enrage infants by taking away love, bottles, soft objects to cuddle. By the time their victims are toddlers, they are training them to kill. Given that they are creating an army of killers, they have to be able to control their victims' anger and direct it to their own enemies. Since they are the child's real enemies, it would be dangerous for them to leave anger intact and aimed at them. Depending on how fast the child develops, programmers wait until the children are about four to six years old to start teaching them not to be angry at their perpetrators but to direct that anger instead to this group's enemies. Their enemies include anyone who tries to help the child victims escape.

Here are some of the methods my family perpetrators used on me. Starting in 1948, when I was five, the programmers placed two archery targets with bulls-eyes on stands near the far wall in the basement. I had already achieved a good aim. The controllers taunted me and encouraged me to direct the frustration and anger I felt at my parents and sister onto those targets. Max, my main master-mind-programmer, instructed me to pull my anger from one target to the other one, while his younger brother, Abe, held a gun to my left temple and said, “Get it off that target and onto the other target or I’ll pull this trigger.” I had already endured “gun programming,” which instructs complete obedience when a gun is held to you. When I was five to ten years old, I had to perform this transference of anger 100 times per session and when I was a teenager, 150 times per session. They strove for a spontaneous reflex I would perform without thinking. When I was a young teenager, the controllers laced three babies into seats and told me the babies would be killed if I did not transfer my anger correctly. I thought they were live babies, though possibly drugged. In addition, they gave me stimulant drugs that kept me in a riled-up mood but cooperative, the way the military drug soldiers in the known world.

Max and Abe knew I had transferred the anger when my eyes moved and I created another internal split. Particularly astute programmers can see when splits are created. As the training proceeded, I was forced to project my anger away from its original source and onto ten targets. Whatever I originally and rightly felt anger toward moved far away from my awareness. Anger became like boiling black smoke, beyond rage, not even human, demonic.

They wrapped my whole body in thick flesh-colored rubber like a space suit with a big opening around my back. My face and any bodily features did not show. I could feel the gun in my back and the taser blasts.

They had me walk to the first target and then suddenly pivot to the second or wherever they pointed. They shot at the spot I had just left, so that gun smoke always followed at my heels. They kept training me until my mind deflected automatically like a reflex. This became part of my training for killing politicians. All the internal kids had deflect-anger core training. The anger was held by a thousand child soldiers within me. Back at home, my grandmother shaved my scalp and told me that I had no identity.

With this training, they thought they could get me to do anything, and I could feel my brainwaves not holding a center and going every which way. The programmers told these parts whom to kill or blackmail or hurt. They had me not only walk, but crawl, walk backward, jump on both feet, walk on my toes, on my heels, hop, walk on my hands while they held my legs, roll on the floor, do leapfrog jumps, and do cartwheels, which I cannot do. They kept repeating the patterns with different movements to reinforce them.

Programmers put me in a coffin. Abe and Max pretended to put the coffin in my body, right where the spine ends, at my atlas. They pressed into my body at that location. They also banged my head to cause a concussion. Concussions make people passive and compliant and unable to think clearly. When I blacked out, the neighborhood cult-owned doctor would inject me and give me smelling salts to pull me out of it.

The men all pointed guns at me. I still wore that rubber suit when Uncle Abe said, “The old Wendy is dead; you are now a soldier, and all the soldiers stay in this coffin unless they’re called out.” He produced a sound pattern of knocks that the soldiers had to listen for. When the soldiers are out, everybody else has to go in the coffin. The coffins came in different sizes, always a tight fit. They also taught me visual symbols to provoke the transference of anger. Eventually, my mind could no longer hold the awareness of who had really caused the anger.

My family watched Apache dances, popular for decades starting in the 1930s, on the television in the living room. That was the trigger in ordinary life, but downstairs, starting when I was about five years old, in the lowest basement level with Max, and two uncles-in-law, I watched these dances while they kicked and masturbated me and gave these parts of me names.

Max told me that I was the woman in the dance and to put my anger in an empty can of Heinz vegetarian baked beans that he placed on the ground. (Mother served those beans a lot because we were not allowed to eat meat.)

I watched the show while they kicked me and tried to direct my anger to the can. Downstairs, they did not show the part of the dance where the woman abuses the man, but I saw that section upstairs in the living room. An uncle directed my anger to the can, then to large white dolls made of heavy white cloth and told me to be angry at this person and that person. The dolls were male and female with penises and pubic hair but no other features.

When they electroshocked me in the upstairs room with the black electroshock chair, I saw that they had placed the can in this room.

"You never saw this," my mind controller instructed. One of the uncles opened the window and my body became cold. "A layer of cold to seal in your memory."

At the end of this sequence, the uncle who kicked the hardest put me in a white laundry basket, covered me with a pink sheet and wheeled me home. He lifted me out and dumped me on the foyer floor of the apartment. Mother said, "You cannot leave her there." He dumped me on my bed. I would notice that laundry basket in the building's laundry room but would not have memories of the anger training. However, something in me resonated.

When I was an adult, my new programmers went back to this training, using similar methods. They pulled my hair and threw me around, as in Apache dances.

There has been significant discussion in recent decades about the innate differences and similarities between males and females. Displaced anger training gives glimpses of some differences. Starting at four or five years old, most male children took to anger more readily than the females. Girls took more readily to grief. Perpetrators use drugs to instill and enhance the feeling of anger. Some of the girls were overdosed because they did not get angry enough, and the controllers kept upping the drugs, always used in anger training (and probably military training).

How to make an assassin

Wendy Hoffman

One of the most dangerous and soul-wrenching mind control assignments is to be forced to become a murderer.

Little girls, and sometimes little boys, are trained to seduce, perform lap dances, drop pills in victims' drinks, and escape as their victims become drowsy, sick, or die, and to pull the trigger of guns. The same brain part does not perform the whole of this criminal act. A sequence of seven to ten parts, sometimes as many as fifteen, which are isolated from the rest of the brain, runs through these paces. During the childhood trainings, which start when the victim is a toddler, drugs and torture are used as well as a metronome to hypnotize and a stick pounding to accelerate the switches from one brain part to another. The switches have to be instantaneous and invisible. The programmers then seal or close the training. They use words, hand and foot signals, icons, or sounds to open the program on demand.

For assassination training with guns, the leaders train agile children to have excellent aim, first at archery ranges, then at shooting ranges. For their big job, they are trained to arrive at a destination, switch into another part, position themselves, switch, do a preparatory aim with their weapon, switch, watch for the signal from their handlers, switch, practice aim and reposition again, switch, obey their handlers' signal, switch, shoot, and finally switch into a part who knows nothing about what just happened. Assassins can also have their switches choreographed to songs in the assassin's head so that they do not need an external handler continually present when on a mission. The series of songs in the head (following a particular music album) may be externally triggered but then continue in a prescribed pattern internally. This programming can be disabled by an external person like a therapist speaking the lengths of songs on the album, followed by "If you've finished with the program, turn it off" (spoken in a particular tone of voice).

Assassins are equipped with suicide pills in case something goes wrong. Some assassins will be trained to stay put and be captured, others to run and be captured, others to escape. It depends on whether the leaders want to reuse this assassin. If the job is considered a particularly big one that involves, say, a charismatic political leader, sometimes a handler will accompany the assassin to the site, give him or her a signal such as a tap on the left shoulder, and even be present as the programmed assassin pulls the trigger. Handlers then disappear into the chaotic crowd. The trained assassin is often put in position to take the blame and is not really the one who murdered the target. Other killers shooting from other directions will have murdered the victim but they will disappear undetected and the known assassin will be discovered with a gun. He will shoot but his bullet will not be the one that killed. This duplicity is not usually discovered because these cult leaders have placed their own in the roles of agents investigating the crimes.

Most parts of the assassin's brain have no awareness that the body has just been to a public event and murdered a stranger. People designated as assassins are not usually given high positions in life. They are usually, but not always, kept as fringe citizens. Victims have other types of training for assassination roles, depending on the groups' preference. These are just a few examples.

The sections of victims' brains that are designated to be assassins are not allowed to be impulsive, but to just follow orders coolly and methodically. Nevertheless, some trained assassins snap out of that role and shoot the wrong person, often a handler who is at the scene, a relative, or someone they perceive to be particularly evil. The film The Manchurian Candidate depicts an assassin shooting his handler. And in my second memoir, White Witch in a Black Robe, I describe rotating my gun away from my assigned target, a good man, and onto the person at the table whom I considered particularly evil and conspiratorial.

Imprisoned assassins who say they do not remember killing anyone or shooting or owning a gun are probably telling the truth. The parts of their minds that hold the information have not come forward because their jailers do not know or do not use the codes to bring those parts forward. In the film The Manchurian Candidate, playing cards were the visual signal to bring forth the assassin-sequence of the protagonist. The cue could also be a song, melody, or body signal. In time, mind control often loses its power if not reinforced. To prevent this disintegration, jailed assassins may be reprogrammed while in prison.

Regular citizens in today's world are troubled by the assassinations and bombings taking place even in schools. Some of these might be to stir up chaos so that people will want a very controlling government. Trained slave-assassins and bombers are handed the weapons and ammunition needed for their jobs. Or there are stashes of weapons left for them in secret locations.

The leadership in perpetrator groups are accelerating the upheavals in the world, while the common man does not know what is going on and is afraid. The key to peace is to uncover the hidden rulers who are giving these instructions and the minor programmers who are training the future assassins. Right now, we are punishing the wrong people

Gang wars and the bandwagon

Wendy Hoffman

A much more benign form of victims' anger training than assassin training is when they are instructed to join an angry cult cause. One of the functions of some bits and pieces of the programmed mind is to disrupt non-cult activities that are designed to help survivors become free. For example, if a cult team leader is attacking a moderator on an on-line discussion board meant to support survivors, they will attack without thinking. For them, it is as if the whole world is a ritual site and they leap into the horrid festivities because that is what they have been tortured into doing. On communication boards for the professionals treating survivors, some of who are survivors themselves, we see the same sort of dynamics. People jumping on a cause, even a bad one, with compelling momentum.

When I assumed the position of moderator of an on-line communication board for survivors of mind control and ritual abuse, I had not thought I would run into great difficulties. My already published books had let people know that I am an advocate for victims of these horrendous abuses.

The previous moderator wanted to give up her role and start other endeavors. I had to abruptly take over, before the participants knew me. Just about immediately, attacks began. Fairly vicious attacks. Many of the participants on this well attended message board, I am sure, are lovely people. Some may not be, but the majority were most likely acting out of character. I was amazed at the animosity from otherwise fine people. Alison had a similar experience when she did two webinars for a survivor organization. She presented sound material that was going to be in her books. Almost as soon as she began speaking, people began to interrupt, saying, "That's triggering," or "That triggered me," or "That's so upsetting." She was unable to get through her prepared material.

The programs behind this are called "gang war" and "hop on the bandwagon." I went into my own past to find out how it works. I am sure there are many varieties and innovations.

1940s: First I found programming that happened when I was five or six. It took place in the programming center underneath the apartment building my family lived in. The perpetrators were my parents, aunts, and uncles. The main command said, "There will be an infringement of justice. Everyone has to get angry." Each infringement was ridiculous.

To initiate the training, my mother was told to object to red traffic lights when she wanted to cross the street. Why should she have to wait for a light? The other females in this basement said, "It's not fair, you are unjust, you are a tyrant." I had to join in. I said something like "The red light regulates traffic and is necessary so that everyone, cars and people, do not go together." That was before the program took effect.

The master programmer whipped me. He threatened me, saying he would take away all my toys, that I would never be allowed outside again, that I had to follow my leaders or I would not be allowed to live. The whipping on my back and legs was hard. The seeds of this programming were planted.

My mother was directed to say something like "Rah." The word meant nothing. Then the aunts said it. I had to say "Rah," then other vague sounds. Then we graduated to expressions such as "It's not fair." And so on. If I did not participate by joining this gang, the programmer strangled me, almost to death. Gasping, I was placed on the electroshock chair. He tightened the head vise and said: "You will always follow your leader. You will always join your team. You will always protest when they protest injustice." Injustice is the key falseword. Drugs made me more compliant.

I received other trainings with deeper threats as I aged. In my twenties, at a government facility, the program was called "Hop on the band wagon:" Programmers showed me a picture of a small bus. I could also see a real one that was in an area below. The programmer instructed, "When someone indicates anger because of an injustice, you hop on the bandwagon. It doesn't matter whether you agree. It is your job to back your team. You express the anger while your team leader is quiet. Sometimes you will not know who your team leader is. You are the voice. You are the voice for justice. Holler for your compatriots. This is a government command."

A little later, I was in a very sophisticated black chair with a head vise with a huge helmet attached. The male programmer spoke as female assistants in white uniforms surrounded him.

"You are an ant in a giant colony. You never act on your own. When your team leader shows distress, you listen carefully. When he lifts the pinky and index fingers of his left hand, you start yelling at the source of his distress. You do the noisy, dirty work. He is then silent and satisfied. It's as if he is getting a blow-job. You simply make noise and make your team leader look innocent."

In the same decade, the infamous Dr. Cameron at McGill Hospital programmed me after I did not follow instructions to assassinate one of their enemies. This programming took place when I was disobedient.

Dr. Cameron: "You always follow your leader. If he points, you do. You jumped on the wrong bus. You should be executed. You have been trained and you did everything wrong. The leader points, you shoot. You are the voice, not a wild fire."

He continued: "You had a team there and you did not hop on the bandwagon. You wanted your own way and you made trouble. Trouble. I'll put you in the ovens. You Jewish-bitch-queen." Saliva dripped from his distorted mouth.

Sometimes, in the 1980s, my front person was aware when I hopped on the bandwagon even though the fight had no personal benefit for me. But the compulsion was great and I could not stop myself. My then handler would indicate something he was upset about and leave the protest to me.

The leaders of these attacks are usually more sedate than those programmed to join the bandwagon. Sometimes the leaders are so behind the scenes that observers do not even know of their existences.

They control their noisy followers by pushing invisible program buttons. The leaders may be "conscious." They are usually cult-loyal and dangerous. It is easy to blame the pushy followers, but the real disruptions come from the sometimes invisible leaders. As a co-moderator of one of the discussion boards for survivors, I sometimes could not tell the difference between the leaders who initiated the attacks and all the followers who picked up the energy and ran with it.

If you are a survivor, ask yourself whether you ever jump into fights or arguments even though you have nothing to gain.

Do you feel compelled to back up someone you might think of as a friend but who may really be your handler or team leader, even when this leader is working against you?

The beginning step in breaking this training is to become aware of the compulsion to enter conflicts that do not serve your purposes. You, too, can step away from fighting and attacking in order to receive rather than sabotage the help you need.

If you are a therapist and are seeing gang wars and bandwagon hopping in your professional networks, look at who is involved. They may be the cult moles (plants) you need to identify.

In love with death

Wendy Hoffman

Satanic cults create a culture of death and dying. Death becomes attached to survivors' skin. Leaders like to join death and birth. Sacrifices of infants, children, and adults often take place during rituals that include births. Or a pregnant victim gives birth and is simultaneously murdered. I have seen that happen. She was told that if she did not scream, the murderers would not also kill her newborn. The child lived.

Survivors, possibly all survivors, have witnessed murders. War soldiers, genocide survivors, ghetto gang members have also seen multiple murders. Soldiers have witnessed massive deaths within a relatively short time, several months to a decade. War in ordinary life is usually not hidden. At least the people who endure it know it is happening. In criminal mind control cults, there is ordinary life and the hidden secret life of death rituals and assignments. Only parts of the person know about the underside life, and most of society does not know and would not believe it. Knowledge of its existence is probably more prevalent now than ever before. Mind control survivors live with death or the threat of death either their whole lives or until they are able to break away from the criminal groups and remain safe.

Witnessing death, even more than the other abuses, eliminates the possibility of a childhood. Satanic cult children are like William Blake's chimney sweeps, thrust into an adult world of violence and grime that erases the possibility of innocence. Their untimely exposure to sex seals the lid.

Leaders and programmers weave death into all their mind control programs. For example, when telling someone what not to do, they like to say "upon penalty of death".

After the murder of the one friend allowed, death becomes associated with inconsolable loss and guilt, all pre-planned. Some survivors are left with huge guilt feelings. No matter what happens, they feel guilty. Others become so numb that they cannot see when they do anything wrong. Feelings of tragic loss follow survivors everywhere.

Some of the "deaths" they witnessed did not actually happen. Children were tricked and the deaths were falsified. But child survivors in particular think they happened, so the effects are just as damaging and lasting as if the murders were real. Programmers also like to create the illusion of an after-life. They use magic tricks to make children believe they are seeing souls emerging from dead bodies to be trapped and caught. They tell the children that internal librarians, or managers, are placing the souls in boxes and that the boxes are being placed inside the child victims. Or they say file cabinets or caskets, vaults, caves, or some other kind of container. Children will feel that the dead live within them. They are afraid of some of the spirits but do not know how to get away from them. They have the mistaken impression that whole graveyards exist within them as well as ancient souls and spirits from other times and lands. Moreover, children are tricked into thinking they can catch souls with their fingers and hands. Trainers have drugged children, taught them to separate yolks from the white portion of eggs and tell them that they are catching souls. Lighting effects at rituals emulate spirits rising from the ritual site to "Lucifer's heavens."

Survivors are sometimes aware of the dead as they live their lives. The murdered dead whom the survivor loved can stay with that person in life. Some cherished dead friends protect and comfort them. The sense of their presence has a strong impact on survivors and keeps them going. Survivors may over-know death, but they also know the depth of love.

Their exterior world is filled with exposure to death; they believe their insides are filled with representations of death, and their programming is filled with death. Once your mind is taken away from you and you do not have free will, you become like the dead. Robots are not alive. Automatons live trance-like existences.

In addition, almost every survivor is loaded with suicidal ideation. Parents teach their small children how to kill themselves. These parents are told that if they do not, their children will be skinned and killed, so they teach their children to slit their wrists, jump out of windows, overdose on their parents' obviously placed medications, to name just a few ways. Simultaneously, programs exist for homicidal acts. Children are carefully taught how to murder and how to dissect corpses. The training starts with fish, birds, and small animals as targets and progresses to humans.

Even as some cult children are born to be murdered early in their lives, some are born who are not allowed to be killed until later in their adulthood or old age. It is typical of the arrogance of this kind of satanism to assign expiration dates to some of their victims. Those not allowed to be murdered until late in their lives will be born into positions these cults consider higher and more important than average. If these individuals are not obedient, they will be tortured but not killed. They may have long lives of torture until they either break free or are finally murdered. They may be considered even more unfortunate then the "expendables" murdered early in life. I am one of these unfortunates.

The only way to get away from all this death and make-believe death and killing and the compulsion to kill yourself is to undo the programming. Run away from your perpetrators, do not tell them where you are, and, in safety and calm, start unravelling their commands, one program at a time, one mandate after another, until you are free and clear of all the programs they imposed on your brain. It is the only way to step away from a religion of death and dying and into life. Wash the residue of death off your skin. Let your pores breathe in life. Leave death's stench behind.

Politicians' use of victims

Wendy Hoffman

Hordes of victims from multi-generational cult families are trained from birth onward to service politicians and people scheduled to be in power eventually, including world leaders. They serve as sexual slaves, memorizers, and messengers. The sexual slaves perform in private or in groups, on yachts and in homes, including official palaces and government-assigned homes. They often have permanent genital markings that indicate to perpetrators that they have been molded for this heinous role. They will service and not talk and not remember. Meanwhile the political figures go off satisfied, self-righteous, not endangered, revered, and scot-free.

Some of these children are subjugated young and taught to use their brains as a camera or tape recorder. Click, they can record words. Click, click—they can record documents. They then travel to the next politicians or businesspeople and deliver the information in words. Some function as mules who deliver elite drugs and/or messages and instructions in writing. Programmers construct them to dissociate this knowledge. But survivors are beginning to leak. Some have memories of being trained for, and performing, these roles, including those of political assassins. Some have written about this aspect of their lives. I have. Even within those survivors who do not yet have conscious memories, an earthquake rumbles and sways. When political primaries and campaigns are in full flood, memories threaten to erupt. Many victims do not understand why they feel so triggered day after day. The faces on television and the internet do not stop. Somewhere deep inside, the victims are aware that they know these people. Some cannot find words to express their impressions. Others' clarity is sharp. They overcome the "do not know, do not tell" commands. They recognize the hand signals given at significant times—hand signals reminding them not to tell. In a certain context, such a signal could be translated into a command not to say anything bad about a certain candidate.

So, survivors know or are beginning to know. But whom can they tell? People who have not been mind-controlled and programmed through torture do not want to know. The vitriol the 2016 candidates inspired was astounding. Friendships ended. Neighbors stopped talking to one another. Huge signs promoting one or another candidate appal people. In rural communities, stores exhibit such signs. Some customers will no longer enter them.

Only the politically visible perpetrators, diminished survivors, and some of their therapists and support people know what is going on. Perpetrators do not want to talk and survivors are not allowed to, even if they remember what happened. On professional discussion online sites, therapists are not allowed to say what they know about politicians. On survivor sites, survivors are not permitted to name names. The world from every angle conspires to keep the status quo in place and survivors muzzled. Ordinary people do not need hand signals instilled through torture and mind control not to be aware. Even survivors who have achieved freedom and remember the themes of their lives find they have to sit on their truths. All sides buffet them.

The perpetrator groups work hard to disguise perpetrators' identities to victims. Some confused survivors have spoken out identifying the wrong people as perpetrators, because of their programming. Others might be deliberately misidentifying good people. But credible survivors who have reached a good degree of health are giving consistent information.

Which is worse: continuing to be mind-controlled or being the little boy who cried "The emperor has no clothes" and being punished with ongoing torture for speaking out? This is not a fairy tale and so far has not had a happy ending. Survivors end up alienated either by mind control or knowledge. We still live in the aftermath of Stalin. As a mob, we cheer the wrong people.

Twenty-first century Nazis

Wendy Hoffman

It is easy to underestimate the influence and power of today's Nazism. Some of its less educated members do blatantly Nazi acts, but the more educated ones, with power and position in society, hold their meetings and rituals in secret and use mind control procedures. Only recently have photographs emerged of a seven-year-old Queen Elizabeth and members of the British royal family doing Nazi salutes. Joe Kennedy's affiliation with Nazi leaders cost him his office decades ago.

What does Nazism express that appeals to both the poor and the very rich? It represents power and annihilation—destruction.

My legal father, the one who raised me, who married my mother in ordinary life and pretended to be my biological father, came from a Nazi family. My mother's side of the family was Illuminati and wanted their group to rule the world as did my father's side.

My son's wedding was engineered by cult people, and it never occurred to me that my son's wife came from a Nazi family. They were nominal Christians who lived in Hillary Clinton's borough. I never saw them lynch blacks. But perhaps that's a portrait of many Nazis.

Why would the cults want to marry Nazis to Jewish people? Modern-day Nazism is different from Hitler's in some ways. Hitler attempted to exterminate all Jewish people and leave not a trace. Modern-day Nazis want to take those they hate and convert them to their way of thinking. Historic Nazis tried to rid their communities of foreigners and anyone they deemed socially unacceptable. They eliminated Jews, whereas the modern-day Nazis intermarry with Jewish people as a way of eliminating Judaism.

Right before the wedding, my son's wife's family did a ritual that I describe in The Enslaved Queen and in which my son and I were being abused. The chanters made negative comments about our being Jewish but I did not put it all together. Later, I remembered a programming session that same pre-wedding night that preceded the remembered ritual. Hoodlums abducted me from the hotel and took me by car to an apartment building where all the mailboxes had false Arab names. They all seemed Arab. A woman in a burkha was on the main floor, as my daughter-in-law, her sister, and her mother held guns pressed into my back and walked me up the steps. There were humiliations for me and my son. The perpetrators wanted to make us think we were dogs, then came the standard tortures.

When I told Alison about this, she asked whether I could see the torturers' hands and what color they were. I saw hands whose skin color was lighter than mine, one with red hairs. Horrible things were said about the Jewish people as spit flew from their mouths. After the torture, the programmers showed me photos such as mug-shots of the Boston bombers and other mind-controlled Arab terrorists. They commanded me to believe my abusers at this time were Muslim terrorists and not the white supremacist Nazis they really were. At the end, the apparently Arab woman on the first floor cleaned me up. She was the token to reinforce the idea that I had fallen into Arabs' hands.

The mechanics of this memory give one example of how hidden the Nazi groups are in today's world—not the thugs who roam the streets, but the people who hold respectable positions in the world and even world leaders. It also tells of the enhanced tricks they will use to disguise their identities and pin their misdeeds on other groups.

The frequency of programming

Wendy Hoffman

When survivors start their memory process, they pull out from their tightly closed minds a memory here, a memory there. These often turn out not to be the worst memories, but they are often representative of some of the major themes in their usurped lives. Years go by, and survivors working on associating or bringing to consciousness what their lives have been can fill large sacks with personal retrieved information. Eventually, they see themselves in black chairs and their understanding of programming for mind control begins. The black chair, indicating electroshock, is often one of the most telling keys to knowledge. Their perpetrator list grows. The relatives survivors thought they had loving relationships with may be the last ones recalled, as well as the well-known and idealized political, religious, social, athletic, and artist personalities. The private and world arenas collapse for them then.

These realizations are agonizing, but the big realization is yet to come. Until now, the awareness has been of an event here and there. Suddenly, those barriers fall away. As they crumble, a grid-like life comes into focus. It was not an occasion here and there that covered a programming session where the mind was erased and a new one installed. It was not only something that happened when the victim was three, six, eighteen, twenty-four, and so on. It was constant! The shock of this realization makes one's earth tremble.

Recovery can be divided into before this realization and after this realization.

Before, you thought nice things also occurred in your tarnished life. You thought you went on that road trip with your father because he loved you. It was your special time together. If you are a parent, you thought your adult child visited you because he cared about you and missed you. All these events stacked up in your life, but now you realize that they were covers or excuses to get you to a location where your perpetrators would administer additional programming and mind control.

The nice moments of your life flew out the window. It was all a lie. A horribly gigantic lie.

If you get away from your controllers, in time your mind control will lessen and perhaps become ineffective. But if your controllers know where you are and have access to you, they will resurrect the diminishing programming and refresh your mind control. That is one of the reasons it is essential not to report your intentions or preference for freedom or your location if you have run away.

With the illusion of having the nice moments of your life gone, then what do you have?

Reality, truth, and, for the first time, belonging to yourself at last. Is that enough? It will have to be.

There is more. They decided on the work you would do both in the secret organizations you were born into and in ordinary, normal life. They decided whom you would marry and where you would live. You could not even buy a house without their permission—or even a dog. You could not give your children lessons without their say-so. You could not send your children to a specialized school without their permission.

They fabricated every stitch of your life.

The commanders even decide which facial expressions victims will wear. My ex-ordinary-life husband assumed a sweet expression to cover his crude meanness. My ex-cult-husband learned after years of practice to make his face devoid of feeling. Mind-controlled assassins are taught to exhibit smug, self-satisfied facial expressions when they are caught. These looks infuriate the general public. The Boston bombers and the Orlando terrorist had the same kind of taught expressions on their self-satisfied faces. Assassins sometimes appear genuinely confused, since they do not know that they are stooges.

It seems that the first step in freedom is grief. They stole everything.

You are left now with your present and future. No matter how old you are when you become aware, seize every moment of what is left now. Hold tight to yourself, the self that belongs to you alone. Hold tight. You worked so very hard to get here. Despite the heart-breaking grief, you are yours alone now. No one owns you. Your mind can be in one piece.

As I neared the end of my processes of associating my lost past, I became tired and weary. How much more will I have to go through? I sighed. Then came the awareness that the programming and control were constant and that I had no free will during my life. I cannot process millions of programming sessions both in and out of their chambers. I will skim over and search for anything new or irregular in those myriad memories. I will investigate deeply the ones that contain a deviation or difference. The rest will have to wash away as a group. Often, there are not that many years left to live. I want to put my energy into life, since for me life is what is new and different.

I do not know whether survivors ever reach the end of associating the imposed dissociation. It is, however, important to believe that there will be an end to these horrendous memories and disillusionment about people and society.

Whether or not you ever get to the pivotal memories, you have the right to define yourself and not be made into a non-human being, a machine following orders.

Conscious and unconscious perpetrators

Alison Miller

The first person to tell me about “going conscious” was the late Stella Katz, the programmer whose unimaginable piece on Kaballah programming I published in Healing the Unimaginable. Stella was in the process of systematically working through her own training memories during the day when her husband was at work and her children were at school. Being a cult programmer, she knew how her memories were stored internally, and she knew that she must put together every part of a memory in order to destroy the program it had created. Stella described herself as having “a case of galloping integration.” She was thirty-nine years old, and that was the age at which she had been supposed to “go conscious”—that is, to have the parts who lived her everyday life join with the parts who were loyal to the cult who had trained her, while the hurt child parts were to be hidden under a barrier where they would not be found. She was using the “go conscious” program for her own ends, following the laid out path which those who trained her had intended, removing the barriers within her inner structure one section at a time, but defeating the cult’s purpose by including the hurt child parts in the joining. The program was supposed to work gradually, integrating one internal group at a time. She worked hard on it every day, because, she said, if even one child part remains within the system, the present-day programmers can access that part to split it once more.

I do not know the entire method by which a person becomes conscious, whether it is entirely an internal process led by a few hidden insiders who change the structure to make parts share their knowledge, or whether it requires an external person to set it off. That is because "conscious" members of these groups do not generally go for therapy. I only know what I have learned from Stella and Wendy, both of whom refused the demand to become "conscious."

If a person goes conscious, he or she becomes a conscious perpetrator, fully identified with the goals of the group, rewarded with status and power and freedom from being tortured. Only people of high status in the perpetrator groups are given the option of going conscious, and they are presented with this decision at designated ages in adulthood. Wendy was repeatedly asked to go conscious, and she repeatedly refused. She did not want to lose her soul. She was supposed to take part in a ceremony to become "conscious" at the 1982 Feast of the Beast ritual, when she would have been thirty-nine, like Stella. Prior to that ritual she would probably have undergone gradual changes in her internal structure and personality system. Her decision to refuse this offer meant a life of pursuit and torture rather than comfortable wealth and authority.

Many people who are not "conscious" are still working for the groups in one way or another. Wendy, for example, was working as a therapist and expected to use methods taught to her to close down those clients who had lived through these abuses. She wrote about this in The Enslaved Queen. Survivors of mind control and ritual abuse are sent to conferences or email discussion lists with parts of them instructed to use hand signals or code words to trigger programming in other vulnerable survivors. They are generally unaware that they are doing this. But other members of the conferences or lists are "conscious," and are aware of what they are triggering and why. They may be given jobs such as "matriarch," offering apparent comfort and support and gathering victims to follow their hidden instructions. Or they may be programmers, taking people into hotel rooms or out in vans during conferences and reinforcing those people's programming through torture.

I do not know whether it is possible to undo "going conscious." Perhaps if someone had accepted this without fully understanding its implications, then recognized that he or she had hidden hurt child parts, such a person could find where the parts were hidden and work through their pain. This is close to what Stella chose to do, when she allowed the program to work gradually but subverted its purpose to achieve full integration.

Persons who have become “conscious” are given positions where they are responsible for advancing the agenda of the perpetrator groups. Wendy notes that the conscious people who have their inner children repressed can still rage and have tantrums. They appear hollow, but also as if they are drowning. Many children grow up surrounded by “conscious” adults. The conscious are like the dead, and the ones who resist or are not considered stable enough or elevated enough in these criminal groups are sometimes driven insane. Those members who are given high political office or important positions in society are inevitably people who have gone conscious and over whom the rulers have complete control.

Things I wish I did not know

Alison Miller

Have you ever wondered why mind control and ritual abuse survivors all over the world report the same phenomena? As I wrote "Fifty lies they may have told you" in around 2014, I was reasonably sure that survivors in Germany, Australia, and South Africa would recognize some of the same lies that survivors in Canada and the USA have reported to me and to their therapists. The Extreme Abuse Survey (https://eassurvey.wordpress.com/extreme-abuse-survey-final-results/) asked about particular reported abuses, and found many to be common to survivors all over the world. Why are they common? Because perpetrator groups collaborate and teach one another techniques of torturing children, splitting the infant mind, and training mind-controlled victims.

It is organized crime. It is psychologically sophisticated organized crime. What else should we call it? Like the Mafia, it runs in families; people are born into it. And, as in the Mafia, those born into the families are expected to continue the family tradition of crime. I wish I did not know that. I wish I did not know so many people who, through no fault of their own, were born into it, and have endured lifelong torture, including child prostitution and pornography. I wish dogs, which I love, were not used as sacrifices. I wish children were not taught to rape and kill and then told they are evil and "possessed." When I worked with my first survivors, I thought there were a number of smaller groups in different locations who did roughly similar things. I did not realize the extent of the national and international organization of these groups. I have learned more about this from Wendy, because she was unlucky enough to be placed at the highest level within the international organization of some of the major groups. I wish I had not learned this. I wish I had not learned that politicians are involved, including world leaders. I wish I had not learned that some of my favorite musicians and film stars may have been involved, that the groups have a hand in deciding who rises to stardom.

I wish I had not learned recently that some people who purport to help survivors, including some well-known therapists, religious leaders, and leaders of non-profit groups, are actually members of perpetrator groups with jobs such as spreading disinformation or gathering and silencing survivors who had escaped. I wish that Christianity and Judaism and perhaps other religions had not been corrupted and misused by perpetrators. I wish that various schools of therapy had not been corrupted and misused by perpetrators. I wish that therapists were not teaching self-help techniques which are actually program triggers, sometimes in complete unawareness.

I wish I did not know these things. I wish I did not constantly walk a tightrope between naïvely trusting those who do not deserve my trust and fearfully suspecting everyone who may be trying to do good but do not understand the situation.

I wish I lived in the world my siblings live in, where they are appalled by some recent political events but are happy to spend their time gardening or travelling as tourists and playing golf, where law enforcement catches the perpetrators, where the biggest enemies are old age and cancer. I wish I lived in the world I lived in when I was young, where children played on the street and (as far as I knew) the neighbors looked after them safely. I wish I lived in the world I thought I lived in as a young adult, where God looked after those who tried to live good lives, and we could trust Him not to send us more than we could bear.

Survivors bear the unbearable through dissociation, segmentation of their brains into many parts. But this dissociation is exploited by abusers to control those brains, piece by piece. They struggle when they become aware of what they have gone through and might still be going through. Therapists, kind spouses, and support people struggle with the knowledge of such unbearable things. We have to revise our worldviews, and this is a painful but necessary process.

I wish I did not know all this. But people closed their eyes when Hitler was sending people to concentration camps to be killed. People in the "developed" countries close their eyes when genocides happen in the "less developed" countries. The UN would not send enough troops to save Rwanda, and would not intervene in Syria. The leaders of western "democracies" frame refugees as illegal immigrants and invaders of their people's safety and security, so that very few people recognize that these unfortunate people could be us.

We cannot close our eyes to these known abuses.

I have chosen not to close my eyes to mind control and ritual abuse. Even though I wish I did not know.

SECTION V

SAFETY

The "angel" of suicide

Wendy Hoffman

A mind-controlled slave cannot live making his or her own decisions. If you are a child learning to ride a bicycle, first you learn to operate the brakes. Then you will not crash into pedestrians and cars. If you are a child growing up within a criminal, high level mind-control cult, one of your first lessons is how to commit suicide. Then your controllers can eliminate you if you spring a leak, know too much, or are more rebellious than they can handle. Or if they need a dead person to take the blame for what they themselves do.

People will not want to kill themselves if they know that their death will be both painful and needless. Therefore, handlers fool the victim children into believing that death will lead them into a peaceful paradise. The children suffer so in every way that they yearn for some peace. Mostly, cult children experience inflicted pain, so the possibility of comfort attracts and excites them.

Controllers deliver an apparent angel to lead the way into this much desired fake paradise, which is, in reality, only a brutal death. In the crib, before the infant knows speech, handlers show images of the angel as they stroke, soothe, drug, and feed the famished baby. They use slide projectors, film, and computers to project the fake angel's movement around and across the room. Before babies have taken their first steps, they know this angel as a frequent companion. They associate its presence with comfort and freedom from pain, plus the angel looks beautiful, like a Renaissance painting. Babies never suspect duplicity. They do not have that concept.

Handlers use words as babies mature. "Follow the angel of mercy [or the angel of the sunset—by now, there must be many other words for this trick] and you will be well."

As babies become small children, programmers introduce triggers or cues that the children will eventually associate with the message and image of the angel. First, they torture the child, then drug the child, then show the child the angel. The angel becomes associated with the means of relief. They want the child to follow the angel wherever it leads. One survivor reported walking the Kaballah pathways in a cult training center, entering many rooms filled with torture and illusions such as puppets simulating demons. In the last room at the end of each pathway was a woman dressed up as the angel, who drugged the child and soothed her into sleep. At the end of my outdoor pathways, when I was a toddler and small child, when the terror and pain ended, there was often an image of the angel or a human dressed like this angel. The angel became associated with the end of torment.

A playing card such as the eight of spades, a letter in a foreign language, a musical or natural sound, or a tarot card picture is sufficient to invoke the image of this deceptive angel and its inherent message—"Follow me into death."

These trespasses are introduced in infancy. The victim grows to understand their meanings.

Starting right after toddlerhood, trainers, who are often parents and grandparents, teach children how to kill themselves. Each group will have a preferred method—jumping off a bridge or out of a window, drowning, slitting wrists, overdosing on an adult's pills. As victims grow older, handlers and other controllers will tell the person of all the bad things he or she has done and increase feelings of guilt and shame to an intolerable level. People might want to die just to get away from these intense feelings. Ironically, the victims might not have even performed many of the acts the controllers make them feel guilty about. All programming is based on deceptions.

Moreover, life as a mind-controlled slave is so painful, disturbing, and fruitless that death at times could seem like a blessing, but this kind of death is not. It is only the fulfillment of one's life as a slave and does not help you become the person you really are. Undoing this programming and attempting freedom are how survivors can redeem their, until now, unfortunate lives. Helping other survivors may add something to their lives as well.

Throughout life, slaves are drilled about when to kill themselves. The training is continuous. If a victim ever disobeys, if controllers ever give that person the signal, if he or she would ever reveal secret information, then controllers will want that person to kill themselves for the benefit of the group's security. Eventually, if the adult victim misbehaves or if the leaders just need a stooge, this program, already entrenched in the victim, will be activated.

This programming is enforced and re-enforced, which does not mean it cannot be broken. Once people understand the lies and manipulations, the programming dissolves, sometimes immediately and totally. The internal adults can help the inner children understand how they were fooled and lied to.

If you have survived these kinds of abuses and see an image of this sort of angel, know that it will only lead you to a bad kind of death. Try to unravel the programming that deceives you into thinking that this image or the symbol that evokes this association will in any way benefit you. Find the parts who hold this programming. Remember to go back to the earliest memories from the crib and include those.

You have a choice—to do what your handlers have trained you to do or to live the rest of your valuable life in your own way.

To die or not to die

Wendy Hoffman

I have always known from the depths of my being that I did not want to be alive. Who would want to be alive with a family like mine? Or some cult role like mine? I had eight children and I do not see a single one; neither do I know whether six of them are alive. I could pass five of them on the street and not know it. And the torture and denigration—unbearable. I am not writing this to complain. I am writing so that you will understand why I did not want to live. I only wanted to live for one year of my life, when my friend Daniel was alive and loved me.

So I wonder over and over why I remained alive. Was it fate or divine intervention? I did make some suicide attempts but they were not successful. I wondered about still being alive throughout all the years of my conscious recovery, but it was only this year, when I am seventy-two and pretty much integrated, that with Alison's help I remembered a do-not-die program.

On the one hand, my mother was teaching me to make "trees" along my arms and wrists with my father's razor blade. She seemed to take a special glee in teaching me to die. She also taught me to hold my head down in the bathtub.

At the same time, my biological father was teaching me to follow the Angel of Mercy to wherever it led—which would be to death.

So it was clear that my immediate family wanted me to know how to slit my wrists, drown, jump off bridges and roofs and crash.

Then why did they teach me simultaneously not to die?

The do not-die programming may have begun even before the suicidal programming.

On the roof of the apartment building where I grew up, my family strapped a harness around me. The harness had a very long leash attached. The programmer projected an image of this giant Angel of Mercy onto the sky. They told me at three years old, four years old, five and up to seven years old, to go to the edge of the roof. The Angel of Mercy lured me to the ridge, then blocked the other side of the ledge. It appeared that the angel blocked me, but the projectionist was really projecting the Angel's image between me and the sky. "Go back," the family all screamed together and tugged my harness backwards. I would have been happy to jump because I was already disillusioned with life, but they would not let me. "Daniel wants you alive." "You have to live." Over and over they led me to the ledge and then stopped the jump with the tug on the harness and their words.

Alison Miller describes similar trainings her clients received in her book, Healing the Unimaginable (2011, p. 188). Her clients were taught about hell in their cults and told that is where they would go if they killed themselves.

It is mind-boggling to be programmed in contradictory ways. I think most children growing up in the severely abusive and no-love atmosphere of generational mind-control cults would prefer death. But then they also have training to stay alive at all costs. This intentional mixing up of the mind and pulling it in opposite directions at once is typical of the insidious nature of organized, criminal mind control.

Once I discovered do-not-die programming, I felt disappointed. It was not divine intervention or fate. Once again, it was just mind control. I could not even choose whether to live or die.

Now that I am old and alive, I do not want to die. I want to expose these abuses, heal completely and help others heal. My programmers would not let me die. I will be so public, they will be sorry.

I understand the do-not-die programming. It takes effort, manpower, and money to mass produce automatons. They do not want all that work wasted. But if they are not going to let you die, why all the specific suicidal training? Is it to destroy self-esteem? Is it to give us the message that not only are we not loved and wanted, we also do not deserve to be alive?

One of the most painful lessons for Holocaust survivors was that many of the population wanted them exterminated, their whole race wiped off the earth. Perhaps the suicidal training for cult victims teaches them wrongly that they are considered similarly worthless and undesirable.

Those of us who have survived can show the world how resilient and worthy we are.

This dual and simultaneous programming of kill yourself/do-not-die affects the brain gravely. The parts inside who want to kill themselves and the parts who cannot are unable to coexist. This inability to coexist can create thicker and greater barriers. If a suicide program is acted on, its opposite will appear to wipe it out. That is not co-existence. It is dominance and eradication. It is dissociation that makes both "die" and "do not die" be present within the same person, without awareness of each other.

Programmed suicide and therapists

Alison Miller

Most therapists have received at least basic training in how to assess whether a client is suicidal, and how high the risk. They have also been instructed to take all suicide threats seriously, and to provide immediate service and possible hospitalization to clients with specific suicide plans or other risk factors.

All survivors of mind control and ritual abuse have suicide training. They also have "Do not die" training, as described in Wendy's previous essay. (The pairing of Die and Do not Die programming is typical of mind control. There is also Sleep–Do not Sleep and Run–Do not Run training.) Back to suicide: The perpetrator groups put a lot of time and money into training their mind-controlled victims, and they do not want them just escaping via death. I remember one client who detailed how she was taught exactly how many pills to take—one less than the amount that was potentially lethal.

At the same time, the suicide programming is very useful to the groups. If a survivor is working hard to get free, and the group cannot get hold of her, the perpetrators can trigger her suicide programming through a hand signal, and her mental health professionals will be obliged to hospitalize her, delivering her into the hands of the perpetrators on the hospital staff. If a survivor is remembering and telling about important known crimes, and is not very important to the group, the group might decide she is better off dead. It will help if she has made previous unsuccessful suicide attempts. That will make sure she has achieved the "Borderline" diagnosis, and has inconvenienced the care system sufficiently that they will just sigh when she eventually dies of apparent suicide. It will not even occur to her psychiatrist that it was actually murder. Two of my early clients who survived told me that the cult had broken into their apartments and forced all their pills down their throats in an attempt at murder disguised as suicide. Another one died (see Chapter One of Healing the Unimaginable (2011)), and her long history of suicide attempts came in useful to the perpetrators.

The Extreme Abuse Survey (see References section) discovered that mind control and ritual abuse survivors made many more suicide attempts than other extreme abuse survivors, but had no more successful suicides. So, therapists treating survivors need to be aware of the programming for unsuccessful suicide attempts and the "do not die" programming, as well as programming for successful suicide in cases in which the perpetrator group has decided the survivor is of no further use to them and might pose a risk. We need our own criteria for deciding whether a survivor client is a genuine suicide risk (on the basis of how much threat he or she poses to the perpetrator group), and if we believe a client is at genuine risk, we need to regard hospitalization as a last resort choice, unless we are 100% sure that our local hospital is not infiltrated by the perpetrator group. In my early years of working with survivors, I discovered that our local mental hospital was thoroughly infiltrated. The cult van made a regular stop at the front door during the dinner hour, to pick up survivors who came out "for a smoke," and reprogram them. I do not believe this is unusual.

Current contact

Wendy Hoffman

I have heard therapists refer to ongoing involvement with a perpetrator group as "current contact." That term implies agreement. It does not quite capture the situation. Cult members break into your home, terrorize and torture you, or they grab you off the street and take you somewhere to mind-control you, or they program you to appear at a designated place and time where they will do the same. This last option might be the worst because you have become even more the unwitting victim. None of these scenes imply consent.

Shall we call it, then, current abduction? Even in the third option, your mind has been abducted through formal mind control.

There are two reasons for current abduction: (1) your actions or words have indicated that you desire freedom and, therefore, have to be crushed and packaged in torture immediately. Or (2) the group that claims you does maintenance work and schedules mind-control sessions and rituals regularly throughout the year, in addition to formal holidays. You are programmed to attend, and might be punished severely if you do not.

Concerning break-ins for the purpose of stopping a quest for freedom, it is rarely one person who will break into your home. The group will have one programmer, and one or more people trained to administer torture to your body and possibly that of your pet(s). Since they will not have an electroshock chair in your home, the programmer will carry a Taser kit. The perpetrators will say something like: "You will never be free." "Terminate your therapy." (Even if your therapist is a cult-planted therapist, your controllers might feel he or she has not closed you down sufficiently.) "You are a slave, nothing but a slave." "We will kill your child if you continue. You will not continue." Etc.

In regular life, your torturers may appear completely normal and non-cult-like. Some might hold high positions in society, such as doctors, lawyers, teachers, politicians, religious leaders. They might be your friends in daily life, or family members, or go to your church.

When you remember a recent punishment event, listen to their words carefully, because these will show their intent. Perpetrators will say something like stop your friendship with X, stop reading books about mind control, get off the online message board, stop talking about programs. If they cannot stop you from continuing in honest and authentic therapy, then they will program you to kill your therapist and/or yourself. They can order homicide through mind control. You, of course, do not have to do what they command.

All this abuse will occur during the early morning hours, when your unknowing neighbors sleep and do not call the police. The police on duty at these times very well may be cult-police plants. These groups excel in coordinating atrocities. Their break-ins often occur early on Saturday mornings, so you do not go to work drugged and with prominent bruises.

When you wake up from your drugged state later in the morning or afternoon, your mind probably will not recall what happened to you hours ago. This abuse can take place month after month or even week after week or day after day and still you will probably not recall it. The parts of your mind that are tortured are buried within your internal mind-control system, not easily accessible. If you do not find them and do not move far away, this kind of most vicious abuse can go on indefinitely. It can continue even if you move away. These groups are no respecters of age and frailty. It pays to dig and scratch and get to the parts who endured it and hear what they have to tell.

Even when your mind holds no conscious account of what recently occurred, your body can tell you. There is no way to endure this level of torture and not have a sore and injured body. If they think you might run away, they could break your foot or toes, or dislocate your knee or hip. Your torturers intend for you to be sore. If your mind is closed, ask your body. Follow the physical pain and ask inside about it. Much rides on your knowing what is happening to you and why. Try not to rationalize it away with some cause from normal life, like new orthotics or taking too long a hike. Knowing about your ongoing mind control is your best protection.

Their second kind of torture is for maintenance. For these, you will have to attend rituals. You will be instructed to travel to ritual sites. Rituals are for mind control. They have theatrical demonstrations, orgies, drugs, sometimes human sacrifices, and punishment for others. Their main purpose is to control your mind and keep you in place.

It is better to know what is happening to you.

It is better not to give your mind over.

It is better not to fold under their threats of harming someone you love.

They might have already harmed your pet.

Do not collapse under feelings of betrayal. One of the torturers they send may be one of your own mind-controlled children. That adult may torture your pet. The rest of that person will not know what he or she was forced to do.

Do not fold. Your mind belongs to you, not to your perpetrators. Your best protection is learning how your mind-control system works.

There might come a time when you realize that the body pains you suffer from are not body memories of years ago but fresh wounds. And the insomnia is not old anxiety but a fear of another assault. And the panic attacks are not amorphous and about your whole life but about specific fears concerning the here and now.

If you have reporters inside who have not stopped reporting to the abuser group, stay where you are until you are certain they will not report your plans. What is the sense of hiding if you are going to tattle on yourself? Before you can leave, you must spend your time finding all your inside reporters and enlighten them that they do not have to tell anyone where they are and that they can lie as well. They can report to you any danger they perceive instead.

Once it filters into your conscious mind that you are being accessed and beaten up brutally, electroshocked and drugged, there is only one way to cope. You have to leave. You cannot stay in your home or even your locality.

Even if you have family—especially if you have family—a nice job, friends, a church, clubs, you have to leave. You have to leave if you are twenty-five or seventy-five. Make careful plans, then take action.

Handlers*

Wendy Hoffman

If you are a mind-controlled victim, you are likely to have a handler until you escape or die. A handler makes sure you follow all commands, that your programs remain intact, that you make no moves toward breaking free. A handler can be a male or female adult. Handlers used to be called "manufacturers" because they manufacture your life and consider you a mannequin. They do not love you. They differ from programmers, who split off the personalities within you, and teach these parts the programs and commands. Programmers used to be called "mind masters." Often, parts are told they were "created" by the Master and, therefore, would not exist otherwise and belong to him. Sometimes the same person works as a programmer and a handler. Handlers also differ from spies, who follow you around to get information about you and snitch to the cult. They used to be called "snitches." And torturers work directly with programmers to administer the physical brutality. They can also be sent out on their own to enforce a program or threaten by giving a physical warning.

How do you get a handler?

* This chapter appeared in the online journal Survivorship, Winter 2016.

All cult-born people have one until they are trained. If they have specific ongoing jobs to do in their particular cult, then they will be assigned handlers to track their course. Because the danger of sudden enlightenment or programs breaking down lurks throughout a lifetime, handlers keep a vigilant eye on their subjects. Their jobs are made easy because victims are programmed to report promptly if something is not working within. So, even if handlers have lazy spells, are distracted, or miss a beat, their subjects will bring any indiscretion or striving for freedom to their handlers' attention. It is quite a pas-de-deux. A handler wants the complete slavery of his or her victims. The victims cooperate fully because they have been mind-controlled from infancy on to do so. They are not aware of this entrapment or of their programming to live as rats in a maze.

Like a pimp, the same handler can monitor many people's lives. But cult victims who have highly visible or important jobs in the normal, non-cult world will have a one-on-one handler. Handlers can be parents, siblings, spouses, lovers, relatives, friends, or therapists. I have seen heads of countries, royalty, and elected officials with their spouses on television, and it appeared to me that the spouses had been given the job of monitoring every action and thought of the officials they were in charge of and married to. Many of the people in charge of the world we live in are manipulated marionettes on tight strings. People in important visible positions will have solid handlers who will not deviate from their loyalty to the satanic cult. If they break free, these handlers will be demoted and punished.

You know you are in particular trouble when someone that parts of you recognize from your division of the cult enters your ordinary life. That can only mean one thing, and it does not mean your long lost love has somehow found you. It means your programmers are worried about your realizing who you are and have sent a more powerful and vicious handler to you, someone who knows you from the prior cult days even though most of your parts might not remember this person's true and secret identity.

People in less visible positions might have handlers who are also blind victims. Your breaking free might even help them see their own entrapment.

Breaking free of these prisons entails becoming aware that you are imprisoned. One reason you might not know you are entrapped is because of the tight reins handlers keep on their victims. No move toward awareness or freedom is tolerated. You can break free anyway.

Begin by identifying the current handler in your life.

If you have a compulsion to call somebody, that somebody would be your handler. You might call to report a move, some change in your life, a memory breaking out, or any information that goes against your programming.

If the handler is a friend or boss, you can gradually ease away, but what if the handler is a husband or wife and the parent of your child or children? You can divorce, but what do you do about the children? This is an instance of how complicated life becomes when attempting to extricate yourself from the webs of evil.

Some people may feel that they have to remain a prisoner because breaking away is too dangerous or difficult. If this is the case, it still might be better for you to know what your programs and triggers are than to go through life numb and deceived. If you know who your handler is, you can lie to that person. You do not have to report what you are thinking and feeling. You can be inching your way to freedom and perhaps preparing your child or children to make a break, while hiding this information from the now-known enemy.

When you are advanced in your recovery, a helpful therapeutic method is to make a list of the handlers you have had throughout your life. They may be few or many, depending on your age and your position in your criminal organization. Knowing what your life is and who the enemy is helps you regain the humanity that was stolen from you as soon as you were born. It is a way to give birth to yourself by pulling yourself away from people who plan to keep you down, who plan to make you less than a human being.

No matter how difficult the struggle is to break free, it is worth it. Moving in the right direction has its own rewards. Even if you cannot take your children with you, you are leaving them the legacy that the fight for freedom is worth it.

Your handler holds your programs like so many pebbles in his or her closed fist. You can start to open your brain, which will force your handler to drop the pebbles.

Called back

Wendy Hoffman

Reporter parts of survivors let perpetrators know, usually via a family member, if the survivors are remembering or telling secrets. Then the call-backs happen. Return to find out what people remember. Return to get revenge. Return because granddad is dying. Etcetera. When a survivor returns to her cult family, she will most likely be tortured with electroshock, raped, and reprogrammed to know nothing about her secret life. Her amnesic barriers will be repaired and resurrected.

Survivors remember going home merrily to celebrate birthdays, parents' anniversaries, siblings' graduations, marriages, funerals, major holidays—the usual. They returned to visit someone hospitalized. Some family ties remained, so they had to participate. Then comes the bitter realization that they remember the before and after but not the event they were called home for, perhaps a ritual, with torture, drugs, and commands. Perhaps one of the survivor's programs had started to slip. Perhaps the person did not act according to schedule. Perhaps they did not respond promptly enough to telephone calls and emails. All that was repaired through torturous mind control during these imposed "visits" and "reunions".

When I started my memory process, I compulsively went back to my childhood neighborhood, planning to talk to people who lived there to see whether they had seen or heard anything which could have led them to suspect I had been an abused child. I was unaware that I followed a "return home" program. In my childhood neighborhood, I underwent torture and my mind was re-erased by those still living there. What I would have given to have been warned. Even if I did not listen, I would have known someone on the outside world cared. I believe I would have listened. It would have saved decades of my life.

If you are a survivor, do not be taken in by either your family's apparently warm invitations or your inner urgings to go home. If your family is cult, just do not go.

What do you do if you are a therapist who follows the rules and your client wants to cancel sessions for a while and go home to the family she grew up in? This client does not know yet about programming to return home when you start having memories. And her front person feels excited about seeing the family again.

As a therapist, you do not want to suggest. If the trip home is successful by cult standards, she will remember nothing and stop treatment. There may or may not be a second chance for her to have therapy to help dismantle the mind control. You can take the conservative approach and ask how the client feels about seeing her family again, whether she has any misgivings, whether anyone inside has reported that she is in therapy and working on remembering and associating.

You can target questions so that they bypass the front person who knows nothing and goes straight to the inside parts. "How do you feel about returning home?" Maybe one of the inside parts will pop through the amnesiac barriers to answer truthfully and say "Do not." But maybe not. Then it may be the moment to switch aim and address the front person directly. Who cares about suggesting? This human being might never get another chance at freedom.

Speaking as a survivor, I think this is the moment to tell the front person about "return home" programming. You can say it gently. It does not have to be hit-over-the-head direct, though sometimes that is the only way front people hear necessary information. But information should be conveyed even if it will not be listened to. At least you tried. Maybe the victim will hear it a decade later.

Therapeutic rules were not designed for war, or for life and death situations. There's a time to be cautious and a time to be bold. This might be the only chance. There are more important issues than correct therapeutic procedure. Safety comes first.

Why and how survivors are gathered

Alison Miller

In the years since I have been treating survivors of mind control and ritual abuse, there has been a great flowering of resources for these survivors. Websites with discussion boards on which survivors can talk about their experiences, coping strategies, and attempts at healing; first-person accounts of being victimized; books promising cures; Facebook discussion groups; conferences for survivors; support networks; safe houses.

What do all these things mean? Are we to rejoice that so many resources exist? Or are we to be wary? I would say the latter. We have to worry about more than disinformation. Any venue that brings together survivors of these abuses brings them into contact with persons who are able to access their programming through pre-arranged signals or cues, and set off various kinds of programs. One of my earliest experiences with this occurred when a well-known survivor who has written books visited Vancouver, along with her rescuer, who may have been her handler. At this event, which hundreds of people attended, we were all asked to fill out the Dissociative Experiences Scale, and use a pseudonym as our identity. At the end of their talk, they read out a supposed list of the pseudonyms of people who should be concerned about their dissociation. My colleague and I realized that these were just strings of letters and numbers, probably intended to trigger programming, plus those people were asked to remain behind to receive further "help."

I had another such experience in the mid-1990s when a well-known ritual abuse expert came to our area, and all the therapists attended his talk. Mine was one of the British Columbia locations where he spoke. Stella Katz (the former cult programmer who contributed to my books) attended, and told me he was wearing a ring which indicated very high cult rank, a ring which she had seen only once before. A client of mine became a quivering little childish ball of fear, saying only that she had seen him before and he was bad and had hurt her. And I heard him in the hotel elevator humming the tune of a nursery rhyme that I knew to be a trigger to cause an internal "earthquake" in survivors' personality systems, thrusting those systems into chaos.

This man announced that we could tell whether our phones were being tapped by calling a certain number in California; if we got a busy signal, it meant our phones were tapped. Afterwards, one enterprising therapist from another town, where he had said the same thing, contacted the California telephone company and they traced that phone number to a locked office from where it gave a perpetual busy signal. Our then network of therapists cancelled the rest of his tour.

Conferences can be wonderful places where survivors can learn from one another and from helpful speakers. But they can also be places where survivors are accessed by perpetrator group members and re-abused, including survivors who were physically safe prior to the conference. Perpetrator attendees or speakers can use hand signals or trigger words or visual images like tarot cards or playing cards to bring out compliant parts and trigger programs. They can knock on hotel room doors at night with patterned knocks designed to get a child part or an unsafe roommate to open the door, and then enter and abuse the survivor.

Perhaps online discussion groups might be safer. But not necessarily. If members are permitted to share personal information with other members, that information can be reported to perpetrator groups. Members can invite others to stay with them for conferences, and bad things can happen during such visits. Even online, words can be used to trigger programming. I do not have much experience with many of these websites or discussion groups, but I have enough to have seen this in action. “Matriarchs” gather members under their wing, providing what the members believe to be support, but actually keeping those survivors in line through the use of words and phrases with double meanings. An article on one website for survivors pooh-poohs the idea that hand signals and other triggers are real and can have actual effects on survivors, suggesting that those who talk about this are spreading paranoia and can lead survivors to go crazy. Some articles on such websites are very helpful; others include coded messages reinforcing programming and disinformation.

I know that survivors are lonely for others who understand their suffering and their attempts to find freedom. Recovery is a lonely journey. But loneliness is better than continued abuse. Survivors, be careful.

Danger, DANGER

Wendy Hoffman

Like hospitals and therapists, some safe houses for survivors are safe and some are not. It is up to survivors to use as much good judgment and discernment as possible before taking refuge in a safe house.

When I was banished from Canada, I was about to go out on my own. A woman telephoned Alison, saying she and a colleague were driving through Victoria, and requested an interview with her. The couple said they had a ritually abused friend, and wanted help in how to support her and other survivors of such abuses. They had started an organization to help people in this field. Alison thought they seemed sincere, so she asked if I could have safe temporary housing with them while I looked for a place to live. I was not overjoyed, but Alison was excited. She did not want to see me drive out into the blue yonder alone. I felt she was over-confident, though I did not tell her this. Eventually, I decided to go to them, though I had never met them and Alison had only met them this once. Despite Alison's enthusiasm and my trust in her, I think I might have resisted this ominous offer had other programmers not broken into my house and given me instructions to contact this disguised woman and take up residence there while I looked for permanent housing, or they would murder

Alison. I wondered why I changed my mind so abruptly. It was not that I reconsidered. It was programming. Watch for swift changes of mind in yourself.

The only thing that bothered me from the beginning was that this was all so coincidental. Once, when I lived in New York City, I was excited about meeting someone new and told my then Israeli handler, whom I did not know, of course, was a handler. He asked how I had met this person. I told him just by lucky chance. He shook his head. That is how I learned that in this world of bad mind control, serendipity and good coincidences do not occur, only awful set-ups.

When I arrived at the small, compact home in a western city, I met the woman, who had read, underlined, and studied my first memoir. She was an emaciated, perfumed woman with long red dyed hair and lots of make-up, married to a tall and rather obedient accountant. She talked constantly, was warm and outgoing. I would not have been able to tell she is an enforcer and torturer.

The husband and her colleague, the other male who made the initial visit to Alison, were present. We talked for a while. Then—I'll call her Liz—Liz insisted she and I go out for dinner, though I was exhausted. Later, I went to sleep. In the earliest hours of morning, they woke me, dragged me onto the floor and began the routine torture and enforcing that would go on for the seven weeks I was in residence there. Most of their commands were never to be in therapy again, not ever to write again, not to remember the new torture-based mind control. And I did not for a long time. Once a week, they drugged me and took me to an office building downtown where I had programming in electroshock chairs in the basement of psychiatrists' offices. Their overseer came by at least once a week. He had access to my computerized black books, where most of my programming information is stored. People are walking around with it now in their cell phones.

This effusive, anorexic woman did not seem cult-like, and neither did her tight male partner in their organization, or her friendly but blank husband, or their one personable adult son. Their other son, however, did show signs.

I could not tell, Alison could not, a sharp administrator for one of the conferences on dissociation (whose antennae are always outstretched) could not tell. Much later, I remembered having seen this couple attend mind control survivors' conferences and reprogram people there. I believe they go on assignment to targeted survivors who are high up in the cult hierarchy, or healing well and have something to give back to survivors and the world. We were all duped, even though this mind control team is not particularly bright. The ramifications are just awful.

A long time ago, in the 1950s, a Nazi group stole and sequestered three of my thirteen original split infants. These current Nazi programmers had the information about where these parts of me were hidden internally. They knew how to call them out. If you have even one infant who has not been incorporated into the main healed mind, then perpetrators can build on that part. That is what happened to me.

Besides my caution of danger, danger, this is all I can suggest: Survivors have been trained in psychic awareness, some more, some less. Engage your far-sighted psychic vision. With your inner eyes, observe the exterior of the person under scrutiny. Now use your internal energy to cut through the surface. Do you bump into an ice block, a core of frozenness that is frightening and off-putting? Do you see a narcissism (a sense of self-importance) that goes way beyond ordinary-life narcissism? Do you see a confusion of mind? These perpetrators often think they are helping their victims have better lives. If you see such characteristics, stay away. Perhaps you just see that the outside and inside do not match. If you go deeper, you may find a severely wounded child. Do not let that distract you. You are not there to rescue this person, you are there to assess. Where there is ice, self-involvement, and confusion, there may be a perpetrator, no matter what the surface projects and no matter how hurt the person may be. Do not take any chances. A suspicion is sufficient for stopping the relationship.

In addition, do not trust coincidences. Chances are, they were planted and you were targeted.

Do not give over your mind to someone else, no matter how much that person desires to help you and is also an expert. It would be lovely not to have to make all these important decisions alone, but it is only you who knows what is best for you, mind control or not. Often, it is safest to be alone.

Danger lurks out there, especially as you restore your self.

Discarding the interventionist God

Alison Miller

The length of time Wendy was allowed to stay in Canada was coming to an end, and I was quite worried about her return to the USA. To my knowledge, she had not experienced any abuse during the year she had been in Canada, and she and I often speculated about why that might be. Of course, we did not know that some of her previous perpetrators had made several visits to her, pulling out a small group of parts she had not yet discovered. And they knew when she was going to have to leave.

When the American woman, "Liz," from the fairly new support organization, contacted me, I was happy to meet her, and in the back of my mind was the possibility that these "supporters" could help Wendy through her next move. When I met Liz and her rather taciturn business partner, they seemed rather naïve but genuinely concerned. They said they were Christians who wanted to help survivors, including a woman they named as their friend. The timing, and the fact that they came all the way from the city they lived in to my place in Victoria, should have made me suspicious, but they did not. I took a leap of faith and asked them about the possibility of their helping Wendy (whose name I did not yet give them, of course) in exchange for my helping them support their survivor friend and speaking at a conference they were organizing.

I had grown up with honest, thoughtful, kind and gentle parents, and in benign and encouraging schools, so despite working with survivors of horrendous abuses, my natural tendency was to expect people to be good and to be what they said they were. Plus, somewhere deep in my own soul was a longing for the interventionist God I had believed in for at least twenty years beginning at the age of fifteen.

Could that God have sent people just at the right time? Oh, what a wonderful happy ending that would be. Somehow, it did not occur to me that those people might indeed have been sent, but not by Him. Although I do not remember our conversations on this topic, Wendy tells me that I encouraged her to trust the people who had said they were willing to take her in, assuming she was just responding from an automatic tendency to distrust even well-meaning people. I did not know she was going against an instinct that might have kept her safe.

Do not trust your therapist too fully; he or she is only human. The reality that your therapist is a decent human being and can be relied upon to care about you does not mean that he or she knows everything, especially about the dangers in this world. I am deeply saddened by Wendy's further abuse at the hands of people who appeared kind. Therapists, like their clients, are affected by their own past experiences. Those like me who are not child abuse survivors can all too easily see the world with rose-colored glasses. Those who are survivors, especially of mind control and ritual abuse, can all too easily grasp at straws to find a faith that will sustain them as they gradually become aware of what horrendous things they have endured.

How do we make sense of it all? Here are some things most people believe:

1. Good and evil exist, and we make choices about them.
2. There is a God who is good and loving.
3. God is also all-powerful.
4. Horrible things happen.

Mind control and ritual abuse are atrocities, and, to those of us who know about them, there is no doubt that they happen, and on a much larger scale than I ever imagined. How can such things happen, if a loving God has power over everything? Trying to make sense of these things, people come up with beliefs, such as:

- Victims deserve what happens to them, because they are evil. The abuser groups pound this idea into their victims' heads from day one. I cannot accept that an infant whose hand is used to stab a drugged victim is evil, or that someone who chooses the lesser of two evils is, therefore, evil, when no good choice exists.
- Victims are being repaid by the law of karma for evil that they did in past lives. It is easy for a ritual abuse survivor to believe this about him or herself, and I have known survivors who believed it, in order to make God and the universe just. But what about the African babies who are born with HIV, or the millions of people who died in the Holocaust and other genocides? More people have endured these horrors in the past century than the number of human beings who inhabited the earth before them, so the numbers do not work, if suffering in this life is a penalty for misbehavior in a past life.
- God, in his love, sends ritual abuse as a special gift to purify the soul of victims. I actually heard this one spoken by a "Christian" survivor therapist at a conference, and I walked out. What kind of God would do this? Perhaps this speaker did not realize how horrendous these abuses are. Her God was not a loving one.

Ritualistic abusers tell a little child to pray and see whether God comes to help. Of course, God does not show up. Then they suggest she call on Satan, and of course, the man in the red suit appears. Now she knows that either God is not loving, or God regards her as not worth saving, or God is helpless, or God just does not care, or God does not exist. And history shows us that God just does not stick his finger in and prevent atrocities from happening, even though the victors in all wars say God helped them. (Bob Dylan wrote a great song about that—With God on our Side.)

The only way I can make sense of atrocities and still believe in a loving God is by accepting that God does not intervene in human affairs in any direct manner. I have to discard the interventionist God, and I have to resist being lured into hoping that God is intervening, and remember that "When something seems too good to be true, it probably is." Believing in an interventionist God is dangerous. It can lead to passivity rather than active resistance against evil, and waiting around for help rather than helping ourselves. It can also lead us to trust people who are not trustworthy.

My alternatives are: Believe there is no God, or believe in a God who does not intervene, not because s/he is unwilling, but because the universe just doesn't work that way. Atheists and agnostics can still make moral choices, and choose kindness over evil, like the doctor in Albert Camus's famous novel The Plague.

I choose to hope that there is a God who loves, and who suffers with those who suffer, as we therapists suffer with our clients, even though He does not directly intervene. It is not a certainty, only a hope, based on survivors' near-death experiences and my own inner sense of connecting to a compassion within the core of me which might be beyond myself.

When they persist in trying to murder you . . .

Wendy Hoffman

I do not think that I am the only one whom perpetrators hound, attempt to trigger, and pursue.

Alison tells me that they let several of her clients go even before she met them, so that she could work with them freely as long as they did not report back to their group. She says that they made a deal with another, something like "freedom for silence." But that has not happened to me. I would not agree to silence at any rate. If I had the opportunity to make a deal, I would refuse it.

They pursue people like me who want to give back to other survivors and help repair the world.

Their preferred method is to make homicide look like suicide. They come into your home while the world sleeps and call out vulnerable inside parts. An intruder pries open the victim's mouth and another spills a bottle of lethal pills down his or her throat. That is probably the most common method. Alison tells me that two of her first group of survivor clients reported this kind of attempt to her, and, in Healing the Unimaginable (Chapter One), she describes the probable murder of a third, who supposedly climbed out her eighth floor window though she was too fat and weak to do so. I, too, had an ex-client who jumped out of a high window after men dressed as firemen entered her apartment. People in that community think it was a homicide.

Or they can break into your home, slit your wrists and make it look like suicide. If you have made prior suicide attempts, this is a bonus for the perpetrators, because investigators are likely to assume your death is suicide rather than murder. Murderers will call out a suicidal part before the homicide occurs, so that the victim will not struggle or make a noise.

Alison also tells me that they used to sneak up on her clients, drug them by putting a rag over their faces from behind, and drag them into a van. She cautions me to stay clear of cars so that I am not dragged into one. In the vans, they usually only torture but may also murder. I have had men sneak up on me and shove a gun into my back, then threaten me using code words.

Some of their methods of homicide are more indirect. They can tamper with your car, or enlist one of their suicide soldiers to drive into your car. Or they can push you off a bridge, order you to jump off a bridge, shoot you as you take a pleasant, normal kind of walk in a park (one of their sniper soldiers can do that).

You might have lunch with a good “friend” whom you do not suspect yet. That friend may easily slip poison into your food when you go to the bathroom or even look away for a moment. I was taught how to do this at political parties. They can also substitute your medications for poisoned meds that look the same. They even contaminate supplements. They place two cyanide tablets on the top of your bottle of supplements or vitamins. Cyanide and other poisons can be fashioned to look the same as your usual pills.

I am telling you these methods so that you can be aware. It is frightening but so much safer to know. If you remain oblivious, you are more of a sitting duck. Your best defense is to know every part of your brain that has been separated and named through mind control.

Another injustice is that the perpetrators have your “black book” with almost complete information on the parts, their names, how to call them out, their purpose, ages, and triggers. And you only have your recovery process and possibly a safe therapist who will not know so much about your mind control as the readers of your “black book.” The more parts you have knowledge of, the safer you will be. You can take them out of where programmers told them to live and move them to a new and healthy living environment—all done internally though you might have to change your external location as well.

If you always hated the group and did not want to join them, they might be after you. Since it is so very difficult to know who is safe and whom to trust, it is probably better not to confide in anyone until you are sure of the person, and you may never be sure. If you are absolutely sure that someone is safe, and you can tolerate living with someone, that protection might make you safer. But mind-controlled people can never really be absolutely sure. There could still be some part in your brain that has not told what happened. So it is wise always to be suspicious. How did you meet this "safe" person? Is this person connected to anyone in your cult? Some people have safe and courageous friends. Most do not. I do have three non-survivor friends who are safe and courageous. However, I was accessed on one of their properties. They did not know, of course.

Make a list of all your known perpetrators. You can have a section for suspected perpetrators whom you do not have memories about (yet?). People in survivors' worlds are usually cult. Better to be wary than murdered or even tortured and re-programmed. This process is long enough without further difficulties. All this reprogramming takes time to unravel, time taken away from when you might have a real life. Healing is not only finding your parts one group after the other, but also disengaging from your monitors and programmers, one contact person after the other.

Expect a lot of triggering communication. At least one of your "friends" will monitor your location and emotional mood. That person will scan you for traces of straining at the leash and wanting to be free. If you disappear even for a weekend, expect emails asking where you are. Also expect requests for favors. Another "friend" may want you to drive her or him somewhere. That will be a set-up to get you to a specific location, where others may be waiting.

A long distance "friend" may request to visit you. Say no. The emails will have trigger words that pull out vulnerable parts inside you. Actually, expect constant harassment. Expect guns, and look for the parts inside you that obey when they see a gun pointed at them or pressed into them even in a public place where there is no likelihood that the person will actually shoot it. Expect the worst and stay safe. Do not become over-confident if you have months or years of peace and non-harassment. Eventually, they might check up on you. Some survivors feel guilty about endangering other people who are helping them. There is no doubt that this is a horrendously dangerous field.

However, you are giving non-cult people the opportunity to be more decent as human beings. There is more to life than making yourself as comfortable as possible and making your children's lives as cushy as possible.

Keep fighting the criminals who harass you, keep fighting even if the criminals are your family.

The proximity of death raises questions of whether life is worth it. People with easy lives will be happy to preach to you. It is your decision alone. One of the benefits of not dying is that you are then still fighting them. Our purpose in being alive is not only to eat chocolate cake but also to help others and to make the world more free of evil.

Spy school: clues we missed

Alison Miller

I have said before that this is psychologically sophisticated organized crime. It is sophisticated in the way its trainers or programmers subdivide a child's brain through torture and threats, so that they can make that child do what they want, including things that are completely contradictory to that child's nature. It is particularly sophisticated in its security. Victims, for the most part, do not know they are victims, and do not know what has happened to them. Their family and closest friends can be perpetrators, and they will not know it. A victim can be tortured one night and go to therapy the next day and not remember what happened during the night!

External security is also sophisticated. Perpetrator group members deliberately infiltrate the systems that are designed to protect the vulnerable. That means they are among the police, among hospital staff (particularly mental hospitals), among therapists (psychologists, social workers, counselors), among physicians (particularly psychiatrists), among staff of non-profit agencies. The fox is guarding the henhouse.

Most of us who work in these settings are unaware that some of our colleagues might be members of such a group. Some of those colleagues who are group members might be conscious of it; others might be used unwittingly, as Wendy was when working as a therapist, a story she tells in The Enslaved Queen (2014). This is one of the things I do not want to know, but there it is. Wendy did not want to know it either—but she was willing to know it, and I was willing to hear it.

How do you know whether a person is a member of a perpetrator group? He or she will not come up to you and announce it, unless you are a dissociative survivor and the group member can give a cue to switch you to a compliant part, whose experiences you will not remember later. As we wrote in some previous essays, we had the awful experience of Wendy being in the hands of perpetrators, and being unaware of it.

Over the years of dealing with survivors and with colleagues, I saw many little clues that someone might possibly be a perpetrator group member or, at least, a victim, but I did not put them together until later. Here are some of the clues I remember as I look back. No one of these clues means much on its own, like the symptoms on a checklist, but put together they might alert us to be a bit suspicious.

Knowing too much about mind control, or ritual abuse, or dissociation, or about abuser networks

If a person demonstrates knowledge about mind control, ritual abuse, dissociation, or abuser networks that he or she would not normally be expected to have, you need to be alert and cautious. How would that person have obtained that information? If it is possible without arousing that person's suspicion, ask how he or she knows that. Perhaps it is innocent, but perhaps the knowledge comes from inside experience.

Example: A local junior trainee therapist spoke up in a Mental Health Center staff meeting when we were discussing a teenage boy I was treating. She suggested he might have a dissociative disorder. At that time, nobody knew about dissociative disorders—so why did she? I later discovered she was a cult member (when a relative of hers approached me for therapy, and disclosed to me the therapist's involvement).

Example: I was looking for local therapists whom I could train in working with mind control survivors. Someone I knew suggested another therapist in her own support group who had read my Healing the Unimaginable and recommended it to her to help with a client she was treating. I accepted supervision of the therapist, who seemed keen, though she said she had never had a survivor client before. I sent her a high-functioning ritual abuse survivor client. The client emailed me a few months later saying she had quit seeing the therapist, who was repeatedly missing sessions or cancelling at the last minute. It might be that the therapist was herself an unknowing survivor. Why would she have read my book if she had never seen such a client?

Example: A supposedly healed survivor who had spoken at a conference told me that the conference organizer had invited her (and me, the previous year) to speak as "the draw," in order to get survivors to attend and be accessed and reprogrammed. I had never heard of this technique with regard to conferences. I later heard evidence that the "healed" survivor was herself a plant, an active perpetrator. As the old saying goes, "it takes one to know one."

Seeming to know too little about areas in which they claim expertise

Sometimes people "pad" their resumés to appear to know things they do not really know. In other cases, like the examples below, people know far more than they want to let on that they know. Cult insiders may want to appear ignorant of such matters.

Example: A detective who said he was developing a model for how to investigate ritual abuse cases presented a muddled plan which involved only very basic police work, suitable for finding a little backwoods cult, not a sophisticated network. I wondered why he seemed to know so little. Wendy later discovered the hard way that he was a perpetrator.

Example: His business partner, who worked with sexual abuse survivors, initially refused to believe me when I told her that someone she had recommended to help a survivor had actually abused the survivor. When I told her that the survivor had reported that the woman had sexually assaulted her, the person who worked with sexual assault cases appeared shocked because I mentioned sex. Why would this be shocking to someone in such a profession, or to anyone who knew anything at all about mind control and ritual abuse?

Too much forgetfulness

Many factors, including illness and fatigue, can contribute to forgetting. But when people frequently forget conversations and agreements they should have remembered, it can be a sign of dissociation. This does not mean they are part of a perpetrator group, but it raises the possibility that they have been victimized and might be used by such a group. Or that they are trying to deceive you. Or that they are perpetrators trying to deceive you.

Lack of compassion, operating from just intellect

Higher-up perpetrator-identified parts in victims have been trained to have no emotions, the emotions being held by hidden child parts. They simply speak and act as they have been told to do. If a person you know goes into such a state, it might indicate that such a part is operating. "Conscious" perpetrators might be this way, with occasional episodes of raging frenzy when the emotions break through. Wendy tells me that she remembers at least four different master programmers having meltdowns and psychotic breaks during programming sessions, starting with her grandfather, Max and Mengele.

Example: The local therapist trainee who turned out to be a cult member co-facilitated a therapy group for teenagers with me. The group was always very quiet, as the trainee therapist, who was the primary leader, seemed to follow a rigid plan rather than being flexible in responding to the members' needs. She felt to me as if she had a block of ice at her core, cold and unreachable. When she left the center and turned the group over to me, the members immediately bonded and began to open up with one another—but not until she was gone.

All four of the cult-involved therapists that Wendy went to before she found me fitted into this category. One treated everyone like a specimen, one was very judgmental and looked down on people, one was very self-righteous, and one was extremely self-centered. Wendy's front person saw glimpses of pleasure when they lied to her, frustrated her, or made her feel stupid. The one who was a cult programmer took particular delight in torturing and demeaning her.

Becoming rigidly attached to a certain approach; speaking in a manner as if reciting without tolerating interruption

People with brain damage, and people who are highly emotionally triggered, may do this. Some people in an emotional state can only think in a linear manner, and need to control the conversation in this way. However, some people doing this might be speaking from programming, using words they have memorized and have to speak in the order they heard them. Sometimes, such people are just victims rather than perpetrators. I have learned to use this clue to recognize when a survivor I am speaking with is speaking from programming rather than thinking independently. Persons who are part of perpetrator groups believe the lies the groups told them, and are likely to speak memorized lies.

Example: Two cult-involved therapists that Wendy went to were hyper-religious, putting forth their supposedly Christian religious beliefs in a very self-centered manner rather than tuning in to the client.

Twisting the truth about other people, accusing people you know are innocent of being perpetrators or plants

The community of those who attempt to help survivors is constantly suffering from splits as some accuse others of having nefarious motives. When I hear such things, I have learned to look at the accuser first rather than the accused.

Example: The supposedly healed survivor whom I mentioned under the first subheading above accused a number of other speakers at the conference where she had given a talk of being part of the perpetrator group. Some of those speakers are respected clinicians whom I know well enough to be quite sure they are not perpetrators, even though the fact that someone is a respected clinician does not guarantee he or she is not a perpetrator.

Example: A clinician I knew well went on sabbatical, and handed a survivor client over to another clinician at her workplace. Within a short time the client, backed by her new therapist, was making outrageous allegations against her former therapist, a person I know personally to be someone of great integrity. The collaboration with the new therapist, who would have no way of substantiating the allegations against her colleague, makes me more suspicious of the new therapist than of the client, who would be simply believing deceptions of the perpetrator group.

Example: Wendy had personal experience of several politicians being involved in mind control. One of Wendy's cult-involved therapists told Wendy's front person, disdainfully, that one politician was "the satanic pick," while saying that another, whom other parts of Wendy had seen at the Feast of the Beast, was a good man. In retrospect, it showed Wendy that the one accused by the therapist must be a less evil man.

Making accusations against one another to confuse you

Perpetrators who are in cahoots often pretend to dislike one another. They may accuse one another of being cult plants, thereby demonstrating their own apparent innocence. Do not be deceived by this. Remember that the fact that if someone accuses someone else of being a perpetrator, it does not mean that the accuser is not a perpetrator, even if the person accused is one.

Example: Wendy's cult-assigned boyfriend pretended he did not like the cult-assigned therapist with whom he worked as a team. Wendy's programmer therapist frequently said bad things to Wendy about her assistant programmers and her cult-assigned boyfriend.

Example: The "healed survivor" who spoke at the conference made accusations against everyone associated with that conference, not all of whom were innocent. The innocent and the guilty were put in the same package in her accusations.

Entitled, demanding, or demeaning behavior

In general, it is wise to watch out for people who want to use you for their own ends. This is even more true of "conscious" members of organized perpetrator groups. Such people tend to be narcissistic, to look down on survivors, and to need power. Wendy reports that all four of her cult-involved therapists were like this. If someone shows these characteristics, be suspicious. Be especially suspicious if they give orders that a survivor instantly obeys. Wendy, on the basis of her own experience, says: "When a survivor gets up and starts mindlessly following directions she doesn't want to, it is probably mind control. It would be fine to scream at the survivor, snap fingers in her face, shake her. Anything to bring her back to consciousness."

Example: When Wendy left Canada and stayed for seven weeks with the "helpful" woman I sent her to, she told me that she was doing all the woman's shopping, cooking, and housework and paying for all the food. I thought this was odd, but did not put two and two together. I assumed that Wendy must have offered to help out, and the woman had accepted her offer instead of asking her to pay rent. I knew that Wendy's mother had always had a cleaning lady, and, consequently, Wendy had always had one, too. Wendy herself did not catch on to what was happening, because of dissociation. The woman turned out to be a perpetrator, and Wendy's housework behavior, inconsistent with her nature and habits, was programmed obedience. I should have noticed.

Example: Wendy flew to another city to hear me present a day-long workshop for therapists. She and I returned on the same flight. I was to have a long layover in the airport where she was disembarking, and she told me that she would stay with me for a few hours before driving to her destination. The same woman in the previous example had Wendy's car, and Wendy was to call to be picked up. When we had been in the airport a very short time, the woman phoned Wendy and told her to come and be picked up immediately. Wendy obeyed instantly, though she grumbled to me. I was quite surprised. I assumed that she did not want to inconvenience the woman, who had apparently looked at the flight schedule, seen when the plane would arrive, and gone to the airport rather than waiting for Wendy's call. I did not recognize what Wendy's instant obedience indicated: that the woman was a handler and Wendy was headed not to a pleasant drive home but to a torture session. I did not stop her.

Over-friendliness, appearing to have too much in common with you, or flattering you

Even when you are not dealing with people involved in organized perpetrator groups, over-friendliness should raise questions. One woman in my housing complex has used little bags of chocolates on festive occasions, leaving them at people's doors with a nice little note. Why? She is a realtor and she wants our business. Although the rest of my new neighbors are reasonably friendly, they do not invite me into the center of their friendship groups. They continue with their existing friends, and I with mine. If someone does not, they are after something. If you are a mind control victim, or a therapist for victims, and someone tries to be your best buddy, ask yourself what they might want.

Since I am not dissociative, I cannot be accessed through hand signals or other triggers. I cannot be tortured and mind-controlled to forget it. However, I can be deceived. When someone within my network of therapists and survivors tries to get close to me, flatters me, or praises me too much, and echoes what I say rather than stating their own views, I wonder why they are trying to manipulate me. Although I do not mind well-deserved appreciation, flattery is something different; it means the person has an ulterior motive. The flattery may speak about something realistic, but its intent is to manipulate.

Example: A woman contacted me via LinkedIn. Although she had a different identity on LinkedIn, she named herself as a well-known internet blogger who helped break open knowledge about ritual abuse and mind control. The original blogger, whose work has frequently helped my understanding, disappeared several years ago and there is speculation regarding whether she is dead or in hiding. The woman claiming to be her was inviting me to view her new website, which purported to be a continuation of the original person's blog. I asked her a number of questions about her background and how she'd managed to keep safe all those years, and how she had originally been used by the major perpetrator group. Her creative answers about her background did not fit with what the original person had written several years ago. She appears to be an impersonator, which means the original blogger is probably dead, or no one would claim to be her, and the new website is probably one to be avoided, especially by survivors.

Example: A supposedly healed survivor dropped my name and misquoted me in a blog post on her website, saying "I was just chatting with Alison Miller," as if we were the best of buddies. The fact was that I had spoken with her by telephone for perhaps ten minutes, and we had never met in person. The rest of the blog post promoted an approach to healing with which I thoroughly disagree. I felt used, and put in a response to the post indicating that I had been misquoted. My response was erased, and I am now on that website on the list of services to be avoided.

Example: When Wendy moved to a new location, several women immediately became friends with her, inviting her into their circle and engaging in activities with her. From a distance, I marvelled at the way she was able to make friends so quickly, unlike me in my new location. It turns out that my neighbors are normal. Wendy's friendship group members turned out to be on assignment from you-know-whom.

Perpetrator groups assign friends, boyfriends, and girlfriends to survivors in order to control them. Wendy remembers a programmer telling her to get rid of a boyfriend, saying "You are not allowed to have a boyfriend unless we send him to you." When a survivor is alone and becoming rebellious, what could be better than a potential partner, sent with the right moves to become intimate with the lonely and isolated survivor and become his or her new handler?

Example: Wendy produced and performed the play INCEST: Remember & Tell, and suddenly an old boyfriend, the one assigned by the cult to be the "king" to her queen, appeared in her life. He wormed his way into her play, changing things to its detriment, ousting her from her television spots and usurping her audiences. He came into her life to silence her and to pull her followers away from her.

Unexpected rudeness

When someone who has become friendly with you suddenly attacks you or cuts you off, you are taken aback and understandably confused. It can indicate that the person's friendliness was actually acting, something perpetrators are pretty good at, and they have become tired of doing it. Survivors are likely to take this rejection personally rather than scrutinizing the other person's motives.

Example: Not too long after Wendy moved away from a recent group of torturers, the woman who had hosted her suddenly blocked her emails, presumably because she was tired of trying to maintain the superficial side of the relationship. She denied having done it.

Example: A woman in a poetry workshop whom Wendy thought was a new friend read Wendy's memoir and then told Wendy she should never have written such a thing and that she was full of darkness. This statement reinforced all Wendy's programming about being evil and being unacceptable to normal people. Wendy discovered some time later that this was actually not a normal person, but the head of a local coven.

Coincidental timing

When something happens just at the right time, it might not be divine providence, and it might not be a happy coincidence. It might be the result of planning on the part of perpetrators. When people come out of nowhere and seem to have a great deal in common with you, or to have just the expertise you need, be cautious.

Example: I wanted somewhere safe for Wendy to stay when she left here, and "support people" showed up just at the right time. I thought it was divine providence. It was not. They had formed this support organization in order to access survivors for no good purpose.

Example: A local therapist approached me to become one of the associates in my practice. Unlike my known associates, she expressed an interest in working with survivors of mind control and ritual abuse. Of course, I received many more such referrals than I could take, so I would be happy to find someone who was willing to take on the challenge of this work. I presented this woman's credentials to my existing associates. Fortunately, one of them knew a great deal about her history, information which was not on her resumé, enough to make me suspect that she might be at least a survivor of such abuses and possibly an active member of a perpetrator group. I did not accept her.

Some of these examples are from my own life, some from Wendy's. Each of these "little things" I wondered at, but I did not wonder hard enough. I did not want to be paranoid. I was brought up to think the best of other people. People who appear to be helpers, who are dedicated to caring for those who have been hurt—how could I be suspicious of them? But I should have been.

I recently said to Wendy, "I never went to spy school." And she replied, "This is spy school." Reader, welcome to spy school.

SECTION VI

THE SURVIVOR'S DAILY LIFE

Ask inside

Alison Miller

Survivors of criminal abuse including mind control can be triggered into unpleasant emotional states and false beliefs even when their programming is no longer operating. If you have not processed all your traumatic memories, you are vulnerable without realizing it to being influenced by emotions and beliefs from your inside parts, emotions and beliefs which belong to the parts' past experiences rather than to the present.

A survivor was functioning well in a challenging workplace for which she had been required to provide a Criminal Record Check from the police. This would have been a simple statement that she had no criminal record—that is, according to the police she had never committed a crime. She had managed it satisfactorily the first time, going to the police station and getting a sealed envelope from the front desk and giving it to her supervisor. But several years later, the supervisor approached her and told her that the workplace had lost her Criminal Record Check, and they would like her to provide another. She became really upset, and the supervisor tried to joke with her about how she must be hiding some criminal activity, which only made things worse. She became convinced that her supervisor was out to get her. She would not listen to me when I said that there was no risk here. She did, however, permit me to ask the insiders in her personality system whether there was any memory regarding police. And, of course, she had the usual anti-police programming: As a child she had been taken by cult people dressed as police to an apparent police station where she was locked in a cell, told she was a criminal, and abused, and told that if she ever talked to the police this is what would happen to her again. I explained to her internal leaders that this was a cult trick, and that the Criminal Record Check was simply a brief statement that she (as an adult) had never been arrested for any crime. It would simply be picking up an envelope, just as it had been previously.

A survivor client of mine had been clean and sober for many years, but had previously had a drinking problem. She reported to me, with great embarrassment and shame, that she was coming home from work and drinking because the stress of her workplace was too great. I attempted without success to deal with this by finding her healthy relaxing activities she could engage in when she got home. It did not help. So I asked her inner children. It turned out that the source of the problem had nothing to do with the workplace. The adult had been searching online for children's cartoons and films which her child parts could watch on her computer. Pornographic images (advertising) would flash on the screen and she would immediately turn them off. But children inside her had seen them. Little children who had been used in pornographic films. They saw the images, and saw she was looking for films, and thought they were about to be abused again. So they made her drink alcohol, because her main abuser had fed her alcohol to make her compliant while she was posed for the pictures. The alcohol made the filming bearable. Fifty years later, they were preparing for abuse that was never going to happen again. I explained to them that they were safe now, and then I explained to the adult front person what was triggering her drinking. She was very relieved that she was not an addict or an alcoholic after all, and she agreed not to surf on any websites she did not already know were entirely safe. She could have figured this out for herself if she had simply asked inside; she did not need me to do that for her.

If you are a survivor of organized abuse, and you start to develop anxiety, or overreactions, or an addiction, there is one important thing you can do: Ask inside. Ask your insiders, especially the children, what is bothering them. What mistaken beliefs or feelings, based on memories from the past, are causing the symptoms? Unless the cause is current abuse, you will be able to solve the problem by working together with your inside children. If the cause is current abuse, however, you have a more serious problem, but it is better to face up to it than to remain ignorant of it and continue to be abused without awareness. If it is current abuse, you need to work on a way to make it stop or to escape.

If you are a therapist, when you see symptoms in a dissociative person, it is important to focus on the person's internal dynamics rather than on the known external events of present-day life. For example, you might ask:

"May I speak with your insiders to find out whether something is bothering them?"

Front people often resist this: "No, it's just me, I've got plenty of problems." They are afraid of finding yet another terrifying memory that they would prefer not to learn about. You could respond:

"Inside kids often have reactions to things in your life, and their feelings may leak through to you. Just let me check, or maybe you'd rather ask them yourself."

Then you, or the client, checks with the insiders and the explanation is often pretty straightforward.

Asking inside is very important for all survivors, not just for solving problems like these but for managing daily life and for resolving your traumas. If you are a survivor, in order to heal well, you need to meet your insiders' needs. You can do this best if you ask them what they need. If you have a flashback or a nightmare, it is probably coming from some inner part who is stuck in that memory and does not know how things have changed. Your internal leaders can find that part and rescue him or her, update that part on present life and safety (if you are safe), and put that memory on the waiting list for processing. If you have physical pain, you can ask your insiders whether someone inside is in pain from a memory, or whether someone has been recently hurt, or whether the body is actually ill. You cannot figure these things out without talking with your insiders. This is why the perpetrators forbid your front person to communicate internally. This is why you must do what they do not want you to do.

Mind-controlled and frozen in time

Wendy Hoffman

Many survivors feel that the after effects of traumatic abuse dominate their lives. The majority of each survivor's life is spent in ordinary life, usually handled by the front person with relatively ordinary thoughts and feelings. Still, there are always dark flashes and strange sensations leaking from survivors' depths, especially if something in ordinary life happens to touch on what really happened.

Satanic rituals occur at most once a month normally. That is three to four hours taken up per month. Programming sessions take place during childhood once a week while the programmers are splitting the brain and inserting commands that they consider to be lifelong and that they want followed. Maintenance programming occurs far less frequently. Punishment tortures usually occur no more than once a month. Some groups just hold rituals seasonally. Some master-madmen like Mengele and Cameron hold all-night mind-control sessions, but those are rare. So, the actual time spent being tortured and/or mind-controlled is a small fraction of the total time you spend in ordinary life doing everyday actions. Yet, the impact of the monthly ritual and weekly mind-control session is almost constant in your life.

The terror does not get a chance to subside. At times, during ordinary life, you may not feel the terror, but it is there all the time, sizzling like a volcano waiting to erupt. Parts inside you experience heightened terror constantly.

There is more than a residue of powerlessness and defeat. Those feelings make up the backbone of the survivors' lives and do not easily abate. The anxiety is strong enough to move a mountain.

When non-traumatic events occur, they wash away in time and eventually are not recalled. But traumatic occurrences stick and freeze out the cleansing flow of time. They become cemented and cannot be budged or prodded out. They took up such a relatively small amount of time, yet consistently control the personalities and mind-set. They form your cognitions about life and prevent entering life fully. They wash over many of life's other experiences and form the negative self-concept.

Cult groups must feel quite threatened lately. If they are worried about one of their victims, they might hold torture sessions nightly. That is one of their innovations. It may hurt but not be more effective. Nightly sessions are usually held if the victim is under a form of house arrest, such as living in a perpetrator's home as a guest or prisoner, or with a roommate, parent, sibling, or child who is a trained perpetrator and torturer.

The mind-control designers knew the principle of the younger you are, the more intensely you feel. The rigidity and endurance of these emotions and beliefs go back to infancy, as do new programs and commands. The new ones are rooted in earlier programming that took place in infancy and childhood.

If the traumas of rituals and mind control have such potent and lasting impact, is there any way to lessen their blow? Can, for example, a smiley face become just the common smiley face and not a trigger to report back to a handler? Or can a playing card, say the Jack of clubs or spades flashed at you, not be read as a trigger to kill yourself or someone else? Can objects of day-to-day life lose their associations and become simply what they are and not loaded with perverse meaning?

If the front person and other parts do not know what the rest of the system has experienced and endured, the feelings from the traumatic life will remain alive though buried. As the system unearths what is held inside and understands how all those feelings and wounds got there, they will have the opportunity to be released and healed. But they have to be remembered and re-experienced, though very briefly. If they remain unknown and hidden, they will stay alive and untouched, unfortunately.

If the front person has become co-conscious or integrated with the rest of the system, those feelings and cognitions will begin their healing journey on their own. Inside parts are not oblivious. They can perceive when life has changed, when they are no longer victims, when they can touch freedom. How you feel behind bars and how you feel in a grassy meadow are different. The insiders will realize there is no reason to bring a barred prison onto a field of wild flowers. Reality can catch up with tortured insiders.

Even after you are free from the tortured intensity of keeping the trauma alive, even after you have accomplished considerable repairing of yourself, you might not feel the way other people feel. Why should you? Your life has not been like theirs and even if they want to try, they can never conceive of what your experiences were like. They can imagine the heart of evil but they do not know it. Some people will be kind to you, but you may still feel lonely. The loneliness will not have the intensity you used to feel because you are no longer composed of many tortured infants and children, some of whom lost the only person they thought loved them. You will probably spend time nurturing yourself. You have been through a great deal. Now is the time to go slowly, to rock yourself, to care for the chronic physical injuries, to step away from intensity and frozenness, to soothe and love yourself for who you have been and who you are. If the infant pieces inside you still need healing, sing lullabies to them.

It would be lovely to say that relationships will be good from now on and that life is sweet. But that is not realistic. Sometimes it is depressing for survivors to be with normal people, even kind ones. Many of them are relaxed within themselves and their bodies, love life, and have many pleasant memories that make up their being. They are even relaxed about their mistakes. They do not think they have to be perfect. And they have family relationships that have buoyed them up, even if they occasionally tear them down. Survivors, even healed ones, have strips of ice and rage within. They grew up under such intense conditions that normal recreational activities do not usually do it for them. They rarely have nurturing memories to fall back on and often prefer to be alone. Whoever you are, you are. Praise yourself for being you. Believe in yourself.

The strong and brave ones (previously known as the garbage kids)

Alison Miller

I have known for a long time that that many survivors of mind control and ritual abuse have insider parts called the garbage kids or expendables (or, in the UK, rubbish kids). They are to be found, naked and dirty and smelling of urine, in internal garbage dumps, usually with nasty things like insects and rotting flesh. These places in the inner world are copies of real-world places where these parts were dumped when they violated the abusers' rules by refusing to obey important commands. Several times I have assisted survivor clients in rescuing the garbage kids, cleaning them up, and giving them clothes and comfortable, warm internal places to live. But until recently I have not thought about the strengths of these insiders or the ways in which they can help with recovery.

Recently, a client's young insiders were telling me about a group of internal girls trapped under the floorboards of the internal copy of the primary abuser's living room, put there as a punishment for disobedience. I searched for insiders who were brave enough to get them out of the room where the internal copy of the abuser was asleep in a chair. The ones I was talking with said, "I'm not brave," "I'm weak," "She might catch me." I realized I needed some insiders who were strong and brave, and I thought of the garbage kids, who had been rescued (by self-created parts who lived in the trees) from an outdoor garbage dump. Like the girls under the boards, they were courageous and outspoken. We planned to ask the garbage kids to go where the obedient ones had not dared to go.

Another survivor client has been struggling with a bullying supervisor at work (in the real world). This boss intimidates her by micromanaging her work, and saying things like “Are you all right?” This brings out (just behind the front person) the little girls who feel afraid of bullies like their father, and the adult feels anxious and close to tears, although previously she was feeling all right.

The first thing we tried was enlisting the top soldiers in her now cooperative system to strengthen the front person. We were both surprised that this did not work, and we had to figure out why. These “tough guys” were actually, like anyone in the military, trained to obey orders instantly rather than to defy authority. They (or rather, the discarded parts from whom they had been split off) had been severely punished for any assertiveness or sign of insubordination. These seemingly strong leaders were, therefore, very vulnerable to the bullying supervisor, trying much too hard to follow orders even when the orders made no sense. Although they had given orders in the inside world, they had always obeyed in the outside world, and even though they did not show their emotions, they were dominated by fear.

So, we thought hard about who should be present with the adult front person in the workplace. And we thought of the garbage kids. These were the ones who had stood up to authority despite the punishment. They were willing to be assertive—which was exactly what was needed. They accompanied the adult to work for the next week. She found herself able to stand up to her supervisor, make a good argument when the supervisor was wrong, and resist intimidation. The supervisor’s bullying decreased as she realized the survivor was not going to react the way she wanted her to.

Find your garbage kids, and make good use of their strengths when you need the courage to stand up for yourself or what you believe is right.

Survivors and illness

Wendy Hoffman

Like everyone else in the world, survivors get sick. They get sick because of germs or viruses or diseases like cancer, or as reactions to their having been abused and tortured, or some combination of both.

When survivors become ill, they have to deal with the symptoms of the illness and all that these symptoms evoke. Body memories can creep into the experience of sickness. The body memories can derive from what happened a long time ago. The brain experiences what was done in the far distance as if it were happening in the present time. Survivors are, and have been, fairly regularly tortured. In their everyday life, they probably do not know about the physical abuses; otherwise they would immediately leave their areas and go into hiding. They stay because their parts who live ordinary lives do not know that the night before they were tortured almost to death.

When survivors have serious illnesses with agonizing symptoms, unconscious memories of the torture scenes may emerge. The real pain waltzes with the remembered pain and the agony becomes magnified. Unless the other parts of the brain are integrated with their front parts, the ill survivors will not know they are dealing with a mixture of real and recalled symptoms. One survivor's intestinal infection awoke parts who had always felt that way when they had been starved and purged in preparation for a ritual. Her parts turned on the “keep awake” program (made by poking her whenever she fell asleep) because they thought a ritual was imminent. This went on for weeks, and as a result her recovery from the illness was delayed.

Here are some danger spots for the sick survivor: If the memories start to become more real in a survivor’s conscious knowing, she might temporarily lose her will to live. In the middle of fighting a real illness, this development can be fatal.

Another complication is survivors’ hypersensitivity to chemical drugs. At least when I was an infant, perpetrators used to place babies on sheets doused in chemicals, to increase their misery and make sure they felt abandoned. Over the years, other, stronger chemicals are used to sedate or control them. Eventually, the victims may develop an intolerance to any kind of chemicals. The medicines doctors prescribe often produce rashes and other dangerous side effects.

Most doctors will not believe survivors’ pasts so it may not pay to tell them.

Some survivors might do better with holistic doctors. They can take the holistic medicine and not react to chemicals. Holistic doctors probably will not believe the stories either.

When survivors become ill, there is a potential for complications. Be armed with good self-care, a comfortable bed, lots of juices in the fridge, chicken soup in the freezer just in case, and the knowledge that you may have to fight to have a will to live. Do not do memory work until you are well, even though body memories are present. Put the narrative on hold for a while.

If you have support people in your life, allow them to help and comfort you. This is a time when you need help no matter how independent you may want to be and are.

However, this is when family usually moves in, even if you have separated from them and attempted to cut off contact. They are always looking for a way to get back in your life. Local informants and spies may tell them you are ill and vulnerable at present. This is a moment they might regain control of you, all in the guise of wanting to help their own. They will be destroying you as they look good to the world.

If possible, do not let handlers, programmers, informants, or “friends” know that you are ill or injured. If they find out, they will most likely use this time to insert other program and torture sessions into your life. They take advantage of weaknesses. They prey on vulnerabilities. They will use vulnerabilities that occur by chance and those that they create. Imitate animal behavior and hide the pain and weakness from them.

For example, when I was stung by an underground hive of yellow jackets and had an allergic reaction, my torturer immediately wanted to visit. I had not had contact with her for months prior to this mishap. At that time, I did not know she was a programmer and torturer and had been assigned to me. She is not a generous or helpful person, but she wanted access to my house. I told her I was too sick for company. She offered to stay in a motel and just visit with her husband for a few minutes. Fortunately, I said no. However, because I was ill, I could have used someone who was genuinely helpful to look after me.

If you do not have honest support people in your life, and you need help with basic activities like bringing in groceries, cooking, or walking your dog, consider hiring a home health aide. Be careful about where you get the recommendations from. An agency's referrals may be safer. I got a referral from a "friend" who turned out to be the leader of a coven where I live. I did not know that at the time. This particular home health aide was safe and good. Still, it is better to be cautious.

Medical doctors have tortured victims of these mind-control abuses. People with intelligence and medical abilities who are born into these groups are spotted through aptitude tests, sent to medical school, and become the cult doctors who torture and program. In the church I had been forced to attend, the cult-involved leaders sent a young lawyer to medical school, because they needed the services of a lawyer–doctor. Because of past abuse by doctors, victims are usually afraid of physicians and avoid medical treatment even when they need it. Sometimes, they delay treatment for too long. Most medical professionals are not cult people. Use your inner sense and judgment when attempting to find an honest doctor. Do not get a referral from anyone who might be cult involved.

Hospitals might present an even greater threat to recovery. Most of us were abused in hospitals at some time in our lives. Some hospitals have been taken over by cult personnel, others only partly. Some hospitals are clean and honest. When I lay semi-unconscious in a rural Delaware hospital recovering from a long-delayed surgery, my ex-boyfriend/handler entered with a woman who looked like me. Perhaps they thought I would be jealous of her, but I pitied her. These two had planned to murder me by placing poisons in the IV. He tortured me before she heard the nurse's footsteps coming down the hall that warned him. They fled uncaught. That is routine practice. It is no wonder we survivors avoid hospitals. Nonetheless, there are some safe ones and times when a hospital can save your life.

If/when you get a serious illness, stop all extraneous activity, even recovery work, and focus solely on self-care and becoming well again. Be careful of who surrounds you.

Life in the midst of cultists is hard enough when you are well and healthy. Reserve the tiny bit of strength you may have for keeping your illness secret from the enemy. Because your whole life is a war zone, you are equipped to handle the danger. Your life has been a rehearsal for recovering from illness.

Things will not last forever

Wendy Hoffman

I used to think that all bad or unpleasant things would last forever. This false belief filled me with chronic dread. If I had to go to a film I did not want to watch, I felt the experience would never end. At a noisy restaurant, the bad meal would be everlasting. Visits with people I did not like might never stop. Family vacations. Lectures. Anxiety and guilt could be constants. Physical pain, never ending.

After I achieved considerable recovery, when the belief in frozen ever-afterness evaporated, I had to consider why I had felt like that before.

Programmers create personalities that they say live in isolated containers. They teach the victims' minds to believe that lie, and they show a physical representation of the prison-containers to the child victims. Children do not know these parts and pieces were splintered off from the main brain, the mainland, through drugs, torture, isolation, and lies. They do not consciously know with their whole minds that these segregated parts have been made to falsely believe that they live in boxes, wells, freezers, caves, tubes, tunnels, cages, or other such holding containers. Sadistic programmers split off these parts when the body was young. Having no further life experience, these parts remain at that age for the rest of the body's lifespan or until they break out or are rescued. In the beginning of recovery, few personalities can become aware of themselves without outside help.

Many parts of the brain are frozen indefinitely. These sections live in a stasis. Consequently, the whole system absorbs the feeling of any one state becoming permanent, without interruption, without relief. Hence, the dread of life.

After recovery, one of the previously persistent attitudes that disappears is this boxed-in feeling that things last forever. As the barricades imposed on the mind fall away, the boxes and other containers open, personalities are released from their prisons, and attitudes naturally alter enormously. The brain parts realize they had been separated and imprisoned against their will. Released, they do fast growing and catching up and experience a multitude of emotions. They gradually mature from where they started, which may be younger than five, to the biological body's age. Consequently, this feeling of entrapment and the unpleasant sensation of stasis fall away.

In reality, things do not last forever. Balance replaces this dread. Dinners end. So do films, conversations, and relationships. Everything is in flux, just as the ancient Lucretius claimed. Like rivers, with highs and lows, floods and droughts, and balance. One summer, you cannot water your lawn. That fall, the rivers overflow. To see things as stasis is not to see reality. Even electroshock ends. And ignorance. And mind control. And torture.

You can be with people you do not particularly like and know it will end in an hour or two. You can endure a bad meal in a noisy restaurant for an hour and a half. Feelings pass. Some are unpleasant or even torturing, but they do not last a lifetime. Everything is fluid, always changing. Some emotions and relationships endure because you want them to, not because they seem inescapable. One sign of healing is knowing that lids have been raised and time is not stuck.

Even before recovery, beauty can impose relief to this unfortunate, bursting intensity. To be close to nature, feel the earth with your feet, see snow-covered mountains, and oceans. All this natural beauty can help dissolve the steel barriers between personalities and release the lids of their containers. Becoming whole is a life-long process that the experience of beauty encourages. Even in ugly, dirty, noisy cities, there are spots of beauty. I used to live in Manhattan. I walked to a park on the upper Westside and sat near its colorful, fragrant garden. I am sure that reprieve from the hardness of my life aided my memory process.

Rushed

Wendy Hoffman

I was late for my friend's New Year's lunch. My dog was taking too long outside and I only half remembered my friend's address. I began rushing. There was something about that rushed feeling that was startling and familiar.

I remembered. My legal father had what they now call poor impulse control. He seemed incapable of waiting for anything. He would rush my mother brutally if he wanted the family to go somewhere. Instead of helping in the house, he stood at the front door screaming, which seemed to make her go more slowly. Or if a car ahead of him went more slowly than he wanted, this father cursed loudly and called other drivers "one-eyed monkeys."

But there was worse—so much worse. Mind control is time-limited. You can only keep children in electroshock chairs for a finite amount of time. If the electroshocks are unlimited, children can die. If they die, what is the sense of mind controlling them? There's a feeling of pressure and impatience during mind control sessions:

- Deliver up a new piece of your mind to hold this program.
- Learn the cue.
- Memorize the trigger.

- We do not have all day.
- Hidden electroshock chairs are in high demand. Multitudes of unfortunate children need programming. They all need turns in the chairs. Hurry up and get programmed.
- Time is money.

It often takes a team to program one individual.

The faster the better. Going too slowly ups the intensity of the torture.

Even if these attitudes are not verbalized, they are felt. Victims feel them.

Victims have to give over possession of their minds and souls, and they have to do it quickly or else.

Another danger inherent in programming sessions is that programmers, even master ones or perhaps especially the master ones, can turn psychotic in a flash. If they become psychotic while working on a child, they can up the torture unbearably, maim, or murder the victim child. It is best for the children to finish the programming session as quickly as possible. And at the end, they sometimes get a treat. A tootsie roll in exchange for a brain.

When I felt rushed this afternoon, I thought of my legal father and the even more pernicious programming sessions—the bullying, sinister rushing and being forced to give up my mind. My mind.

I do puzzles online. The computer times how long you take to solve the jigsaw puzzle. I will not hurry. I will not be rushed. I do not care how long I take. It is not a race for me. Never again.

Mind control cults with high international aspirations test their child victims all the time. They give them multiple-choice questions. Time is one factor in how they are judged. They have to answer columns of questions as quickly as possible. They have to beat the other contestants, who might have been their friends. They have to go faster and faster.

Never again.

Then I remembered how impatient I used to be. If we were supposed to leave at a certain time, I had trouble waiting for dawdlers. I was impatient with people slow to catch on. That kind of icy impatience is programmed into certain cult roles. I became like the queen playing croquet in Alice in Wonderland, cold and bitchy. As I left these roles, I at last shed this imposed impatience and became more human.

SECTION VII

THE HEALING PROCESS

How to begin to console the inconsolable

Wendy Hoffman

There are not enough therapists to treat all the survivors who want to come out of slavery and who are screaming for help. Most therapists do not have a clue about what mind control entails. Some are afraid. Some of their partners, spouses, and children are too fearful. Many do not have the curiosity or the intelligence to read everything and educate themselves. Some do not want to learn by trial and error. Consequently, there is a dearth of competent therapists for this field.

So, except for the lucky few, we will have to find another way.

Alison wrote an excellent step-by-step guide to treating yourselves in the absence of a professional in her book, Becoming Yourself (2014).

Here are the two drawbacks among many to guard against as you plow through the morass of mind control on your own or even with a therapist:

1. Be aware all the time that you have been deceived. Question everything. Do not assume that because you think it, it is true. Your mind from infancy on has been filled with distortions and fantasy. Refine your sense of logic to help you ascertain what is real and what is yet another lie they fed you.

2. The most serious problem is that intense feelings of isolation will emerge as you work through your mind control and torture. When you were a baby and all alone in a family that was not allowed to love and had to hate, you lost your sense of attachment. You might have clung desperately to the desire to have a consoling adult caregiver but the script for children born into solid cult families is that there cannot be attachments and bonding.

These intense feelings of isolation and aloneness will be present throughout your self-recovery. Some of you will have the incredibly good luck to have found a partner or spouse who cares and knows how to listen. I wish we all had that kind of luck. We deserve it. Even a part-time friend could help. A therapist is often a part-time friend. Do not count on anyone else in the family seeking freedom, though it can occasionally happen.

You have to find a way to relieve these intense feelings of devastation even if you end up again alone with them. You need an internal system to help alleviate the intensity.

Perhaps some empathetic, loving inner parts could come forward to mother, rock, nurture, and feed. These feelings will usually reside in infants with no understanding of why adults act cruelly. Hold these infants' hearts in your motherly hands, tell them that they are good babies, that they are not to blame. The infants and small children cannot understand the concept of lying and deceit. Their minds cannot yet take in abstractions.

If you are loved, you feel lovable. If you are despised and rejected and tortured, you feel like a rag.

Love these inner infants who hold your desolation. You are lovable. They are lovable.

Online support groups can help break some of the isolation, but these feelings of aloneness are often too intense even to put into words.

If you do not see the same benign people at work or school every week, try to join a weekly in-person group and sit with the familiar people. The group does not have to be a mind control and ritual abuse recovery group. In fact, it is probably safer if it is not. Its regularity can interrupt isolation.

If you have a pet, stay close to that animal. Feel its pulse of life in your hands. That should help.

Eat the comfort food you need, unless you have a medical condition that says you should not. In general, this is not the time to worry about your weight.

Once you integrate, the whole system can hold the devastation of loneliness and its intensity will lessen. Each part in you has to release the treacherous feelings. Then, as the intensity lessens, you will want to isolate less. The rest of your life does not have to be spent in this aloneness. Even if you live for only a few more years, it is worth doing the work and getting a taste of what life was designed to be. If you are pursued and still not safe, it is better to isolate yourself until you are 100% sure someone is safe.

These most devastating feelings are usually found underneath rage. First, infants are angry, then sad. Unless we work hard to find these infant experiences, we may remain trapped in them. Even people who were never abused have this pattern of falling back on young emotions. At any age, it is wise to find all of yourself.

The body remembers

Wendy Hoffman

If you are dissociative and know it because someone you trust told you, how do you get back to remembering what happened to make you that way?

Catch the flashes of reality that intrude into your consciousness while you do mindless activities; do spontaneous art work that does not care about technique; hold onto your dreams and work on understanding them, especially nightmares; listen to your body. It talks. It informs you. It knows. If you lived with family more violent than conniving killer dogs, your body will have that information. The body has a direct route to the brain. The brain can open and tell. It can overcome its capture.

Have you chronic pain? Suppose your left arm aches from time to time, not always. If you concentrate your energy on that arm and ask the many parts inside you who know about this pain, some might come out and tell. Try to gather everyone together who knows something about this ache, if it is possible. This one body ailment can open the door to a universe of memory. You may be, in your memory process, plunged into a ritual site, see an altar. You may be holding a sacrificial sword. Someone robed may be forcing you to murder. If you have a memory like this, it will be one among many. But you are there, in the middle of this scene. It would not have opened had you not wanted it to and been ready. It can never be pleasant. It is the road to freedom—freedom that you never had but craved.

Some survivors may have noticed that their head shakes periodically for no apparent reason. It just bobs up and down on your neck as if controlled by an outside force. In some instances, there is no medical explanation for this phenomenon. It is memories of electroshock. If survivors can follow their jerking heads to their root cause, being shocked with electricity probably throughout their lives to date, they will find themselves in the heart of mind control. Once they have memories of being stripped naked and a helmet placed on them, strapped into electroshock chairs, drugged, then they can recapture the commands and programs that until now have ruled their lives. The body can lead the closed-down mind to a chance at life.

I had black and blue marks of various sizes along my spine. The largest was the size of a tablespoon, the smallest a teaspoon. During a massage in the 1990s, a physical therapist asked what had caused them. I told this hardworking, innocent Swiss woman they were from needles going into my vertebrae during mind control procedures from infancy on. She had asked and I told. She became so panicky that she went for supervision. Unfortunately, her supervisor was a cult plant. There went my confidentiality, right out the window. Over two decades later, I finally found a safe, knowledgeable, tough therapist. I told Alison about my bad experience with the physical therapist and wanted to show her my bruised back. I lifted my shirt.

"They're not there," she said with a flat voice.

"Yes, they are," I said and pointed insistently to where they once were last time I looked, maybe last year.

"They're not there," she said. I rushed to the bathroom mirror and strained my neck to turn. I did not see them either. "They vanished. Why? I had them for seventy years."

"Because they're not needed anymore. You already remembered."

Do not ever underestimate the power of the brain and its marionette, the body. The body will shoot up physical pain, it will knock hard and repeatedly against your conscious awareness until you acknowledge it. When you get to the facts it conveys, when you work it through and out, it will leave you and take with it all the breadcrumbs it has left in its path to your knowledge. You will then have peace in this particular area. If weeks, months, or years later, the pain or marks or emotions return, it means there is more to the memory, another piece to work through and dissolve. Recovery requires endurance.

A question that haunts most survivors in recovery is how to tell the difference between a body memory and a real medical illness. In general, body memories come and go and medical illnesses are steady. However, some medical illnesses assert and withdraw and are not constant. Toothaches can be inconstant, earaches, stomachaches, even headaches. So constancy is not an infallible determination. Time sometimes tells. If you focus on what is underneath a pain, often the answer becomes clear. Or you can get a check-up from your doctor, if that is not too traumatic. Sensitivity to your body, which allows it to defrost, and willingness to follow the pain wherever it leads, will often take you to the doorstep of truth.

Bodily pain can also indicate recent abuse. If the doctors are not finding an illness, and your inside parts are not coming up with memories to match the pain, you might need to look for hidden parts who hold the awareness of current harassment and abuse.

Flashbacks also torment people. Those who suffer from PTSD symptoms can befriend their haunting flashbacks, which follow them like a hired detective, and make a pact with them. They can be reconsidered and thought of as a road to knowledge. Thank you, flashbacks, for making me deal with this. They are like panic attacks and body memories, not arbitrary, not from nowhere. They come as direct messengers to tell you what happened to you and what is not yet consciously known or resolved. They are the key to the lost selves. Go after them.

Ten keys to recovery*

Alison Miller

1. Acknowledge your multiplicity. Mind control is entirely based on splitting the mind in infancy. All survivors have inner parts who were trained, whether or not they are aware of these parts.
2. Communicate internally. Think to your insiders and listen to their responses. Insiders, talk to one another to discover how each of you was deceived.
3. The inner parts the abusers placed in charge of the personality system need to take the lead in working towards recovery, along with any self-created strong parts. Let the front person manage everyday life while the rest of the system works on recovery.
4. Improve your inner world. Get children out of the internal copies of places where they were abused. Give insiders new jobs to replace their old ones. Make sure your internal government cares for the needs of all parts.
5. Recovery begins with finding a way to become physically safe. Dismantle your access programming: the training to report to abusers, return to them, and come when they call you.

* This chapter was presented at the 2015 Survivorship Conference, and is in the online journal Survivorship, Fall 2015.

6. All programming is based on the BIG LIE, which is that the abusers know where you are and what you say and/or think at all times. Let your whole personality system know that the BIG LIE is a lie. The abusers only know what you do or say or think if your reporter parts tell them or if someone you know tells on you.
7. Choose a safe therapist. Willingness to learn may be more important in a therapist than knowledge.
8. Once you are safe enough, you can begin the memory work which thoroughly undoes the programming.
9. You can choose whether to work through all your traumatic memories, or just achieve stability. Which you choose may depend on your age and health and present-day real-world responsibilities. Closed down and stable are not the same as healed; closed down people have hidden hurt children inside. But full healing takes a long time and works best with a skilled therapist.
10. Integration and co-consciousness come naturally as a result of memory work; do not focus on them. Allow inside parts to join as they are ready.

The nobility of survivors

Wendy Hoffman

There are levels of being in survivors, all put in by their enemies. First, their perpetrators empty them out so that they become distant from who they are. Programmers build an amnesic wall around the original self in an attempt to make the self's disappearance permanent. Then they layer in the many functions they want their newly created commodity to perform. They may create, for example, an assassin, mule, prostitute, pornography star, breeder, thief, soldier, cult therapist, and so on.

Eventually, nowadays, some survivors gravitate to therapy to try to find out who they really are and what their lives have contained. Some are fortunate enough to end up with safe therapists not employed and trained by the groups they are attempting to escape. Those receive help.

Some of the professional experts in the field are also writers and write about their clients' experiences and personalities. They describe children used in pedophiles' parties, their clients' rage, broken lives, being institutionalized. They describe lives directed by others' commands where survivors become like ping-pong balls—battered here, sent here, sent there, told to do this—all without a will of their own.

What is sometimes, not always, missed is why some survivors agree to be mindless in the first place. Yes, there are amnesic barriers preventing them from knowing what they are being forced to do and what they never consciously would do. But there must be something else.

Not all, but many, therapist–writers miss the original threat and decision. What is it originally that makes it almost impossible to escape?

Ironically, it is integrity. Integrity leads one into the most dismal of lives.

For instance, perpetrators tell their victims that someone they love will be murdered or have a limb or limbs amputated unless they comply. The children with compassion are willing to sacrifice themselves to save others. Survivors are not just marionettes performing criminal secret functions. They are also self-sacrificing heroes trying to protect others. The people they attempt to save might have even been cruel and destructive to them. Perpetrators tell children that a universal bomb will go off unless they follow hideous orders. They said that even before the age of terrorism. And it is not all about nepotism. Survivors still thinking as children also attempt to protect strangers. They care about a world that has abandoned them.

Where does this charitable sweetness come from? Children are innocent, think they cause everything to happen, want power, importance, and recognition, and for everything to be nice and safe. Adult survivors have children inside, frozen in their ages and development.

It is unlikely that perpetrator threats would be carried out. If they were, these secret cults would be eliminating so many people, there would have to be investigations and common knowledge. That is the last thing they want. The legal and police forces could never accommodate such massive investigations. Moreover, the people they are threatening to murder are often the people they think they own, the people they control and have invested effort and money in creating. They are not necessarily the people they want eliminated. Perpetrators depend on their victims remaining in states of immature thinking so that they cannot think things through realistically.

When working with survivors, as a professional or a support person, or simply as someone who cares, it is important to dig deeper into the original decisions and choices. The excavations have to go into the areas of the original selves where the heart of the child lives. They say children are cruel, but not these children. They do not start out that way. These children know compassion and self-sacrifice. They care about others even more than they care about themselves. Although they have never been protected, they protect others.

One advantage of living into adulthood is that you get the opportunity to think in life as an adult and not stay trapped in child-think. Some are able to break free of that limited capacity. Usually with help, their minds can catch up with their biological age.

As adults, you can reverse the choices of childhood. Even as you rethink early and unconscious decisions, you become aware of the integrity of your early responses. You have to respect yourself for that.

The investigations into lost selves have to plow down deeper into the inherent nobility of survivors' choices. It is unfortunate that nobility leads survivors into destruction. As adults, however, all that can be reversed while integrity and nobility are maintained. Look at the integrity working through these layers of imposed deceit requires.

How many people sacrifice their own lives to protect someone else? Yes, it was all most likely a response to a lie, but children have no way of knowing that. Only in adulthood can you figure it out. How many people care so much about other human beings as children do?

After integration, the naïve sweetness of the child mind dissolves and you become more self-protective. The new nobility becomes understanding the awful ordering of your inside parts and acknowledges yourself. You realize that it does not pay to sacrifice yourself for people commissioned to destroy you, even if this commission is against their will.

Self-esteem loosens mind control*

Wendy Hoffman

People who have had fairly normal lives do not know the kinds of emotions survivors experience. The intensity of these feelings separates us with the most dense barricade from normal people, that is, those who have not been mind-controlled and who have not attended homicidal rituals. The human being was not built to sustain such feelings, and these feelings have associated strong false beliefs about ourselves.

Here are some examples of the kinds of beliefs and associated feelings I am addressing.

- Guilt: I am responsible for babies' and children's deaths.
- I am worthless, stupid, ugly, taking up room on earth for nothing but myself.
- I am a blight on the earth. My evil spreads everywhere and contaminates and infects everyone.
- I am nothing. It is my fault that . . .

---

* A version of this essay was presented at the Survivorship Ritual Abuse and Child Abuse 2016 Conference "Stop Mind Control and Programs", in Oakland, CA.

- I must be bad or my mother (or father) would love me.
- If I ever make a mistake, it proves that I am a bad person.
- I am ashamed of myself. I feel flooded with shame.

Along with these feelings are orders about the world and mind-controlled behaviors programmed into us by the cult, such as:

- You are not allowed to bond.
- You belong to us [meaning to your programmers and family].
- Do not run—you cannot run away from us and your programmers.
- We will find you wherever you go.
- You will never be free.
- We know what you think and say, etc.
- Everyone will always hate you; you will never have friends.
- You are so different that you will never fit in, you will always be an outcast.

Your controllers employ all the above lies and others, as well as these kinds of twisted statements to make you feel bad about yourself:

- We had to kill him or her because you loved him or her.
- Your mother is unhappy because you are ugly. (Then they will program the mother to be depressed and perhaps stay in bed all day.)
- You have to be a sex slave because you are not good for anything else.
- One parent at best will not love you.
- You are stupid, that is why you cannot learn in school. (Programmers put in the learning disabilities.)
- If you were good, your mother would love you. Your mother loves your brother or sister.

Survivors go into therapy expecting to find out horrible things about themselves. They are sure on some deep level that they are bad, evil people. That is what they have been taught from earliest childhood. An effective way of loosening this mind control is to more accurately access who you are in reality.

Re-evaluating yourself is crucial. You have to learn to love yourself. You have to be committed to such unlearning and learning. We were taught we were bad, to blame, that we wanted crime and evil, that we were ugly and loathsome. All those statements are lies. As you process your memories, possibly in therapy, you will see how you were controlled and forced to do what they make you do.

You are not an evil witch or wizard. You are an innocent victim. You will discover actions and feelings that you are not proud of, but you did not start out evil. You were forced and coerced into doing what they wanted you to do, for their own gain, not yours. Recovery allows you to break free of that mold. We all regret what was done to us and what we consequently became. But now is the time to change all that. Now is the time to become your self. It is time to ask "Who am I?" without the mind control.

Who are you?

The two bad things that dent even normal people's minds and souls are rejection and abandonment. The first thing perpetrators do for some is create abandonment while you are still in the womb. Once born, abandonment and rejection are practiced routinely. Abuse and group abuse occur throughout childhood. Parents deliver and abandon the child. This emotional terrain makes mind control and programming easy for the perpetrators. They want to make you feel like a nothing. They need that horrible or non-existent self-esteem for the mind control to work.

Also, the mind has to be young and vulnerable. As soon as it forms into a cohesive whole, programs are much harder to put in. Even torture cannot put them in. That is why these cults maintain members in every generation. You have to give over your children because they need them to learn to do their assigned criminal acts and be robots. Can you call mindless robots who have no memory or judgment criminals? Mind control festers within children who have been abandoned and rejected.

Nothing is more crucial than, or a substitute for, working through the programs and hierarchy of inside parts and the braiding and offshoots of parts. But if you work through all that mind control but not on the emotional terrain and the concept of self-esteem, you end up like a dry drunk. You have overcome the addiction but not developed as a full human being. You have not then caught up with the life that was taken from you. The self-esteem piece comes in before, during, and after the hard main work of working through the mind control. The self-esteem piece entails thinking boldly. It is not easy to break through amnesic barriers, but it is a pleasure to see them dissolve.

Moreover, whether you can work your way through a complicated maze of dissociation depends on your self-esteem. As different sequestered parts in you begin to speak and you begin finally to listen, you will hear strange things coming out of your mouth.

The question is whether to believe. Where is the information coming from? Is it coming directly from a part created through mind control? Ask whether the part is repeating what it is supposed to say. Tell that part it no longer has to do that. If it is not repeating, you might want to believe what that part says, no matter how unpleasant and contrary to the image of your front person.

Whether you can believe what is not programmed and comes out of your mouth depends on your belief in yourself—on your self-esteem. It depends on your commitment to healing yourself. So many survivors spend a great deal of therapy time—years and decades—deliberating whether or not to believe their insiders.

Sometimes, parts will have wrong ideas or lies that controllers placed in them. When you and the parts and pieces of you finally communicate, you can help them see that they have been living under the impact of untruths. Examples would be that the programmers and handlers can hear and know everything they think and say, that they have to tell if they change addresses, that someone they love will be killed if they disobey. When you bump into one of these programs, it is an opportunity to trace it to its origin. Follow the thread of parts to the training session where a new piece of you was created and given instructions on how to behave, act, think, believe, and forget. Every lie you discover that you have believed is an opportunity to delve into how they molded you.

If you want freedom to be who you are, it is crucial to listen to the insiders who alone know what your life has been. Each insider has a piece of reality. All the pieces have to be put together if you want full healing. You have to find the hidden pieces, the parts the programmers hid so that a full healing could never take place. But you can find them. Inside parts will lead you to their hiding places. Or they will be uncovered in time as other parts that hid them move away and their hiding places are exposed. From the outside or front person, you cannot figure out your life. You have to listen to those who experienced it. Whether to believe what they say depends on the strength of your belief in yourself.

At first, my insiders would not talk to me. I was already sixty-nine years old. I started writing to them and they wrote back. A short time later, they began to form words in my head and I could say or think words back to them. Then I asked questions and they answered. I could hardly believe the answers, but my recovery had begun. It all depended on the communication between the outside and inside me's. I remember the first time I spoke with Alison on the phone from opposite sides of two countries. She asked my insiders questions. They did not answer and the rest of me did not know. She asked again in another way. No answer or "I do not know." And again. She suggested I write down an answer. They wrote using my hand. Then I wrote questions. They wrote answers. As the days went on, we began to talk to one another and, awake and asleep, we began to think to one another. This dialogue is essential if you want to get to know your insiders. Your outside is important for reaching in and, of course, for keeping your ordinary life going. Can you imagine—most people in the world only have to deal with ordinary life. But not us. For us, the meat and juice are inside of us. I believe what my insiders say happened. The feelings and physical sensations my body experiences confirm these experiences no matter how awful they are to endure.

If you are suddenly in pain week after week, you might be being beaten up regularly. It pays to ask inside about that. If you are chronically ill, it pays to ask inside whether you have programming to be ill and incapacitated. That is how they slow many truth-seekers down.

The first step in becoming who you are is to believe in yourself. This will go against every bit of programming you ever had—programming to do things you would never choose to do and will feel ashamed of. Programmers make you think you deserve nothing from life and are only a marionette on a tight string, a means for others to get what they desire. They believe they have made you into a slave and servant exclusively. You are not who they made you think you are. You are good and worthwhile. You deserve to live and to be in the place on earth where you reside. If you are currently being accessed, you deserve to move far away from your perpetrators. You deserve the food you eat and the water you drink. You deserve.

You deserve to be you. You deserve to belong to yourself. You are yourself and yours alone—for better or worse and in recovery and freedom. You are worthwhile and essential.

Search your life for love. Did you have a friend who was kind? Was a sibling ever protective, appreciative? Did anyone ever acknowledge you—a teacher perhaps? If you cannot find anything but hatred, then look somewhere else. Were your parents ever reasonable or friendly, generous? If you still cannot find anything, then go into yourself. Were you ever good to yourself? If not, you can start now and this will be the foundation of learning about love. You are leaving the world of hatred and entering the realm of love: gentle, encouraging, respectful, caring. Memorize how it feels. People care about you. You care about you. Kindness to the self unhinges the mind control within the brain. You are not a bad person. Once the belief that you are a bad human being leaves, you are en route to dismantling mind control. Its foundation is self-hatred and the belief that you are unlovable. Those lies can be exposed. You are a worthwhile, moral human being who deserves to be alive and do good in the world. You are not a robot. You are not an automaton.

Here is an exercise: Take something about yourself that you do not appreciate and decide to love it—your nose, legs, hair, disposition, jealousy, anger, handwriting. Work on seeing its beauty, work on seeing it in a new light. This is just a preliminary exercise to help you re-evaluate yourself and give up what your programming wants you to believe about yourself. It is a step toward saying goodbye to self-hatred, false ideas, and lies.

List what you deserve in life, such as love, comfort, praise, encouragement. Now you are changing the self-esteem from the front person inward. It is the children within you who are convinced they are bad. But when the front people change their beliefs, it affects the whole internal system. It is like water coming through a hole in the roof and bathing the interior. Soon, even the self-hating small children can learn about self-love.

When you are in a tortured, unloved state, you will believe what you would not otherwise believe. Mind control begins on the innocent, the ones too small to think through the lies and preposterous statements, the visuals, and torture.

Here is another issue: Small internal children cannot understand tricks and lies. Their minds are not formed enough to understand manipulation. This is one reason why integration is necessary. When I reached these young parts, they could not understand all the visual and aural tricks my relatives and programmers played on me. They grappled and struggled with this dilemma but no matter how hard they tried, they just could not get it. They are bright children, but it was beyond them. The internal adults tried to explain the lies. No dice. When these darling, hard-working children eventually fused with older parts, their distress ended. Too much had been expected of them. Inside, they finally got to play games and do puzzles and read children's books, even after they fused. I still go to the library and take out children's books at least once a month. But the inside adults do the thinking. The child parts were subsumed into adulthood and in adulthood people can understand lies and tricks and evil and monstrosities. Adults might not have a strong stomach, but they can understand.

Once you understand the lies you live your life by, you can change. You can give up so much, including, and perhaps most importantly, how you feel about yourself. Forgiveness starts with the self. You can forgive yourself for what other people did to you. After integration, there might be a life review of things and actions you regret. This life review gives you the opportunity to forgive yourself for not being yourself, for not being a whole person capable of making wise decisions and treating others with utmost respect. You can forgive yourself for your past and how it shaped how you were in life. And now you can change.

When you finally get into recovery and after recovery, you look back on your life lived as a non-self. The sooner you start dismantling your programming, the fewer years you will have to regret having lived as a robot, slave, and non-self.

We manage, but it is hard to live with no true self. It is a testament to our endurance that we are alive. We now deserve the reward of finding out who we are. When I finally asked myself who I am for real, I discovered that I had been sent to, and temporarily submitted to, five planted therapists.

Much of what I thought I did on my own initiative was programmed in.

I had to look back on a life without choice.

But then someone, or ones in you, make the big decision and the earlier the better, but best at any time—just not never.

Start by distinguishing between programming and how you really feel about yourselves.

If you can, find a therapist who does not think the worst of you, who does not look down on you. Planted therapists will usually give some hint that they look down on you.

Ask your emotions "Who are you?"

Your emotions might answer that they are not allowed to have feelings, that no crying is allowed, that you cannot feel good about yourself. It is just about impossible to get over these traumatic feelings without doing something to release them, such as crying. Your programmers know that. When you start to cry, you have started to heal. For some, try crying instead of cutting yourself.

Programmers observe and figure out what is particularly repulsive to you and make you believe that about yourself. They want you to think the worst about yourself and it will not be true.

Once your self-esteem improves, your mind control will start to dismantle and dissolve and you will see changes in yourself. You will not be sent out to perform criminal deeds. You may start remembering what they wanted you to do. Those are the enormous changes. There are more subtle ones that affect your daily life. Before, every little mistake or flaw you perceived as large and interpreted as an indictment against yourself. With better self-esteem, you will see those mistakes as little mistakes and no big deal. They are highly correctable. Simply mistakes.

Once your self-esteem improves, you begin to parent yourself and take yourself through developmental stages. You become your own mother and father, the ones most of us never had.

If you have poor self-esteem, you care too much about what other people think of you. You were trained to do whatever your programmer and handler command. You are used to putting too much emphasis on another's opinion. With low self-esteem, you look hungrily at other people to determine who you are. As you get to know yourself, and all there is in you, you gain respect for yourself and begin to trust yourself. You are the ultimate authority on yourself. You do not have to ask other people's opinion about yourself. Once you believe in yourself, everything changes. You are no longer devastated if jerks do not like you or your work. If you are rejected, it does not crush you. You stand by yourself. No one can manage your life anymore. You become self-sufficient. You give up being family-hungry.

You will be able to tolerate change. No matter what you do, change will happen in your life. It happens in everyone's life. With low self-esteem, change can create a resistant paralysis in you. You will not be sure you can handle it. With improved self-esteem, you have the confidence to go with the flow and adapt to what you need to adapt to.

In addition to unraveling mind control and improving your self-esteem, here are more ways to encourage healing.

Take more moments enjoying hot water warming your back in the shower.

Savor fruit the way food was supposed to taste before chemicals and modern farming methods.

Find yourself seconds of pure, untampered-with pleasure. The skin's pleasures have been contaminated and corrupted all during your mind-controlled life. Now it is time to teach your skin what it means to be skin. The pleasure principle helps you find yourself. Enjoy a breeze, which can be better than a lover.

The breeze—where it coats your body with such gentleness, concern, and languor—brings you to the edge of life, makes you whole, offers you a fountain to drink from that belongs to everyone and no mind controller could ever take that away.

To shed the slave mentality, say:

I deserve . . .

I am . . . [and fill in the blanks].

Go deep within yourself to realize at last who you are.

It is better to find someone to share your memories with. That was important to me. If a safe person is not available, journal your insights and understandings and keep going alone.

The pool of emotions underneath

Wendy Hoffman

After you have delved and scratched and inched your way through mountains of programs held in parts, all of which are surrounded by episodes of torture, after you have finished most of this arduous work, you arrive at your base and may, amazingly enough, find pools of emotions held by yet other pieces, though off-shoots of parts you have already met. Even though you may have integrated your primary personalities, you could find that you have a half-healed heart. In this pool of emotions is a bottom layer of being that is you at a primitive emotional level.

The cult leaders' plan for you included controlling your emotional life. They began by breaking or preventing your bond with your mother. This created a loneliness that hurts even physically and can be life-threatening. This loneliness can make the heart spasm, limbs ache, stomach churn. It surrounds you as an infant with a cloud of hopelessness and takes away the desire to partake of life, thrive, and survive. It is a gruelling feeling. Young victims drag this emotional state throughout their childhoods, especially after the murder of their only designated friend. The stab of this loneliness can be unbearable. Each victim then goes through much of his or her unhealed life afraid to love and bond, wanting no one else to be murdered. No matter how severe the physical torture, the emotional torture that pierces innocence is the worst. The emotional foundation of not having bonded creates a strong, bleak fortress.

The loneliness that resides at the base of the newly born infant can last throughout life. Even after healing that includes the spontaneous melding together of parts of the brain, this loneliness can become a permanent fixture. Loneliness can follow even those survivors young enough to marry and create new families. Living with people can make one even lonelier. People are not usually aware of this loneliness. It is hidden deeply and flickers in and out of consciousness, sometimes seen, often missed.

Some can shed the loneliness drop by drop as they perfect their healing and enter into a life of their own choosing. Others become married to this primitive state and are dominated by the deprived infant parts their whole lives, trying unsuccessfully to care for them or find others who will. Some, in both the cult and non-cult worlds, cannot outgrow these early deprivations and carry around with them their internal small beings with unmet needs.

However you choose to deal with the physical and emotional pain of early infancy, it is better to know that it is there and to manage it. Some try to manage the pain by never being alone. The fear of being alone has led people into terrible arrangements, soul-crushing marriages, doing far too much for people who want to misuse you. Not knowing about your primitive loneliness can drive you into more usurping relationships.

Feelings can be a normal response to what is happening in your current life. Ask yourself which responses are appropriate responses to the present, and which are left over from the past (even if triggered by present events) and not yet fully connected to their original sources and discharged. It is particularly difficult and painful to go through infants' emotions, where everything is intense and immediate. Understanding yourself as an infant may help you grow into adulthood emotionally.

Another bottom-of-the-system feeling is shame. Shame is sometimes underneath the loneliness. Shame also has to be either released slowly or acknowledged and managed. Healed survivors can cognitively work through the lies that made them feel responsible and ashamed fairly easily. Most survivors have been forced to participate in the murder of the innocent. Perpetrators use the hands of child victims. Some survivors can see that they were not responsible for what others forced them to do when they were children. But others cannot overcome the shame of having been implicated in a crime that took away another's life. They wrestle with this shame and may experience it life-long, even though they would never have chosen to murder on their own.

In addition, as part of resolving shame, survivors have to deal with sexuality and their sexual responses. Survivors have been used as sexual objects, some as soon as they were born. These cults often combine death and sexuality. Even survivors who have come into their healings late in life will have to come to terms with their sexual being if they want to manage the shame instilled as early as that emotion can first be felt. People with relaxed, open bodies that they fully occupy have usually not been sexually abused. A body free of lifelong tension would be a goal for survivors of mind control who were used as sexual puppets. They can gradually learn to take pleasure in their bodies, to be in their own bodies. Start with touching any part of your own body, and practice not dissociating as you do this. Peel yourself off the ceiling and work on staying in your own body.

It is not surprising that buried in this submerged nest of emotion is rage. The rage is reasonable and understandable but it is gathered together here and is overly intense. Survivors are angry at the torture they endured from birth onward, that they could not be who they were meant to be, and that they had to run and hide from their previous lives. They are mostly angry at what they were made into and what they had to do. They are angry that they are different from the normal world and have trouble fitting in.

It does not help the raging person to scream at his or her pet or at an automated voice in customer service over the telephone. Then, what is there to do with the rage? Feel it, know it, acknowledge it. The rage is fitting for what happened then but too extreme for present circumstances. Let it leave the body drip by drip. This is the rage you could not express to your perpetrators as they tortured you. As you put a wall between the past and present and realize that the intense emotions belong back there, you will regain your equilibrium. Eventually, this invisible wall will not be needed and will crumble. The energy that comes with and from rage can be redirected to help society. For example, you can become an activist for human rights, or you can expose the reality of criminal mind control and ritual abuse and work towards stopping it.

Once you scrape off the intensity of rage, you might find depression. Why should you not be depressed? A life in these cults contradicts what life is meant to be. You observe people in ordinary life getting upset about things that are barely significant. You have important realities to be sad about. Appropriate sadness is not clinical depression and is not a mental illness. It is not to be medicated away.

Underneath the loneliness, shame, rage, and depression comes guilt. As my mother was dying in a Bronx hospital, she screamed out at me the rage that she had not had a life, and that I had ruined her image. I was her whipping girl. Whatever went wrong in her life she blamed on me. At the end, she said to me, "We had our moments." In these dark worlds, some only have moments of relating, of decency. Moments do not make a mother. I have always been motherless; someone else might have transcended the mind control somewhat, but she did not. She lived in an era when no help existed. The programmers knew that. Had she lived now, she may have broken free.

Once you realize the set-ups, guilt is not so hard to overcome. Cognitively, survivors can reason these false scenarios away and know that their blame is a giant lie. I do not accept responsibility for my mother's whole life, although she thought I should. Mind control procedures attempt to make victims feel that they are responsible for every bad thing that happened. The leaders want you to feel bad about yourself. You do not have to go through life with that false belief.

Even as rage and depression are connected, so are guilt and anxiety. The undercoating of survivors' lives is anxiety. Some of us grew up not knowing what would happen next, not knowing when our caregivers would switch into menacing, homicidal parents. Anxiety was a constant companion, present even when we were not aware of it. Anxiety is appropriate if you are still being hunted by perpetrators. But if you are one of those fortunate survivors who is actually safe in the present, the anxiety belongs to the past, and you can now learn to relax.

Slowly work your way through the remaining nest of feelings. Acknowledge the lies and threats that made you feel the way you do. Then create a life that does not twist your heart and keep you from your true self. You know who you are by your feelings. Clear out of your heart the intense emotions programmers put in you on purpose, which belong to the past, and replace them with emotions that do what they are intended to do, which is letting you know about whether or not your needs are met in the present.

When a program engulfs you

Wendy Hoffman

I believed I was the me I knew, the me who was pretty much finished with the excavations, the me who could think clearly, was compassionate, and was filled with sorrow about how the world is. But then a new me galloped out and, with narrowed eyes, reviewed the way in which significant people thought of me. I latched on to a fleeting look or glance to make a case that the person or people held me in low regard. I would think, "These people are glad to get rid of you, they are tired of you, they think you have no boundaries, you have exhausted them, you exhaust everyone."

I wondered why I was having these alienating thoughts. How come I was gripped at this late stage by the irrational and lies? Another program had emerged. I scraped and found something painful, shocking, and disappointing at the bottom of the barrel.

The public has read for years now how the Catholic church has been guilty of sexually abusing children and colluding with its perpetrators. This did not shock me. I wrote about being abused at a famous religious center in my memoir, The Enslaved Queen (2014). I knew that every religion has perpetrators and that they hide behind the prestige and respectability of religious office.

But I did not know that the revered rabbi with whom I had studied the Torah line by line was one of the leading torturers and programmers in the community I had lived in. And so were other esteemed rabbis in this same community. This rabbi, my teacher, founded a synagogue to bring people back to Judaism. The people I thought were my sincere friends were his assistant torturers. I felt as if I was hopping on melting ice. I could have been one of the sea animals whose whole habitat was dissolving.

My memory led me back to where this program about everyone despising me was put in. I am underground, below a landmark-like temple in this same community. There are spinning wheels to which people can be tied to disorientate them and make them too dizzy to function or think, particularly elaborate head vises, rows and rows of electroshock chairs. It must be a programming center. In my already healed mind, I had not known it existed. Many such places are all over the world. Pretend Judaism is the perfect cover for Nazi perpetrators.

This is what the rabbi said as he and others tortured me: "You bring trouble and despair everywhere you go. No one wants you around. You are danger, fire, a plague. You bring danger and destruction to everyone you know. You are a horrible person. We should rid the world of you. You are bad, you are awful . . ." My "friends" chanted these slogans. Drugs, electricity, all kinds of torture—the usual. This torture specialist enhanced some of Mengele's, the Nazi's, ideas. Mengele sometimes worked by torturing two victims simultaneously. The rabbi refined the method. Whip one victim, who was a frail, sick woman in this case, as someone else whips the other victim, me. Then Taser them simultaneously. I survived the torture. I was told my bad actions or thoughts—how could they know my thoughts?—had caused this disgrace.

The program barged out before the memory. The program caused paranoia. I sullied the innocent. I sullied myself. Discovering the memory brought me back to sanity. The periphery or wide margins of me engulfed the center and I returned to "normal." The healed mind overtook the programmed slice of mind.

How do you prevent programs from exploding? Get as many of the training memories out as possible. Expect particularly disheartening ones at the bottom of the barrel. Strengthen the periphery. The periphery is the part of you no longer programmed. You are a rational being. You can tell whom to trust. Listen to the knowledge you have acquired. When you are gripped against your will by urges or emotions you cannot stop, look for the memories that created them. After it is all done, be glad you will not be controlled by that stinking program again. This is the life of people who were formerly slaves.

I never suspected my "friends" were victims, too. They seemed so self-righteous. Do not underestimate how many people in your world could be cult. They are like flocks. Many people trying to get out are surrounded. The main danger comes from programs still within. When your feelings go crazy, look for programs that others put in you and that take you far away from yourself. When you find the programs and how they were installed, your sanity will return.

In the beginning years of therapy, either with a therapist or on your own doing self-therapy, programs immediately jump out. Typical ones are kill yourself, do not believe what you remember, there is no such thing as dissociation or multiplicity, you do not have parts or alters, come back to us, bring this message here, contact that person there, attend a ritual at this date at this time at this location—instructions will follow, seduce him or her, steal this or that—for some, murder this person or that person, and so on. Inherent in all these programs is an assault on self-esteem. How could people be mindless marionettes and feel good about themselves? Even programs discovered late include an attack on self-esteem.

Here is more of what the rabbi said to me underneath the prestigious synagogue.

"You may never escape, you may never be free. We are your rulers, we are your enforcers, we are your kings, you are our property. Never go near anyone who tells you differently. You are our slave. We will put you in your grave. You have disobeyed us. You are finished."

That is how programmers talk as they torture.

As you remember these kinds of programs, you might realize that in the past you have driven away good people by distrusting their affection, and that you have ruined good opportunities for yourself. But along with that sadness is the joy that you are finally doing something about it. Even a day of freedom makes it worthwhile.

After I wrote about the abuse by the rabbi, I expressed to Alison that, in writing about this, I would endanger Jews all over the world. She pointed out that it did not endanger Catholics when survivors spoke out about priests; it made them safer. I continued to express my belief, and she told me that she thought I was "speaking from programming." I searched inside and found programming to make me believe that if I disclosed this abuse, there would be another Holocaust and all the Jews would be murdered.

"Speaking from programming" is something that Alison and I have been learning about over the course of our relationship. She is getting better at identifying it, and so am I. When I say something that is irrational and out of character, it is generally an indication that a program is operating. The same is true for other survivors. Therapists, if a survivor client is adamant about something that is clearly irrational, there is a good chance that he or she is speaking from programming. Do not argue with a program; you will not win. Just get down to business: it is an opportunity to identify the program and discover how it was made. Survivors, when words come out of your mouth that just do not make sense, find out which part of you is saying them, then search inside for when they were put in. These are giant steps to becoming who you are.

When you have killed*

Alison Miller

This is an account of a therapy session with child parts of an adult client, a survivor of organized mind control by a right-wing political group. The survivor's words (mostly coming from child parts) are in regular script (with odd words in italic for emphasis); the therapist's words are in italics, with some roman for emphasis. The language is childish because a very young part was speaking. The subject matter is a child being forced to kill. Only read it if you are ready to deal with this subject matter. The client does find considerable relief by the end of the session.

> We all share so everybody knows that what the bad people do is not what we want to do. We're trying to get to the part where it upsets everybody if we hear a baby cry.
> We're supposed to be a killer, nobody's gonna change that. It's who we are, it's in our DNA.
>
> How old are you?

Five.

Do you know what DNA is?

No.

Is this a program?

It's a program. They have a baby over there, crying, and they bring another baby in. Every time, you see a baby crying and they bring in one that's still.

We are the sleepers. They're trying to reconstruct the nature of the person by repetition, over and over. It's important to get the senses. We have to keep our eyes open so we can see for real. You do not know who you are any more. You only have so much energy.

The program is unspinning . . .

Somebody inside would use the memory of the baby crying, while we stabbed. The live baby initially over on the left side, the still baby by us. Then later in rituals no live baby was needed. We never know if the baby we kill is alive or dead when we kill it. Sometimes in the early stages the body got electrocuted while the baby cried.

What were the instructions?

"Whenever the ritual starts you try to hear the baby crying." The body was three and a half when they said that. You're strapped to the table, hear crying, get electrocuted. Part of it was done in the hospital, then they continued in the church. You just see the baby and think he's crying and think there'll be electricity and the baby will get killed. The electricity was in the head. The arms and legs were strapped down. Jesus [the alter involved] is the immortal one and has power over life and death. The sleeper, who are also Jesus, have to go through it too. They are told to watch so when one Jesus fails there are still the sleepers. The sleepers stay on the outside of the body and watch. They take over. It's part of their job to come into the body.

All the sleepers, all the Jesuses need to join in as we go through the memory of these trainings.

They're just saying "Killer, killer, killer, killer . . ." They always say the Aryan race is superior, all hail the Aryan race, heil Hitler. They chant [gibberish]. They're making us killers to honour the Aryan race. That means the blond-haired blue-eyed ones like us. Jesus is the key, who gets raised from the dead. He has the power. Nobody can hurt Jesus because he's already dead. The Jesus that gets created is immortal.

None of you is immortal.

What is your left hand doing?

It's making a sign to make sure everybody in this memory is accounted for and present.

We have to drink the blood after, and eat the organs, because the power's in the blood that makes us have the power over life and death. And they keep making us do it till we do not flinch or get sick. "You're the killer, you do not think. We have the power, we can take your life." It's all for the purpose to make the ultimate killer.

When the body became ten they let go of the arm and it kept moving, it got caught up in the motion. "You're the killer. All hail the Aryan race." We wished the arm had kept moving and cut us up instead.

The boy's going to be killed anyways, and it'll be slower or worse if they do it than if we do it.

Who in you decided to let the arm keep moving and kill the boy without anyone's hand on yours?

Essence [the core spiritual essence] decided. Essence always knows the truth. It was a choice you should never have to make.

They always blamed us, and said we would go to hell. All these years we've been going crazy because of it.

Essence chose what would make the boy suffer least. You did not choose that he would die, you only chose how he would die, the least painful way.

So we're not evil! It was really a kind thing that we did. That's weird. We showed mercy. We thought we were going to eternal damnation.

We never thought we'd get this relief.

This was a very meaningful therapy session for the survivor. If you are a survivor reading about it, I hope it will help relieve your guilt and shame for your forced choices.

Giving up dissociation

Wendy Hoffman

Dissociation is one of the worst things that can happen to a life, even though it is the best thing that can occur during torture. Unfortunately, to find out about the torture, you have to give up dissociation. Those who are the most dissociated do not even know their dissociation exists. The way to find out is to have someone tell you.

When dissociation is gone, the thick black lines that hold the many parts of the brain distinct begin to smear, dissolve, and disappear. Blood suddenly runs through from one section to another. The brain may spasm, hiccup, get fuzzy and dizzy, but then the movement subsides and the mind becomes solid. Try shaking your head hard. It will not come apart. Your mind is now closer to how minds were designed to be before the interference and subterfuge.

What are the consequences of losing your dissociation?

You now have access to all feelings. Your emotions are no longer sectioned off into buried, distinct, hidden, long-suffering parts of the mind. The heart, once frozen, now bears the burden.

I never thought it would happen to me, but it has. Most of my brain is together now. If I twist my head hard, it still stays intact. If I bend it way to the right, it does not re-split. If I swing it to the left, most of me is still integrated. I find memories and emotional states still not known or raw inside me, but they are not dangling in their own world. They live in my melded and unified mind. I have given my mind the space and knowledge to unify.

Who am I now? I love myself. I am gentle and caring towards myself. I have trekked out of a lifetime of horrendous abuse, but I am whole now. I have inflated my crushed and flattened body, mind, and soul.

I used to avoid pain by splitting away when it arose. I could even split away from broken bones. One part of me would feel the pain but the rest would proceed with life as if nothing happened. Now, when I hurt, I hurt straight through.

The sting of emotional pain pierces. The emotions are shared throughout me, which means mature portions of me can consider and advise about this state of being. A whole movement of comforting myself sweeps over me now. I am my own best friend. I am my mother and father as well.

Integrating this late in life brings remorse and regret. Before, I believed the lies my controllers told me under torture—that my child would be tortured and slowly murdered, that this friend, that helper would have similar fates if I disobeyed. Instead of finding my own mind and running, I stayed trapped to protect other people. My "protecting" them did no good. Awareness of assumptions made by naïve child parts is part of the knowledge that takes place post-integration. I have to accept my stupidity and live with it. It does not pay to let it eat me up alive. A wave of self-forgiveness helps assuage the burning sting. All odds were against me. I had enemies. I did not have help. I did what I could.

Loneliness is another post-integration issue. When I meet a non-traumatized person from the normal world, I observe how that person lives and her character, and I face what I never had: a real life. Even some people who know about the abuses I suffered do not understand what it was like. I have experienced almost every kind of suffering and it has left me a have-not in a have-everything kind of world.

But I remember, and I have a soul and a conscience.

Is there an end to the healing process?

Wendy Hoffman

Some survivors may make huge progress during the beginning and middle periods of their recovery, have years of getting on with life in an ordinary way, and then new parts appear. That is how we know we have not finished recovery. This pattern may persist throughout a lifetime and raises certain questions. Should survivors be informed that locating and healing all parts of their mind-controlled brains may be a life-long endeavor and might never be fully accomplished? Should this information be part of informed consent? But would survivors then be discouraged from even beginning to dismantle their mind control? Would only the most earnest truth-seekers even try to be free? And would the already scarce therapists not want to go into the field? People like to finish what they start. And therapists do not want to be stuck with survivor-victims life-long. Success and an end point seem to be two necessary components of taking on work for some. Is it wrong, then, for a therapist to tell clients a process will end when it might not? It could also be wrong to tell clients the process might never end when it might end.

Since, to my knowledge, other survivors of mind control have not spoken about this, I will use my own experience as an example. After the year I spent in intensive therapy with Alison, I kept working on my own and found other traumas. Then I had a hiatus of relative peace during which I enjoyed nature. Eventually, I received an email with trigger words from one of the "friends" who lived in the city I escaped from and whom I thought of as a friend, at one time my best friend. I might never have gotten to this awareness and the related programming memories on my own. The reason the "friend" directed me to it is because it is a potent and complicated suicide program that the abusers wanted me to act on. When I was an older child, the infamous Mengele captured three of my original thirteen infant parts, bound them and locked them in an airtight internal chamber where they received no food or drink. He built on those death experiences through torture and programmed an older child to kill herself. I had missed this whole piece of my mind control, though I had remembered many other suicide programs, some installed by this same Nazi doctor. This awareness opened up the vital information about how many of my "friends" were cult plants.

Recently, I found internal structures within a structure. This is the internal structure that the Nazi group erected when they stole the parts that the Illuminati group created when I was born. There was a giant cave with a tower and smaller caves within the main cave. By its side was what Mengele called a red river. I worked through the contents of this structure and revived the stolen parts. Then I saw within my brain little papier-mâché and clay models and tarot cards. The red river became a piece of painted red cardboard. It is all just paper. There is the tower constructed of paper and clay. Toothpicks hold it up. Toothpicks, and I thought it was a prison. And there is the tarot card of a tower. A woman or girl falls out its window. She will land on a tiny table. The fall will not break her back. There were many cards of crows. Crows live for three years. Those crows cannot still be alive. What was erected was a paper world that comes down like a child's collapsible toy. This is a paper hell, a child's hell. The river is dry. Soggy playing cards remain at the bottom. The hearts, spades, clubs, diamonds are smeared with ink that has run. Soggy little playing cards that controlled me. This was an imaginary internal world within my child-brain. It is no longer real.

I do not know how many more devastating surprises I will find. Perhaps none, perhaps many. Only time will tell. Whether there is an end to discovering what criminal mind control you have been subjected to is something people have to hang loose about. I have the skills now to work through the new memories and programs to commit suicide, which will not affect me. I doubt fully that I am the only survivor who will find new chambers in my mind that I have not had the lucidity to get to earlier, despite an enormous effort. I do not know whether there is ever a true end to this process. I hope there is. If there is not, what freedom I have achieved will be enough.

Will there be an end to the world?

Will there be an end to restoring the split and chopped up mind?

Will there be an end to internal parts and parts held in reserve and parts stolen by one group from another?

Even experienced therapists can be shocked to learn how long it takes to treat survivors of generational criminal mind control. They may sign on for years and find they have to work with the same clients for decades. Naturally, they become impatient. Some become exhausted and want their lives back. Who would not? It is difficult to maintain a normal, carefree life while treating survivors. In addition, the helpers are forced to acknowledge what occurs in dark society and some do not want to see. Therefore, there may be an inherent, though unconscious, rushing in the treatment. They might silently encourage a belief that survivors have finished when, in fact, there is more work to be done. They might proclaim that there is an end to this kind of treatment, to the reunification of the once-split mind. For some, there might be. But for others, there might not be.

There can still be an end to therapy, however. Once you have worked with a skilled therapist for a while, you may have learned how to do the work yourself. People who have had an intensive course of "regular" therapy for traumas less intense and prolonged than mind control often go back for a check-up if symptoms start to reappear. You are allowed to do that, if your therapist is still available. You deserve it.

SECTION VIII

ODES ABOUT MIND CONTROL

by Wendy Hoffman

I wrote some of these Odes to reach out to the different parts of myself who have had horrendous jobs in their secret lives, and also for survivors who are looking within and finding tragedy. I hope the Odes offer compassion.

* * *

To the Mind-Controlled

You were born whole, lovely and good.
They tortured your brain into thousands of pieces.

You became many strangers,
each one living in an ice-concealed grave inside.

Hordes in ghostly isolation, not one knew of the others.
Noiseless, you tiptoed through life, alone in a mob.

I am happy that I did not stay in a shattered mind.
I followed the invisible thread back.

Let the pain flood into the Red Sea.
Nothing is worth sacrificing truth for. And freedom.

Nothing is worth not becoming yourself.

To the Front Person

You have lived your life in the one quarter inch of space in my outer crust.
You did not know how the rest of us suffered within.

You walked down the sidewalk and up the hill as if you were like everybody else.
You did not know you were empty and filled to bursting.

You smiled a normal smile which often came about suddenly.
People said you have a nice smile. That means you must be normal.

You went to school and day dreamed.
You did not know they put learning problems in you.
You passed anyway.

You married and divorced confused.
Why wasn't your husband a good man? Why didn't you get along with your son?

You did not know about all the abducted children or your murdered friend.
You did not know about your most important people.

You did not know you did not know.
You went through life not knowing a thing, much like society today.

How brave you were. Taking steps forward, not knowing you carried frozen hordes within.
You felt their emotions but could not name them.

You did not understand that you were empty and over-full to bursting.
How valiant to get an education and paid work, to move forward not knowing you were empty and over-full.

You shoveled snow off the deck, worked two jobs, sometimes were kind.
You slogged through life, had moments of buoyancy.

And when you broke down and could no longer do it, they created another front person.
And still you did not know. Then you were inside among the silent.

How valiant and brave and sad.
And now you know. You are the over-full. You name the feelings.

Unlike society, you understand.
How valiant and brave and sad.

*To the Unloved, Rejected and Abandoned

It wasn't your fault.
Right from the start, we were emptied out and raw hatred inserted.
They trained our mothers to turn their backs on us,
    our fathers to be brutal.
Your grandfather may be your father.
How could your mother overcome that?
    Our heritage.
It is your mission now to love yourself.
You are as lovable as anyone else on earth.
You deserve to be cherished, not blamed.

To the Learning Disabled

Your mind drifted mid-sentence.
You could never finish a book.
You reversed letters and numbers.
Your mind inserted a 'not' in every sentence and you stopped listening after a few minutes.

Teachers looked at you with annoyance or pity.
You are stupid and dull—the only conclusion.

---

* A version of this poem appeared in the online journal Survivorship, Winter 2016.

Even your big sister said so, and she knew everything and could read whole books.

But in college you heard whispers and dropped comments that you have the smarts.
In graduate school the whispers became more pronounced.

An optometrist detected your eyes muscles did not converge.
The vision trainer said it was caused by early loss.
Decades passed before you learned about mind control,
the government's secret.
Slaves always have to be rendered stupid.

More decades passed. In therapy you remembered that before first grade, programmers taught you not to read, not to do math, to give wrong answers. To give a wrong answer, you first have to figure out the right answer.

They buried your brightness under layers of weighted ineptitude.
Only they could use your intelligence, not you or any safe person.

To Spies, Thieves, and Mules

You learned to follow with soft steps, watch shadows, identify people by their backs, use your mind like a camera—snap, click, memorized.

You slipped documents and photos inside lapels and papers out of inner pockets all while smiling sweetly and looking sideways.

They shipped you around the world in an airplane seat or crate.
I got the information. I did the deed. I can go home.

The mules carried you to the criminal base you call home. They managed Customs, read flight numbers. Each group had skills they were not allowed to share with their companion-groups.
   Without the mules, you would have remained in airspace.

Now airplanes and airports harrow. You do not have to fly anymore.
You can stay home and use your nimble fingers digging in the garden's earth and forming papier mâché shapes. No one will send you off. Sit in the easy chair. Turn on the TV.

Even if you broke the mold and reported to Customs what you stole or carried in your vagina, they would not have believed you.
You would have ended up with the "insane", drugged for life.

To the Sexual Slaves Within

I see a child on the stage as the brothel customers throw their wet handkerchiefs at you. The spot lights hurt your body.

I see another child in the apartment building's basement learning to fondle.
Uncle Mike taught you.

As a teenager in spiked heels, you slipped pills into drinks. Mengele taught you.

You seduced and stripped on command. They have schools to teach that.
They separated many of you from the others. They wore one skin and you grew a second skin of shame. People have died over less.

You had one of the harder jobs and you did not die even though you died, and died again.

Now you live with all of us in a solid globbing whole.

No one scorns you.
You do not have to be touched and you do not have to touch ever again.

A jewel in a velvet box, you are protected from the sinister.
You do not have to like men.
The others will take care of you.

Rest.
Here eat some chocolate.

To Mothers

So young. You gave birth before you were allowed to wear lipstick in ordinary life.
They induced menstruation when you were eleven. And shipped you off immediately to the Bronx brothel where your child's body delivered three infants, immediately snatched away by the Mafia adoption agency—to be sold like cocaine. You will never see them. You couldn't hold or smell them. You do feel them. You think your son is in jail. In the 1950s, other girls starting junior high weren't allowed to date.

After thirteen, it was the Illuminati's turn. In a Brooklyn monastery, you birthed
four more infants. You saw two murdered and do not know what became of the others.
You grew an extra layer of skin inside your outer skin, a skin of grief. You hold out your air arms and call your babies in. They fit even though they are past middle age now. Did the slaughtered infants stay infants? You press them to your heart and your grief braids with theirs. Your and their angers clasp. Will you see them in the afterlife? Is there an afterlife? You swim in air-reality.

To Kidnappers

Their goal is to strip you of all remnants of your real self.
You have to be an automaton who follows verbal, hand, foot and visual signals.

They pull a string and the marionette moves.

That is what they make you.
They measure what would be most abhorrent to you.

Out of meanness or pleasure in their craft, they give you those tasks.
They are proud they have striped all your empathy away but they cannot. Your own children were abducted and you will always feel for children and mothers.

And so you have a screaming breakdown, exactly what they do not want.

They try again years later.
They insist on perfecting evil.

You will keep living though so many children are dead.
You go on even though children are missing.

You did the best you could. “Under the worst circumstances” has new meaning.

To Trained Assassins

You started out a meek and gentle soul.
But you could be quick to anger, the commanders noticed.
Their army needs killers:
    because they have to kill because they have to make you feel worthless.

Males have to go in with guns and fists.
Females learn seduction, pills and poisons.
Hefty girls can train with guns.
Stocky females with strong forearms become torturers too.

O, assassins, it is not who you are. You are still innocent children sitting in a field of daisies.

They made you explode with anger. Drugs can do that.
They made you cold, calculating.

Come back to the beginning.
You have left behind the rest.
They took the sweetest part of you and twisted.

To Witches

Of all the jobs, this is not one of the worst.
You could travel on the periphery of breeze and wave, cover vast terrains while gazing out your window.

You could be assigned to destroy but they do not know when you do the opposite. Maybe just the top experts would.

You didn't ask to be a witch or know how to make portents and charms.
You didn't ask to stroll into the future.

It doesn't matter.
Of course it matters.

To the Plant-Therapists

I cannot believe you would have done this of your own free will,
wittingly blocked people's paths,

cemented over their quest, made them about-face in their belief in themselves. Some of you may be that evil.

But for the rest. You must have been badly tortured.
What was the threat? That your child would be murdered?

Worse?
That they would be skinned first?

Is your own child more important than other people's?
You took yearning minds and smashed them anew.

To Those Who Couldn't Protect

Bambi wasn't my dog though they bought him on my birthday.
He was Father's dog.
He trained him.

At the Tackenasee country club, Mother held him by his hind legs and beat him against the hotel's bathtub as if he were a dusty rug.
Father threw him in the swimming pool. Then Bambi bit a woman.
My parents.

When I was thirteen, Pow Wow attached himself to me. He became the owner and I the adored pet. He protected me until the commanders skinned and sacrificed him.
My penalty for love.

Today my pet and I live in harmony, as peers.
But my front person was nowhere present when the tormenters ripped into my home and twisted her back legs two different times.
A warning.

My front person thought the injury was genetic and rehabilitated her all these years but Blossom knew the truth.

How do you live with yourself when you couldn't protect?
You take one step, another and . . .

To the Beaten

Every month, in childhood every week, you were broken.

Right before I escaped, ruffians snuck through the back door, used their key in the front door, climbed my stairs and dragged, hit, tasered, raped and plunged me in a tub of ice.

That last day when I ran successfully, did they not know or were they afraid of exposure? Is that why they let me go?

Unless they planned to murder me on the road.
Unless the friend who volunteered to accompany me is one of them.

Two and a half years later, my body softens. My toenails breathe.
I begin to feel my bones grow sturdy, the hair on my arms, the ocean in my nostrils.

You took the beatings for us all. You are sore and chipped.

Lie down in this hammock. Let the sun languish on your crushed limbs, rock
back and forth, mend quietly.

You are free, safe and no longer numb.

To Mourners

Some people get over things. Some do not.

You have liquid skin and pliant muscles that should breathe out misery but you hold on.

You would be a different person today had he not loved you.

He was tall and thin with blue black curly hair that glistened in the dull air against his apricot skin and dark ancestral eyes. He was thirteen and he loved. You were three and a half.

Always, for sixty-nine years, you feel his breath on you, his heart beating upon yours, the rhythm of his lungs.

Take a child who knew only hatred and the gift of a boy who could only give love—take that and try to stop mourning.

To the Co-Conscious

In some ways, it was easier when everyone lived in their separate boxes.

The lids opened and thousands emerged, each with a story that would overwhelm any life.

Your old brain spasmed. Clogged pathways spit out rusted debris.
Blood flowed to closed down cells. Your brain erupted into life.
Springtime grew in snow and ice.

Eventually your brain quiets. All these people inside talk to one another. What conversations! You had no idea.

I believe it is better to know.
I believe truth is the goal.
But I had no idea.

To the Integrated

If I put my right ear to my shoulder, my mind still stays whole and fastened. If I tilt to the other side, I do not lose any parts.

I can move my head up and down, see the sky, earth—
it still all stays bound and backstitched.
I have had recent tragedies but my brain remains glued.
I hadn't even aimed for this cohesiveness. It happened by itself.

Emotions ripple through me.
All of me feels everything.
There is no escape from me.

All these pieces have come together to make me as close to normal as a previously tortured person can become.
My mind walks toward how it was originally designed.
My heart has quadrupled.
I live inside my body.
My bones support me.

I move to the left, back, forward.
I stay intact.
My brain is having a reunion.

To Confidence

I have taken tiny steps—toe to heel—around a lopsided globe and flown upside down through the circumference of wild air

but only now have I landed among bones, organs and blood.

I have never been this close in myself before.
My new skin holds tightly as

I deliver bouquets, truffles and creams to my arteries and veins.

It has been a long, tiring trip.
I rest quietly on the greenest prairie.

To Gratitude

My fingers are nimble
even though the tip of one was amputated.

My teeth still chew
despite many socks to the jaw.

My nostrils still sniff
despite the odor of mounds of death.

My brain thinks even though I have had more concussions than football players.

I have come out alive and can love.
That’s enough.

Chapter 1: Autodidact de Occultis

To know the secret or the formula of God is to be God.

To know the secret or the formula of the Devil is to be the Devil.

To wish to be at the same time God and Devil is to absorb in one’s self the most absolute antinomy, the two most strained contrary forces; it is the wish to shut up in one’s self an infinite antagonism.

It is to drink a poison which would extinguish the suns and consume the worlds.

— Eliphas Levi, The Key to the Mysteries Hello there. Thank you for reading this book. I hope it will be of interest to you.

This is intended to be a record of the incredible things I experienced at the end of March and beginning of April 2018, leading to the historic events of this year that you no doubt already know about. I need to write this down before my memory fades completely. This is already starting to happen, so I must work quickly.

I got myself into this mess because I am good at what I do. But there is also very little market for what I do, so I have to take what I can get whenever it comes around.

My job is the sort of thing that only exists in horror movies. I investigate the occult. I study the anthropology of religions and cults, both old and new, from around the world. Then I apply the patterns I see there to the study of other things. And I always get interesting results.

Most of my work just involves reading books and websites: lots of rare books and extremely obscure documents. Many rare, out-of-print texts can be found online for free if you know where to look. Google Books, JSTOR, Bartleby, and Scribd are good resources for this sort of thing. Also, the interlibrary loan program is amazing. I can’t believe that a library halfway around the world will loan me, a complete stranger, a book with only three copies known to exist, again, usually for free.

Only a fraction of my research material involves books about secret societies or magic spells. A lot of it includes chasing down details about historical events and personages, or comparing the motifs used in myths, folklore and fairy tales. But I don’t pretend to be an “academic,” per se. No university would fund my work, because none of it can be used to advance the political movements embraced by present-day college culture, or to prop up the pet theories of tenured professors.

In pursuit of the esoteric, I have at times accidentally revived doctrines and theses that have been long-abandoned by modern mainstream academia, often with no good reason for the rejection. My work tends to validate the worldviews of writers from previous eras whose entire approach to scholarship, and the assumptions it was based on, have been thrown out by today’s universities along with the bathwater. I find that quite often these modern exemplars of learning end up just quoting other modern authors, who of course share their own biases about historical events and people, without checking the primary documents related to the subject in question.

This becomes an endless loop of reflection, as if in a hall of mirrors, until the author of a research paper ends up essentially quoting himself by quoting seven other writers he knows who are working within the same small milieu and whose ideas can be traced directly back to him. They are so busy patting each other on the back that nobody takes the time to track the evolution of the belief system that is being constructed between them, which may one day be taught to public schoolchildren like a catechism. If they were to do this, they would quite often find themselves having to reevaluate the work of classical writers that has been dismissed heretofore because the underlying approach to research used to construct it is no longer considered politically correct.

Strangely, what seems to be the hallmark of this older approach to history, anthropology, and comparative mythology is simply the assumption that once can find significance in the similarities between divergent traditions from different cultures. Also, it is apparently now controversial to suggest that symbolism is always symbolic of some kind of prototype with inherent meaning. Today’s academics revel in depriving man’s ancestral traditions of meaning because they can project whatever they want onto it. While undergrads majoring in Diversity Studies protest “cultural appropriation” on the other side of the campus, myth and anthropology students are bullied into ignoring how the religious beliefs and ritual practices of one group have influenced another.

So I knew that my bills would never be paid by a government grant or university donors. I have to compete in the marketplace with all the other nonfiction writers for reader who, for whatever reason, are interested in this type of subject matter. Of course, those people are usually weirdos.

In seeking further information beyond book-learning I have, at times in the past, actually socialized with some of these weirdos. In other words, I’ve joined cults and secret societies that I’ve been invited into, mainly to see how they worked. I had also practiced several forms of divination, both in these groups and on my own. I found this to be a useful way to find clues pertaining to the rest of my research.

All of that became too dangerous for me at a certain point, however. So for the last few years, until about two months ago, I had socialized with almost nobody. I abstained from both ceremonial magic and reading oracles. I contented myself with utilizing the knowledge I had amassed, the published information already available, and my own intuition. By now I had developed a knack for understanding how mystical traditions worked, and could often anticipate what I would find in my investigations.

This operated as a sort of sixth sense. I may have put the Ouija board away, but it was as if my mind was a divination tool of its own. It was like there was a radio receiver in my brain that I could never switch off. But I could usually tune it to specific wavelengths to pick up on information about whatever it was I was interested in learning about at the time.

For the most part, this has been independent research, and I have published my findings in print-on-demand books that I produced myself. I have also done radio interviews to promote the books and, when lucky, paid speeches, usually to small crowds. I’ve made a little niche for myself as the world’s foremost expert on several very specific topics that I have pioneered on my own.

But the living has never been easy. When the March hare began to herald the approach of Spring, and everyone seemed to be rejoicing, I alone, it seemed, was downcast. I faced a slew of problems that could be solved only with money. I could barely even use my own phone because of the non-stop calls from bill collectors.

In particular, Barclays Bank called at least three times a day to discuss the licensing fees I owed to the British Museum. This was in regards to the photos of the “Mete coffer” (as I call it) that I had printed in my most recent book, The Baphomet Papers. It had been hailed as a masterpiece by fellow occult researchers, but ignored by the general public due to its size and the obscurity of its subject matter. Therefore, these fees from the Museum would cost me more than I had made on the project so far, and I could not afford to pay them.

Chapter 2: Opportunity Knocks

The fish thinks about its hunger, not about the fisherman. It is the master who seeks the disciple.

— Alejandro Jodorowsky The Holy Mountain Therefore, I was very glad when Leopold Black, Baron of Alphamstone in England and a peer in the House of Lords, contacted me through my website on Tuesday, March 20, the spring equinox, saying he wanted to hire me to do a private lecture. He wished for me to give a talk about the Mete coffer. This is an item that had been forgotten in the back catalogue of the British Museum until I identified it as one of the alleged “Templar artifacts” written about a century earlier by Orientalist Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall. When I wrote back to the Baron and asked whom the lecture would be for, he said he belonged to a group called the Worshipful Society of Butchers, and that they met at the Oriental Club in London once monthly, usually around the full moon.

He sent me a link to his personal page on the Houses of Parliament’s website. I then used Google and found the Butcher society’s Wikipedia entry.

Apparently, it was one of the few livery companies in the City of London that was still dedicated to its original trade: butchery. Most of the others had evolved into mere fraternal organizations with rituals and regalia, meeting for dinner and raising money for charity several times a year. The society’s motto pertained directly to this practical matter:

Omnia subiecisti sub pedibus, oves et boves.

This is a Latin quote from Psalm 8:6-7: “Thou hast put all things under man’s feet, all sheep and oxen.” Their company arms featured three winged bulls, and two severed bullheads, along with two axes. The group’s concerns seemed primarily about beef production.

It was unclear to me why a trade organization such as this would be interested in hearing from me about esoteric archeology. I also didn't understand why they needed to meet at the Oriental Club, when from what I could tell it seemed that they had their own property, Butcher's Hall, 20 minutes away in a different part of town.

Nonetheless I acquiesced to a video Skype conversation with the Baron. I found him taking tea in a poshly-decorated room, sitting in a brown wooden armchair lined with black leather, with his feet upon a matching Ottoman. He was wearing a Navy-blue dinner jacket and trousers with a white shirt and an azure-colored velvet robe and light brown leather cap toe Oxford shoes. He seemed rather at home there, so I asked if this was his house. He shook his head sideways and said he was at "the Club House."

Nice, I thought. At least the Club has money. An unseen hand was holding up the camera—a smartphone, I presumed. He said it was his nephew, also a member of the club.

He promised a payment of $10,000 if did the lecture, $3000 of it up front.

He also demanded secrecy, which I thought was a bit odd. But hey, $10,000 is more than I'd made in the last six months combined. I couldn't justify turning it down, so I agreed.

Over the next few days, as I tried to prepare my lecture, my sense of foreboding grew strong. But the Baron promptly purchased my plane tickets and hotel for the week in question, at a cost in excess of $7000. This was, in my mind, legal consideration for the verbal contract, and assured me that these people were serious, not just wasting my time. The reviews for the Regent Palace Hotel at Piccadilly Circus were a bit meh, but I felt I had no right to be a snob and demand better.

Still, walking into a room full of British aristocrats to deliver a message about a Satanic Templar artifact is very intimidating, especially to a group of people calling themselves "Worshipful Butchers." I wondered if they would accept my theory. The illustrations on the sides and lid of the coffer, I proposed, indicated that the Knights Templar, the Pope's own specially-chartered warriors of Christ throughout the medieval Crusades, were having ritual sex with boys, and sacrificing them, in an attempt to destroy the created universe.

The first part of this claim—the ritual murder and gay pedophilia—is just what the Templars had already been convicted of and burnt at the stake for by the King of France in the early fourteenth century. These rites were allegedly all part of their secret worship of a demonic entity named "Baphomet," which my book was named after. The last part, about destroying the universe, was my own unique contribution.

Two obvious objections to the very idea spring up immediately when you consider it. First, why would anyone want to destroy the universe? Maybe a miserable and depressed person would desire that, but why a whole organization of men from wealthy families involved in an incredibly successful material enterprise, as the Templars were?

Secondly, how could any "ritual" done by men destroy everything that exists? Many people today think it's possible that the behavior of mankind as a species could destroy life on Earth as we know it. But the destruction of the universe as a whole seems like a bit much, doesn't it?

Granted, the Templars lived in a world where the universe was thought to be much smaller, and of a different arrangement than what is generally accepted today. Still it seems quite an ambitious nihilistic anti-goal. Certainly, it is not immediately obvious how pederasty and human sacrifice would bring that about, even in the most twisted occult logic. But the most twisted occult logic is not immediately obvious, by definition, as I was soon reminded.

Chapter 3: Plane Problems

Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming….

— Isaiah 14:9

My first plane departed from PDX in Portland, Oregon on the afternoon of Tuesday, March 27. It immediately occurred to me, as soon as I squeezed my body into the seat, that I was going to die of deep-vein thrombosis long before reaching my destination the next day. I could not fathom how I was going to stay in that unpleasant position for the better part of twelve hours with just one layover in Houston. As if to punish me for my weak thoughts, the situation escalated from bad to worse.

When we got to Houston, we found that there was a storm over the area, and the plane couldn't land until it passed. We circled in the air for a couple of hours waiting for that to happen. Then the captain announced over the PA system that we would be diverted to a military base in Austin. There we would refuel and wait for things to clear up in Houston.

All this time I had waited without using the restroom on board, not wanting to force the people next to me to stand up so I could squeeze past. This proved to be an awful decision. By the time I realized how badly I needed the toilet, there were ten people standing in line, as I could see when I stood up from my window seat to look.

I decided to use the skills that had gotten me through grade school, where we were only allowed to use the bathroom during lunch. I sat down and tried my best at transcendental meditation, hoping to take my mind off my bursting bladder. But whenever I try to concentrate on anything in public, someone in the vicinity feels compelled to interrupt me. This time was no different.

“I'm dying for a cigarette,” said the man next to me in a thick Arab accent.

With that, Harut Al-Hazrat dragged me into a conversation. He was a peculiar young man with long, unkempt hair forming Polish plait, dressed in black trousers with a black shirt and trench coat. His English was good, but he mumbled. I had to lean in close to hear him, which was an annoying strain. But the talk took my mind off my discomfort somewhat, and that helped pass the time.

When he found out I was going to England ultimately, he told me that his first name was “the Arabic equivalent of Arthur.” Specifically, he claimed that the king of Camelot’s name was “derived from Harut,” and that this figure of Western mythology was based on a character from pre-Islamic Mesopotamia. I smirked at this.

I told him what kinds of books I wrote. This prompted him to talk about his years of study under a Sufi murshid in Washington, D.C. Then he bragged that he could use prayer to summon UFOs, to which I said, of course:

“You should summon a flying saucer to pick us up and take us to Houston!”

I laughed at myself. He didn’t.

“Actually, storms help bring the UFOs,” he said. “They open up holes in the sky, which are portals for the saucers. They also use the extra electricity in the air to fly and to make light.”

“Oh,” I said, shaking my head vigorously in the affirmative.

The old white lady next to him glared at us in disapproval. I don’t think it was just that our conversation came off as stupid. I felt that maybe she didn’t like Arabs, and thought that I was flirting with him, which perhaps she didn’t think young white women should be doing. Maybe I was reading too much into her icy stare, but I am usually right about these things.

The plane sat on the tarmac for another three hours. During that time, the toilet began to overflow and the contents actually started to roll down the aisle.

While the flight attendants attempted to deal with that, inadequately, an Asian woman two rows ahead of me stood up, crying hysterically, and shouted that her grandmother had passed out next to her. Paramedics soon boarded the plane and took her away. A party of four native Texans then demanded to be let off the aircraft also, stating that they could drive to Houston before the plane would ever get there.

Eventually, though, the plane did return to Houston airspace, and successfully landed. By that time, my conversation with Harut had died down, as we were both choking on the stench of the overflowed toilet and trying not to piss in our pants. I said goodbye to him as we exited the plane.

Then, after using the bathroom as quickly as possible, I hurried over to the first United Airlines booth I found that had an employee present. The airport was ominously empty except for my fellow displaced passengers, who were scattered around frantically trying to find someone to reschedule the connecting flights they had missed.

When I got to the United Airlines booth, attended by a middle-aged black woman, I found there was no need to hurry. There were no more flights to England departing that night. Instead, I would take a shuttle to the local Marriott, where they had arranged a room for me, and wait for a flight the following morning.

I then asked where I could find my luggage. The woman informed me that my suitcase was on its way to another destination somewhere else in the United States.

“You’ll have to catch up with it some other time,” she said flippantly, as though it didn’t matter when or where I eventually found my suitcase. I couldn’t believe it.

“You mean I have to do this lecture in England without even a change of clothes?” I whined, to utterly deaf, indifferent ears. “I don’t even have my make-up or shampoo because I’m not allowed to take it in my carry-on!”

She started at me blankly, waiting for my tantrum to end, waiting for me to realize I wasn’t special and that my problems didn’t matter to her at all. When I looked down, I noticed that she was handing me a small black nylon bag with a zipper and the United Airlines logo on it. Inside was a collection of travel-sized toiletries.

I took the bag and my laptop case, the only possessions I had with me anymore, and slinked away dejectedly, muttering “thank you” with total insincerity. As I walked over to the departure zone to meet my shuttle, I passed a statue of George W. Bush, for whom Houston’s airport is named. I took it as an omen that my mission would fail.

Chapter 4: Answers Lacking

If any part of your uncertainty is a struggle between your heart and your mind, follow your mind.

—Ayn Rand, Atlas Shrugged

At the hotel, I had tried calling Leopold with a long-distance calling card, using the phone number he had given me. It rang and rang with that odd, nervous ring they use in the British telephone system. But nobody picked up. There was no voicemail or anything. I had never called the number before, as I had no reason to. All of our correspondence had been through email except for that one Skype conversation.

I checked the number in my email archives twice using my laptop and the hotel’s Wi-Fi. I was certain I was dialing correctly. I even used Google to make sure I was punching the city and country codes right. I was. I slept for a few hours, and then tried again at dawn, which was 11 AM in England. But there was still no answer.

So I had no choice but to give up on that. I logged into my email again, and was surprised to find nothing from him there either. I wrote him a message telling him what had happened, and asked him to make sure my greeting party was aware of my new arrival time. I then hurried down to have breakfast in café at the hotel lobby, as I had not found anything to eat since the previous morning.

While I ate my raisin bran, I used my laptop to check the news. A toolbar at the top of my browser that points out significant anniversaries for each date reminded me that it was “Spy Wednesday,” a name for the Wednesday before Easter. Finding this interesting, I clicked on the link provided, which lead to a Wikipedia article.

As I suspected, the definition of the word “spy” being used in this instance is the verb form meaning “to ambush or ensnare,” because this is the day on which, they say, Judas Iscariot betrayed Jesus. The Catholics observe this day with the Tenebrae (“Darkness”) liturgy, in which they gradually extinguish all the candles on the altar. When the last one is out, and the church is completely dark, the Strepitus is performed. This is a loud crashing sound, often made by the priest abruptly shutting a large Bible, that is made to mimic the earthquake traditionally said to have occurred at the moment of Christ’s death. Tenebrae was originally written to be performed on Good Friday, the anniversary of that death, and is still in some places, while in others it is performed the day before, on Maundy Thursday.

This reminded me of an image I’d seen in Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall’s 1818 treatise Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum, which I’d had translated from the Latin and published last year along with my own “Baphomet” book. It was from a ceremonial stone bowl, one of the many “Templar artifacts” he’d discovered in churches in Europe located on their former properties. It showed a naked woman kneeling on the ground between two images of a figure identified on several of the artifacts as “Mete,” a hermaphrodite entity. The woman was pouring water out of a vase onto the candles of a candelabrum called a “seven-branch” (what the Jews call a menorah).

According to Church Fathers Clement and Philo, both of Alexandria, the flames on the seven-branch represent the seven classical planets recognized in antiquity. The symbolism of this ceremony seems a bit like what Mohammed did by reducing the number of idols in the Islamic Kaaba from 360 to just one, a stone representing the monotheistic God. In the Tenebrae, all but one of the “heavenly lights” once worshiped by pagan man were put out except for one (representing the Sun, with the Sun re-baptized as Jesus Christ).

Hammer-Purgstall thought that the Templars were secret devotees of Ophite Gnosticism, a Greco-Roman mystery cult that viewed creation as a prison controlled by the power of illusion. The goal of their rituals was to dethrone the rulers of fate, seen as being identical with the visible “planets” of the ancients, among which the Sun and the Moon were included at the time (the others being Mercury, Mars, Venus, Jupiter and Saturn).

“Archons” above so that they could break out of the jail. The Archons were the

Each Archon was viewed to rule one of the “heavens” defined by what we now call its “orbit.” These seven heavens were thought to be stacked above the earthly realm, as though in a layer cake, each another layer of confinement, keeping our souls locked away from the source of pure spirit, accessible somewhere beyond the sphere of Saturn.

Jehovah, the god of the Bible, was thought by Gnostics to merely be one of these Archons, identifiable with Jupiter, a.k.a. Jove, whom the Greeks called Zeus.

His mother, the Gnostic wisdom goddess Sophia-Achamoth, was added to the seven to form the Ogdoad—the Eight. Hammer-Purgstall thought that Sophia-Achamoth was worshiped by the Knights Templar in the form of "Baphomet" or

"Mete."

This latter name, he thought, could be traced back to the Greek figure of Metis, the first bride of Zeus. She played a very important role initiating and upholding his rule as king of the gods. Like "Sophia," her name translated directly to "wisdom," specifically "cunning," "prudence" and "wise counsel." To understand what happened to her, we have to go all the way back to the "Genesis" story of Greek mythology.

Zeus was the son of Chronos, who had to castrate his father Ouranos in order to escape the womb of his mother, Gaia. Ouranos had deliberately prevented his children from being born, cognizant that one of them was fated to overthrow him as the king of the gods. When Chronos later engendered his own children with his wife Rhea, he became aware of a similar fate that was to come from one of these progeny. So he devised his own way of dealing with it by swallowing them upon birth.

But just as Gaia had schemed against her husband to aid her son Chronos in fulfilling his destiny (by supplying his with the castration knife), Rhea came up with a plan to save her son Zeus from ending up in his father's stomach. In this case, she substituted the baby with a decoy in the form of a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes. Later, they say, Zeus found a way to poison his father, causing him to vomit up all the other children that had already been swallowed. Zeus and his siblings then fought their way to supremacy, overthrowing Chronos. The clever witch who conceived the poison plot was the goddess Metis, Hammer-Purgstall’s “Mete,” whom Zeus subsequently married.

As the story goes, Zeus, just like his predecessors, gained knowledge of a prophecy that if he bred with Metis, one of the children would overthrow him.

Having already consummated the wedding and impregnated her, his solution was to swallow the mother before the birth even happened. He was able to do this, some say, by tricking her into turning herself into a fly, so that she was small enough to go inside his mouth. However, other depictions of the act show him eating her limb by limb at full size.

Whichever way it happened, as with the Olympian gods in the gullet of Chronos, Metis was immortal, so she remained alive inside Zeus. Eventually she gave birth to a daughter, the wise Athena. Metis worked from within Zeus’ body to hammer out a coat of armor for her daughter to wear. The hammering caused Zeus discomfort, and so he had his head cleaved open to alleviate the pressure.

This allowed Athena to escape.

She went on to become an important goddess to the Greeks, associated, like her mother, with wisdom. But for some reason Metis did not escape with her daughter, and remained inside Zeus. He reportedly utilized her as a source of wise council during his reign, and she was often depicted supporting his throne from underneath, propping it up, like a royal slave.

What a raw deal, I thought as I ponder these stories again. I wonder what kept her from leaving with Athena. Was it the chains?

On the Mete coffer, the goddess was shown holding a pair of chains. The Sun was shown attached to the top of one chain, and the Moon to the other, with the solar and lunar faces shown upside-down. These chains also appear to have been shackled to Mete's legs. The image seemed to me to be showing her in the midst of breaking the chains from her ankles while simultaneously dragging the heavenly bodies down from the sky.

Was the destruction of the Archontic order Mete's revenge for being imprisoned and enslaved by Zeus? I wondered. The Gnostics saw Sophia-Achamoth as a heroine trying to help them escape the jail of illusory existence.

Maybe the idea is that she's trapped inside here with the rest of us, so her escape is also our chance for escape.

On the "Templar artifact" that featured the candelabra being extinguished, the figure of Mete on the right is holding the chains (without the heavenly bodies included), which the horned figure of Mete on the left is holding a banner displaying Arabic writing. Hammer-Purgstall's translation of this writing includes the phrases "Mete is exalted" and "one and seven were our race," referring, he thought, to the Gnostic belief that Sophia-Achamoth was the mother of the other seven Archons.

If Mete is exalted, I thought, that means that she's somehow escaped from inside Zeus. But how? Maybe through the rectum?

The reason I thought about this was not just because it's the only obvious way out if one's been swallowed. It also occurred to me because another phrase written in Arabic on Mete's banner next to the candelabra is: "He makes return easy through the rectum." Hammer-Purgstall hadn't really deciphered the meaning of this, except to identify it as being related to the rumored Templar rites of sodomic pederasty, now confirmed because of their confessions to the Pope, documented in the Chinon Parchment released by the Vatican in 2007. But now, as I pondered this, I wondered if that was why the Sun and Moon were shown upside-down.

Perhaps it is really Mete who is upside-down, I thought, coming out through the rear exit. Maybe that's the meaning of the message he found on the back of the idol of Mete carrying a baby.

I was thinking about yet another "Templar artifact" depicted in a line drawing in Hammer-Purgstall's work. It showed a figure of uncertain sex in a hooded robe holding an infant.

On the back of the idol, Hammer-Purgstall reported that there was a message written in code. It was in Greek, but with Arabic letters, and transposed out of order. When decoded, they spelled out this message: Omnipotent Mete sprouting, a debauched woman springs up for our race through prokton .

Prokton in the Greek word for anus.

Then another meaning of the inverted Sun and Moon (or, in the alternative interpretation, Mete shown hanging upside-down) also occurred to as I sat there thinking. I had written in The Baphomet Papers that what we call "Satanism" was largely influenced by Gnosticism and its spiritual war against the creator of this physical universe. This is where the Satanic principle of inverting Judeo-Christian symbols, prayers, and rituals came from. I argued that the Knights Templar may have themselves been the originators of this tradition, considering their secret initiation rite of urinating on the cross and denying Christ, again confirmed through recently-revealed non-coerced confessions of the knights. With this in mind, I thought of a new idea.

I combed through files on my computer until I found folder with the Hammer-Purgstall pictures, including the lid of the Mete coffer, the picture of the hooded idol holding the baby, and the image the naked lady pouring water on the candles in-between the two Metes. I looked at them both with contemplation.

While the Tenebrae is a Christian ritual, the one illustrated on Hammer-Purgstall's "Templar artifact" was, according to him, a more Gnostic interpretation of it. He related it to the fact that Church Fathers (Justin Martyr in particular, for instance) had accused Gnostics of practicing a blasphemous rite called "the Upsetting of the Lamps."

If this is truly a depiction of a Templar rite, I thought, it was undoubtedly meant as a sacrilegious celebration of the destruction the Archons. They might have even done the whole Tenebrae as an overtly Satanic black mass, snuffing out the light of the Sun too, and thus killing Christ, according to the symbolism.

As I finished my breakfast at the hotel restaurant, I decided to move on to the Drudge Report for the day's headlines. I found that the previous day there had been yet another precipitous fall in the value of the pound. You may recall that this had been happening ever since the government had decided to essentially nullify the meaning of Britain's plan to exit from the European Union.

They had put it off indefinitely in a state of declared emergency that everyone assumed would never be lifted.

This was good for my exchange rate while visiting, but bad for the natives, I knew. What was worse, the government refused to acknowledge the obvious cause of the instability, blaming it instead on the recent string of homegrown terrorist attacks in the name of ISIS, necessitating yet more police state expansion.

In the UK, from what I read, everyone was actually pining for a royal decree to overrule the elected government, which had so clearly been derelict in its duty to honor the will of the people. The newest Prime Minister was even more faithless than the last. But although the Queen hadn't been seen in over three months, she still occasionally signed documents, and appeared to be set to live forever. She was rumored to be bedridden on something akin to life support, albeit still conscious.

People such as me, persistent hounds of alternative news data, had kept up on the rumors. However, the topic was being censored in the mainstream news, and all major social media platforms had placed it on the ever-growing list of forbidden topics. If the rumors were true, I knew, then the Queen was unlikely to be leading any revolutions against the government on behalf of her beleaguered subjects.

As I read the news, I compulsively reloaded my email, hoping to get word from Leopold, who by now should have noticed that I hadn’t arrived on time. But it was in vain. He said nothing. Another phone call placed from my room again yielded no results. Eventually I boarded the shuttle, rode through a giant forest of floating roof tanks filled with petroleum products, and then boarded another plane.

Although I stayed on the aircraft for another fifteen hours, with two stops along the way, the rest was a much smoother ride than the first leg. I had the entire row to myself, so I got to stretch out and rest. I used the bathroom whenever I wanted. They fed us a couple of meals and showed us a movie, the new remake of Zardoz. I hate remakes, so I didn’t put the headphones on to listen. Instead, I laid on the seats and tried not to wonder if Leopold Black had gotten my message yet.

Chapter 5: Terribilis est Locus Iste

Boasting a prime location and unbeatable prices, the Regent Palace is easily one of the best value lodgings in London. Within minutes of entertainment, fine dining and shopping venues, the hotel is attractive to both business and leisure guests seeking the ultimate bargain.

Accommodations all consist of colour TV, direct dial telephone and wash basin and of the 888 rooms within the hotel, 385 have their own en-suite bathroom.

My fake-it-‘til-you-make-it false bravado had kept me going through this inauspicious adventure so far. But that began to fade when I was finally able to take my phone out of Airplane Mode and into Sprint Global Roaming. I used the Gmail app to check my email. When I found that there was still no answer from Leopold Black, and my heart began to sink.

I was actually wondering if this had all been an elaborate and expensive joke, in which several thousand pounds had been spent just to waste my time.

The fear must have been apparent on my ashen face because as I went through customs, the young white English lady who interrogated me about my business in the UK gave me special attention.

“Are you alright?” she said, looking me over with suspicion. She stared straight into my eyes to intimidate me, forcing me to stare back. “Your face looks very … pale.”

Well, I am naturally quite pale, and I must have looked even more so as I stood there in front of her. But I got the feeling that she actually thought I might be wearing heavy make-up to hide a darker complexion. I could feel her trying to “unmask” me with her eyes. Then she just came right out and said it.

“Frankly you look a bit off.”

Now I could feel myself getting angry. Off what? I thought. Off my rocker? I couldn’t let it boil over, though, as this was a delicate situation. I knew she was just being vigilant because of the stabbings by ISIS agents that had happened at Gatwick, the other London airport, a week previous. I thought of a way to express my annoyance that would surely shut her up and allow me to be on my way.

“Ma’am,” I said, “are you telling me that you find me suspicious because of the color of my skin?”

Her face curled up into the trademark regretful half-smile of white guilt.

This look is usually only given to ethnic minorities who have just been subjected to special scrutiny because of their race, only to be found innocent. I returned it with the most genuine smile I could muster, and reached out to take back my passport from her after she finished stamping it.

As I made my way to the baggage claim area, I searched fruitlessly for the sight of a chauffer holding a sign that said “Pamela Auger.” But none was forthcoming. I watched all the luggage from my transcontinental flight circle around the conveyor belt 15 or 20 times. After determining that my suitcase was not on it, I filed a report with United Airlines staff and made my way out to the taxi stand, wondering what the Hell I was going to do next.

I got into a black taxi with a Pakistani driver. We drove for about forty minutes to get to my hotel. Thankfully he did not make any small talk.

Instead he listened to endlessly looped reports about the currency crisis and the latest ISIS attacks in Europe on Sky News radio while he muttered under his breath about the traffic. London was in many ways just how I remembered it from previous trips there, but the vibe was a bit more intense. As we passed 10 Downing Street, I saw soldiers with machine guns.

Twice we went through tollbooths on the way. When we got to the first one, the driver asked me if I had any cash to pay it. I told him I didn’t have any local currency yet, so he charged it to my card with the rest of my fare. I was glad I had insisted that Leopold pay three grand up front. If I had come there with only my own means to support me, I wouldn’t have even been able to finish the cab ride. Piety had come to me as of late, and so I thanked God that I was OK so far, even though I wondered, as I always have, which god I was praying to.

I was even more grateful to this unknown deity when I found that my room was still reserved for me. As I checked into the Regent Palace, where plaques on the wall proudly boasted of the building’s historical significance, I anticipated enjoying a shower, a nap and room service in what I thought would be opulence, judging from the elegant décor of the lobby. I was ready to flop down immediately, but found I had to walk up several flights of stairs. Someone was presently stuck in the elevator, and a half-dozen firemen were working to try to rescue them.

When I finally reached the seventh floor, room 729, I was breathless. I shoved the key in the hole (for they still used metal keys in this old building).

When I stumbled in, I just about tripped over the narrow bed. It actually looked like a prison cot. And the room was barely big enough to hold it. In fact, the bed was the only thing in the room. There was no furniture, and no space for any. If I had brought my suitcase, I don't know where I would have put it.

"Oh my God," I said out loud to myself. "Are you kidding me?" I couldn't believe that the Baron of Alphamstone and his friends at the WSB were so cheap that they booked me for such a terrible place.

Despite my shock, I really needed to pee. So I located the bathroom, which was accessible through a narrow door that stood right next to the foot of the bed.

There were two steps leading up to it because the floor of the bathroom was raised up about a foot higher than the main room.

It was about the size of an airplane restroom. There was a small toilet, and a little pedestal sink with a tiny basin that sort of hovered over the toilet seat.

Next, to it was a diminutive shower with a tile floor and a plain blue plastic curtain. It reminded me of a shower I used at a campground in Ohio once.

After I had washed and relieved myself, I went back into the main room, put on my dirty clothes again, and opened the window. It only opened about an inch, and the only view was of the hotel's roof, along with the windows of other upper-floor rooms. The top floors of the building, which I was on, only had rooms around the perimeter. This created a trapezoid-shaped space between them when the building was looked at from an aerial view, as I discovered later from looking at the site on Google Earth. The window had been fixed to only open an inch so as to prevent people from walking out on the roof.

I suppose it should not have surprised me, considering the state of the other accommodations, when I realized that the hotel did not have any Wi-Fi available. When I couldn't find a signal, I used the gray 1950s-era rotary phone attached to the wall to call down to the lobby. When they told me there was no internet, I tried calling Leopold again, and again got no answer. Since I could clearly accomplish nothing from my hotel room, I packed up my laptop and headed out into the streets of London.

Chapter 6: Eros and Anteros

Love is the law, love under will. Nor let the fools mistake love; for there are love and love. There is the dove, and there is the serpent. Choose ye well!

—Aleister Crowley, The Book of the Law

I walked out of my hotel and into the throngs. It was still mid-morning, and there were people out everywhere. The lady at the front desk had told me there was a bank across the street where I could use the ATM. I looked, and my chest instinctively constricted with fear as I saw the familiar logo of Barclays, the company that called me three times a day regarding my 3000-pound debt to the British Museum. But I needed cash and I figured there was no real danger in using their ATM.

I walked over and used the machine to extract 100 pounds from my bank account. I then stepped into the corner shop next door and bought a bottle of Orangina to break one of the 20-pound notes. I had the Indian kid at the counter pour the resulting 20+ coins weighing approximately one metric fuckton into the outside pocket of my laptop case. My shoulder smarted under the weight, and my body leaned right to compensate.

“When are they going to make a one-pound note, for God’s sake?,” I muttered to myself.

I walked out of the store and immediately noticed a statue of Cupid standing on top of a fountain at Piccadilly Circus, which was directly in front of me. I decided to sit underneath it while I looked at a London Underground map that I had gotten from the front desk at Regent Palace. I was trying to figure out how to get to the Houses of Parliament on the tube.

The place where I sat happened to be next to a plaque that explained the statue. As it turned out, it was actually a figure of Anteros, the brother of Eros (the Greek version of Cupid). He was the god of “counter-love,” and he bore butterfly wings instead of the cherubic wings of his brother. This, as Wikipedia explained to me on my phone for 20 cents a minute, was taken by most to mean that he was the god who punished unrequited love. In other words, if you were in love with somebody and they didn’t love you back, you could call on him to get revenge.

My sixth sense for occult symbolism started to itch at the sight of this explanation. It just didn’t seem complete. It felt to me like a cover story to hide the dirty truth, as I so often found whenever I dug beneath the surface of folklore and mythology.

The interpretation offered by the designer of the fountain was even more tame, calling Anteros the “god of selfless love.” It was supposedly meant to be a monument to Lord Shaftesbury, a Peer of the Realm and philanthropist from the late nineteenth century. He had worked all his life to improve the lot of miners, children working in factories, and lunatics living in asylums. The statue was meant to represent his love for people who could not return his love.

This struck me as an odd, awkward and forced metaphor. Why conflate charitable and reformist work with something that is obviously an erotic symbol?

In fact, at the time it had been installed, there had been many objections to its “pagan sensuality.” Most people in modern times still assume that Shaftesbury Fountain is a statue of Eros when they see it.

As if to underscore this, there was even an adult theater called “Eros Cinema” that had once stood right in front of the statue. Indeed, the entire corner had been a haven for burlesque parlors, dirty movies, and prostitution. There was even a debunked rumor going around that “Piccadilly” was an old word for prostitution in some language.

The most significant aspect of the statue, as far as I was concerned, was the arrow he was aiming with him bow. Because Lord Shaftesbury made most of his reformist efforts through the House of Lords, the arrow in Anteros' bow had been designed to aim directly at Parliament, just where I was headed. I decided that was no coincidence, and that I had better be on about my business.

When I looked again at the tube map, however, I found that there was no train going directly there from the Piccadilly station. I would have to either walk to another station or take a series of trains. So I decided once again to rely on Google, and found that it was better for me to take bus number 159 by walking over to the corner of Haymarket and Orange Street.

I stood up and began to walk east down Coventry Street. Then I took a right to go south on Haymarket, and my eyes were instantly drawn to another interesting landmark. It was right in front of the doors of the Criterion Theater, underneath the balcony. Again it was a statue decorating a fountain, this one of four horses all reeling back on their hind legs. The inscription on the fountain identified them as the "Horses of Helios," the sun god.

I took a picture of it with my phone and walked on. But I kept looking behind me. It was as if I could feel their eyes on me—the horses, that is. After walking about two blocks, I saw the red double-decker I was looking for headed my way. One block ahead was my bus stop, marked with a sign, which I reached just in time. No one else was there, but the driver spotted me and pulled over. I asked her to announce my stop, and she said she would.

It wasn't very crowded, but I remained standing behind the driver so that I could watch for my stop. Seven minutes later I was at Westminster Station, on Parliament Street. I walked to the corner of Bridge Street and saw Big Ben up ahead on the left—or, more properly, Elizabeth Tower, as "Big Ben" is really the name of one of the bells inside.

I crossed the street to the corner that the clock tower was on, then followed the crowd to an opening in the fence where people were walking back and forth. Up ahead, I saw a man walking in through one of the doors in a corner of the building, right beneath the clock. So I followed him, walking past a hedged enclosure with an opening in the side. As I went past I saw a fountain featuring statues of an emaciated unicorn and several other macabre-looking heraldic creatures.

When I got to the door, I was rebuffed by a security guard, who told me that "strangers" had to enter through St. Stephen's Gate down the street. So I walked back past the hedges and turned left when I got to the sidewalk. I went on until I saw the statue of Oliver Cromwell on my left that the security guard had told me to look for.

There I turned left onto the walkway that led directly to the visitors' entrance. I walked down a ramp towards a vaulted doorway, in front of which there were two security guards wearing plastic gloves. They frisked me and searched my laptop case. Then they let me in.

I entered a giant, empty hall with stone floors and a huge vaulted ceiling made of carved wood. I then turned left to go up some stone steps and through an arched wooden doorway with a clock above it that led to "St. Stephen's Hall."

This was a corridor where the walls were covered with beautiful full-color murals of scenes from British history, and stained-glass windows depicting more such scenes above that.

All along the walls were white stone statues of important Englishmen, including some inset into the walls in the corner, and stone benches covered with leather the color of Brunswick green. Brilliant chandeliers hung from the ceiling.

At the end of this hall was another vaulted doorway underneath yet another clock, which led to the "Central Lobby."

I went through the door and emerged into an octagonal room situated underneath an amazing gold-covered mosaicked dome. There were more stained-glass windows beneath the dome, and many more statues set into the wall. Then I looked down to see a giant black eight-pointed star in the middle of the mosaic floor, composed of two squares at opposite angles. The points of one of the squares were aligned with each of four corridors that led elsewhere, including the one I had just come out of. The points of the other square were aligned with statues set between these, presumably of important British politicians from the past.

I strolled up to the secretary's desk in the corner to my left. Behind it stood a white man in a black suit with a white blouse and a black bowtie. He was talking on a black desk phone. I waited for him to finish his conversation. After a few seconds, he looked up at me, put his hand over the receiver, and asked what he could do for me. I told him that I was a friend of one of the lords, the Baron of Alphamstone.

“Can you buzz his office to see if he's there?” I said hopefully.

“Excuse me,” the man replied, looking very confused. “The Baron of Alphamstone?”

“Yes, Leopold Black,” I said. “Please see if he's in. If not, I'll leave a message.”

When he heard the words “Leopold Black,” he raised his eyebrows.

“Can I have your name please?” he said.

“Sure,” I replied. “My name is Pamela Auger. He knows who I am.”

“Would you have a seat on one of the benches please?” he then asked. He started talking into his phone again.

He had pointed to my left at a blue leather bench, one of several lining the walls. It was right behind a statue of some guy named William Ewart Gladstone, and underneath a smaller statue that was set into the wall. I sat down there, and turned around to check out the statue above me.

But then I heard footsteps approaching, so I turned to look in front of me.

There were two men in their 30s approaching me. One had Persian features and dark hair in a Beatles cut. The other one was white and ginger, with curls and a mustache. They were both wearing gray suits of slightly different shades.

“Ms. Auger,” said the Indian. “Would you come with us, please? We’d like to speak to you about the person calling himself ‘the Baron of Alphamstone.’”

Chapter 7: Regnum Defende

Nobody was really sure if he was from the House of Lords.

—The Beatles, A Day in the Life

The food served to MPs and their guests at the Terrace Café in the House of Commons, where I was taken by my two new friends from the Security Services, seemed rather plebian, a bit like the lunches served to kids in public schools in the US. However, I was assured by Agent Paris and Agent Chesterfield that the ingredients were high quality, local, and completely free of GMOs. I picked out some lasagna, and both men ordered a sandwich, with coffees all around.

Chesterfield, the redhead with the thin mustache, insisted on paying.

We sat outside on the terrace overlooking the River Thames, right next to the café, a sort of black-and-white-striped tented structure with glass walls. The two agents took seats across the table from me, with their backs to the river, so that I could enjoy the view. The giant Ferris wheel, the London Eye, was spinning in the distance off to my left.

I didn’t know what to say, and I didn’t know what they were going to say.

But it seemed likely they were going to tell me there was something phony about Leopold after all. Therefore, I would likely never see the rest of the money he had promised me.

Whatever they were going to say, it was going to be a let-down. I was already embarrassed that I had let myself be fooled somehow. I braced myself for bad news and nervously picked at my lasagna. It was extremely bland, if it’s possible for blandness to be extreme. Paris noticed the look on my face when I took my first bite.

“Is this your first time in England?” He looked me straight in the eye, penetratingly, and I knew that he knew what I was thinking.

They just don’t use spices in this country for some reason.

I don’t know how I knew, but I just knew that he knew, and that he knew I knew. The words that I was thinking were being transmitted directly into his brain, and it was as though I could see them reflected in his eyes. This is a bad rapport to establish with a government agent who is about to interrogate you. I looked at the river to break the eye contact. A cruise ship drifted by, packed with tourists.

“No,” I said. “I’ve been here once before, as a teenager. Family holiday.”

“So what’s your business here now?” Chesterfield asked directly.

“Research,” I answered. “I mainly want to have a look at some of the museums. I’m a writer.”

“Oh yes, I’ve seen,” said Chesterfield, grinning. “Dan Brown kinda stuff.

Occult mysteries and such.” He showed me his phone, a Samsung Galaxy, which was open to an amazon.com page with all of my books listed.

“Dan Brown writes fiction,” I replied, cold. But I should have just let it go.

Don’t offer them any information, I reminded myself. And don’t let that Persian guy read your mind.

“So what’s your business with ‘the Baron of Alphamstone’?” Paris asked with a sneer, making finger quotes. Forced to look back in his direction, I concocted something on the spot, knowing he wouldn’t believe me.

“I was supposed to interview him about his family history. They’re supposedly related to the Merovingians. Dan Brown kinda stuff.”

I returned my gaze to the redhead, whose stare was less invasive and yet somehow more charming, more seductive, perhaps because he seemed safer. But I knew I shouldn't let down my guard with him either. I drank some of my coffee.

It was cold already, and watery, with a grimy sediment on the bottom.

Chesterfield cleared his throat and prepared to lecture to me.

"Alphamstone, my dear, is a village in Essex with less than 100 residents. It is not associated with a barony. The man you are calling 'the Baron of Alphamstone' is actually Thomas Weir, a man whose been living on benefits for over 20 years because of 'psychological disabilities.'"

He made finger quotes too. I noticed his left middle finger was shorter than the others. I stared at it. The tip was missing.

"Wood shop accident," Paris said behind me, showing off that he was reading my thoughts again. "Frankly he's so clumsy I don't know why they ever let him on the service." He chuckled.

"Oh, puff off," said Chesterfield, waving his butchered hand at his colleague as if to dismiss him.

"I don't understand," I said. "There's a page about Leopold Black, Baron of Alphamstone on the official Parliament website."

"He's not a peer," Paris insisted. "He's not noble at all. He just pretends to be so he can sell fake fancy titles to credulous foreigners. Especially Americans.

They're a gullible lot when it comes to this stuff. Even you, and you're an investigator."

He wagged his finger at me as if to chastise me. He was openly demonstrating the fact that he was fully aware of what kind of writer I was, unlike his partner, who played dumb.

“Well he never sold any titles to me,” I said, ignoring his slight. “I never gave him any money. In fact …”

I stopped. Better not mention the lecture, I thought, or the Oriental Club, the Worshipful Society of Butchers, the money he’d sent me, nor the fact that he-- or they--had paid for my trip. Better not even think it.

“Was he paying you for something?” Paris asked. Of course. He had picked up on my thoughts.

“No,” I replied, assuming that as a non-citizen I had no real obligation to tell them the truth about something that was surely none of their business. I opened my laptop, found the open Wi-Fi from the cafe, and tried to load the Baron’s page on the Parliament website. To my surprise, I got a 404 not found!

“I don’t understand!” I said. “It was there just a couple of days ago!”

“Let me see,” said Chesterfield. He leaned over my right shoulder, and put his left hand on the back of my chair to steady himself. Then he pressed in closer and pointed at the domain name at the top of the page.

“That’s not the official Parliament website. It’s two letters off.” He put his thumb on the touchpad and the backspace, then shortened the url to what should have been the index page. It was 404 too. The entire website was gone.

“He hired someone to make a fake version of the Parliament website with an entry about him in it. The real one is parliament.uk, not co.uk.”

I felt like a total dumbass. Oh, how he fooled me! I thought. And I took money from him, in notable amounts! Where did he get it? From selling titles? Is that how he was able to rent out the Oriental Club so he could shoot that video conference with me? All this time he was just a jobless conman?

My head was full of questions, but I certainly couldn’t ask these two guys.

In fact, I felt that I needed to lose them right away so that I could get to the bottom of things on my own.

“Well lads, thank you for revealing the truth to me,” I said. “I feel pretty stupid. But I guess it’s better I find out now rather than after I write a book or an article based on something he told me.” I closed my laptop and started to pack it away, signaling that I was ready for them to let me go.

“I guess I’ll just move on to my real reason for being here, which is the museums, as I said.” I stood up to leave.

“Oh we can take you!” said Chesterfield. He actually grabbed my wrist to keep me from leaving. “Which one are you going to first?” He smiled at me, and then self-consciously softened his grip on me for a second before dropping it completely. Paris shot him a disapproving glance.

You dirty bastard.

I read the thoughts, as he intended me to.

“The British Museum, of course,” I replied.

“Well let’s go then,” said Chesterfield, lightly brushing my lower spine with his left hand as he pushed my chair back in for me. “Can I carry your case?”

“No thank you,” I said.

The contact between his hand and my back created some kind of electrical charge that radiated through the rest of my body and left me feeling flushed. I knew that he was trying to charm me, probably using sophisticated conversational hypnosis techniques, and it was working. Worst of all was the feeling that Agent Paris knew exactly what was happening and was laughing at me for it. I looked, and sure enough, he had a sneering grin on his face as he regarded me.

I waited with Chesterfield outside in the Old Palace Yard while Paris walked down Millbank to the “Q-Park” on the other side of the Abingdon Street Gardens to pick up their car. As we stood there, Chesterfield asked about my books. I gave him vague answers, not willing to make the effort to describe my work to a newbie

He didn’t seem to mind. He just kept smiling at me. He tried to get me to give him my email, purportedly so that he could buy some of my books directly from me. But when I put him off by telling him just to get them from Amazon, he changed his tactic.

“Look, the truth is that the Security Services have an ongoing investigation on this Weir fellow,” he said, suddenly acting serious.

“Who?” I had forgotten the guy’s “real” name.

“The one you called the Baron of Alphamstone! You’re a witness. We may have more questions for you. You’ll have to give us your email, and your address, and your phone number too. There’s some paperwork you’ll have to fill out in the car before we let you go.”

For a moment I found the thought of him calling me in to his office to detaining and interrogate appealing for some reason. I chalked it up to the mind control tactics he and his partner were both using.

Must be something they teach you in training, I thought.

We heard a honk as a black Vauxhall Astra Elite, recent model, pulled up in front of us. The doors unlocked. Chesterfield opened the rear door and gestured gallantly for me to enter. Then he boorishly slid in right beside me instead of taking the passenger seat in the front as I would have expected him to.

He stared at me lasciviously, an evil gleam in his green eyes and his red eyebrows cocked at a devilish angle. I was sure he was going to grab my pussy right there, Trump-style. But instead he reached into a pocket on the back of the seat in front of me and pulled out a packet of carbon-copy forms for me to fill out.

“Put your contact info here, initial here, and sign here,” he said. “You’re just acknowledging that you voluntarily answered our questions, and that you weren’t forcibly detained.” He said that last part with far too much enjoyment.

It took 15 minutes to get to the museum. We had to cross the river twice, and pay a toll. We first crossed to the other side via the Lambeth Bridge, and as we turned on it, they both proudly pointed out to me their agency’s headquarters, a building called Thames House located further on down Millbank.

“So did Weir actually make an appointment to meet with you in the House of Lords today?” Paris asked as he drove. It was the first real question either of them had asked me.

“No,” I said. “He just told me to look him up there next time I was in town. I guess he never expected that I’d actually show up.”

“When’s the last time you spoke to him?” Paris queried.

“Probably a week ago,” I said truthfully. My lies were getting sloppy.

“So you told him you were coming to London to do research?” Paris inquired.

“Well, yes,” I said. I couldn’t think of a way around it.

“But you didn’t make a specific appointment to meet?” Paris pressed.

“No, just an informal agreement,” I replied. “I just said I’d drop by sometime, that’s all.” I was hoping he wouldn’t probe further.

“So did you talk to him on the phone?” Paris asked.

“No, just email,” I told him. I didn’t want to mention the Skype conversation, or the phone number he’d given me where nobody ever answered.

“Well, said Chesterfield, tenderly grabbing my hand and folding my fingers around a business card. “Here’s my number, if you remember anything that might be useful to us. Especially if he contacts you again. Don’t tell him that we spoke, or that you found out the truth about him. Try to make an appointment with him, and then let us know where you’re going to meet.”

I looked at the card. It had the Regnum Defende MI5 logo with a dragon-tailed lion surrounded by portcullises and pentagonal rose symbols. It was a good thing Her Majesty had these two fine men to defend her realm from the mischievous conmen trying to sell titles to fake baronies. I mentally laughed at the ridiculous situation I now found myself in.

“Sure thing!” I said. The car came to a stop in front of the south entrance of the museum, with its massive columned pediment in the style of ancient Greece. I managed to get out of the car somewhat smoothly without making further promises or giving away any more information. But not before Chesterfield kissed my hand ridiculously, causing his partner to shake his head in embarrassment.

The car sped off as soon as I shut the door. I walked quickly through the courtyard and up the large steps to the doorway, eager to get out of open view as quickly as possible.

Chapter 8: Non Sequitur

The great secret of magic, the unique and incommunicable Arcana, has for its purpose the placing of supernatural power at the service of the human will in some way.

To attain such an achievement it is necessary to KNOW what has to be done, to WILL what is required, to DARE what must be attempted and to KEEP SILENT with discernment.

— Eliphas Levi, The Great Secret Having finally shaken loose of my interrogators, I wandered through grand halls filled with the greatest treasures in the world in a blind daze, hardly noticing any of it. After paying my donation to get in, I entered a large open court with an egg-shaped reading room carving out a large chunk of space in the middle. The first room I saw to my left was full of Egyptian stuff. I sat on a blond wooden bench underneath a gigantic broken bust of Ramesses II and tried to collect my thoughts.

So Leopold is a fraud. Where is he now? Have the police and MI5 already questioned him? Presumably he hasn't been arrested yet. But perhaps they shut him down, or he shut himself down, realizing the game was over. But what was the game?

The agents' claims made no sense. Leopold hadn't tried to sell me any titles, which surely would have been the point of faking his membership in a wealthy British gentleman's club. It would have been an expensive ruse.

He had been seeking information from me, rather than trying to convince me of anything. He had spent a considerable amount of money on me, rather than trying to get me to buy anything. He'd lied to me about being a baron and a Peer of the Realm, but without mentioning anything about providing titles for others. So what was the point then?

I was too worked up about all of these questions to take in the museum properly. But that wasn’t really why I was there. I wanted to see for myself the very items of interest which I had travelled all of this way to talk about, but had never actually laid eyes on.

I walked back out into the Great Court and up to the closest information desk. This was a large black circular object near the entrance. Several agents were working there, all wearing uniforms of black pants and blue shirts.

They all were busy with other customers except one on the end. She was an overweight Persian lady in her 20s, with her hair in a messy bun. Her name tag said “Parveen.” I walked up to her.

“Hi,” I said. “I was wondering if you could tell me how to find one of the items in your online catalogue.”

“Certainly,” she said. “What do you know about it?”

“It’s a limestone coffer, item number 1866,1229.143 in the Duc de Blacas Collections,” I said, reading off information from an email accessible on my phone. Parveen typed into her computer.

“Hmm,” she said. “That item number is coming up as not found. Was it donated by Louis de Blacas, or Pierre?”

“Louis, I believe,” I said. She looked disappointed.

“That’s a large collection, unfortunately,” she said. “What else can you tell me about it?”

“Well, it was labeled as having an image of Cybele on the top.”

She typed into her computer some more, presumably using keywords. Then she shook her head sideways again.

“Well, I’m not finding any limestone coffers at all, I’m afraid,” she said.

“Could it be in another collection?”

“That’s impossible,” I said. “I knew it wasn’t on display, but it should still be here.”

“Who told you it was here?” she asked.

“The museum staff!” I answered, feeling frustrated. “Through email! They let me search through the digital catalog until I found it. Then I paid them to take some better photos of it, which they sent me.”

I combed through my Gmail archives until I found an attachment containing the photos of the lid of the Mete coffer. Then I turned my phone around to show Parveen the image of a naked, crowned, and bearded Hermaphrodite gleefully pulling the Sun and the Moon, upside-down and out of the sky with a pair of chains attached to both the heavenly bodies and the ankles of the goddess.

“Cybele is a goddess, not a Hermaphrodite,” Parveen smugly informed me.

“That’s not what Catullus said,” I snapped back, not having time to explain the numerous counter-traditions indicating that the “Magna Mater” or “Great Mother” worshiped by both the Persians and the Romans was originally described as a hermaphrodite that had been castrated and cast out of Olympus by the other gods.

“Anyway it was your museum that labeled it Cybele,” I said.

“And you said you got that photo from us?” she asked, sounding incredulous.

"Yes," I replied. "And I paid this institution to take good photographs, which I published in a book last year for the first time, even though this artifact has been mentioned in books about the Knights Templar with only line drawings available to print for over one hundred and fifty years. I am the one who brought this historical item, which your museum has been sitting on and ignoring, into the light of day. And now I'd like to finally see it."

Parveen wasn't looking at me or my phone anymore. She was typing into her computer again. When I stopped talking, she looked up.

"What did you say your name was?" she asked.

"I didn't say," I told her. "But I'm Pamela Auger. I'm a writer." She hit the keys a few more times.

"Oh yes," she said. "I see that you still have an outstanding balance of 3000 pounds for photograph rights." She smiled a "gotcha" smile, and her eyes gleamed.

"Yes, and the item in the photo that I owe money for the rights to is the one I'm asking you to locate for me right now," I smiled.

Surely she's just an information desk clerk, not a collection agent, I thought.

Her primary job is to help visitors find things they're looking for, not to catch people who owe money to the museum.

"Well, I'll call in the Accounts Receivable department. Maybe they can help us figure out where this coffer is, and I'm sure they can work out some payment arrangements for you. Just a second." She picked up her phone again and smiled evilly.

Have I really pissed her off that much? I thought. All this just because I mentioned that I had made history with an item they'd been ignoring?

My honesty, and perhaps my arrogance as well, was about to screw me out of a chance to see the coffer, and instead drive me straight into the greedy hands of bill collectors. I suddenly wanted to flee.

I turned around with the intention of doing exactly that. But then I bumped into a body in light brown leather cap toe Oxford shoes and a light brown suit that was topped with a familiar old face. It was Leopold Black! At that moment, even though I knew he was a fraud, I was happy to see him.

But what’s he doing here? I wondered.

“I thought I might find you here,” he said. “Looking for the coffer?”

“Yes,” I said. “But they’re having trouble finding it. They seem more interested in talking to me about the money I owe them. And that’s not the strangest thing that’s happened to me today. Why haven’t you been answering the phone?”

I wasn’t sure if I should tell him what I knew or play dumb and pump him for information, as Agent Chesterfield had encouraged me to do. But I desperately wanted to get away from that information desk before Accounts Receivable showed up.

“Well you won’t find it here anymore,” he said. “It’s gone. It’s been stolen.”

“What?” I said, disbelieving him. Despite what Parveen had told me, I couldn’t accept that anything could be stolen from the British Museum without it being a news story. Also, Leopold/Thomas was a known liar.

“Yes, its gone, and we need to get gone too,” he said. “Come with me.”

“OK,” I said. “I’d like to get a decent coffee. I also need to find a clothing store. They lost my luggage, and I’ve been wearing this outfit for three days.”

We headed towards the entrance, but from behind I heard my name being called by a deep male voice.

“Ms. Auger!”

“Walk faster,” said Leopold. “We can’t let them catch us.”

“You mean Accounts Receivable?” I said. “I’m just going to leave. They can’t make me stay.” Still, I did walk faster. The voice called me again.

“Ms. Auger, please come back here for a moment!”

Now I was almost running, panicking, wanting to avoid confrontation.

Leopold kept pace. We sprinted down the steps and across the courtyard, with now two pursuers, whom I saw peripherally to be large men in dark suits, following behind at a steady pace but not running after us.

As we neared the curb of Great Russell Street, Leopold hailed a black car with tinted windows that looked like its arrival was perfectly timed. He opened the back door and basically shoved me in. Before the door closed, I heard that same familiar voice shouting at me from behind us:

“Ms. Auger, we need to talk. There’s something you need to know!”

Leopold shut the door, and the doors locked automatically. That’s when I realized that this was not a taxicab, as there were no meters and no official identification. It was a private car. The driver, a blond guy in his thirties with a dark suit and black bowler hat, took orders from Leopold.

“Take us to the Club, Miles” he said to the driver. Miles nodded and sped off, just as one of the men following us, who I saw to be black and husky, reached for the door handle, and missed. Now my survival instinct kicked in.

“Leopold, I agreed to go down the street for coffee with you, not to get in a private car. Where are you taking me?”

“To the Oriental Club, of course,” he said. “You’re going to make the presentation I hired you to do.” A chill went through me.

Who is this man that I’ve foolishly gotten into a car with, I thought, and what is he going to do to me?

“Actually, I’d like to get out now,” I said. I then addressed the driver. “Can you pull the car over please?”

He ignored me. My fear turned into a full freak-out.

“I demand that you let me out of this car right now!” I screamed. I picked up my phone, though I didn’t know how to call the equivalent of 911 in this country. I didn’t have time to think about who to call because Leopold snatched the phone out of my hand with a forcefulness that surprised me for a man his age.

“Pamela, do not panic, or I will give you a reason to panic,” he said.

What a scary thing to say! I thought.

I unlocked my door and reached for the handle, ready to take my chances and jump out straight onto the pavement below, hoping I could aim for the sidewalk at least instead of being crushed immediately by the car behind us. But Leopold grabbed my hand and pressed something cold and hard against my chest.

I looked down. It was a silver handgun. I sat back, terrified.

“What do you want from me?” I sobbed.

“Just your professional analysis,” he answered. “Now cooperate.”

Chapter 9: Oriental Club

Between South Molton Street & Stratford Place: Calvary’s foot: Where the Vidims were preparing for sacrifice their Cherubim… their inmost palaces Resounded with preparation of animals wild & tame.

—William Blake, Milton

At times like this, you find yourself wishing you’d attached a rider to your contract.

The client must provide his actual legal name. No involuntary transport of my person (kidnapping). No guns or threats of murder. Pick me up at the airport, for Christ’s sake. Return phone calls and emails related to business in a timely manner. And never, ever book me at a hotel room that cannot fit both my body and my suitcase simultaneously. Also, of course, a cancellation clause in case the above requirements are violated.

But no recourse seemed available to me at that time. So I tried to calm myself down, wiping the tears from my puffy, reddened face that had not had the benefit of make-up in days. I concentrated on Leopold’s hands, which I looked at close up for the first time. I noticed that they were both scarred all over and horribly contorted. It was almost as if each phalange had been separated from the others at some point, and then it had all been grafted back together again, badly.

I looked out the window to my left and saw a public park. A sign said

“Hanover Square.” I recalled that this was near where the Oriental Club actually did meet, at some place called Stratford House. But Leopold was holding my phone, so I couldn’t use it to confirm this. I wondered what they were going to do with me, how much it would hurt, and if anyone would find my body. Finally, I turned again to my captor and inquired as to whether the projector and screen had been set up for my PowerPoint presentation.

“You’ll have everything you need,” I was told gruffly.

The car stopped abruptly and pulled up next to the park.

“We walk from here,” Leopold announced. The doors unlocked and he leaned over to pull the handle on my door with his right hand while he grabbed my right wrist with his left hand, which was so gnarly that my skin tried to crawl away from my body as soon as he touched it. He then wrapped his entire arm around mine so that he had firm control of my whole upper body. He pushed me out along with himself, and we emerged stuck together. He then pulled me over to the corner, where we crossed the street after Miles drove off.

I guess we just looked like a typical May-December couple. People walking past us didn’t seem to notice that he was pressing a gun against my side, or that I was under extreme duress. I couldn’t believe that something like this could happen in a large city in broad daylight. But it was happening.

When we got to the other side of the street. Leopold stopped me for a moment and looked around. There was nobody else in our immediate vicinity. In front of us was a multi-purpose office building. I saw a sign for a Lloyd’s TSB bank in the lobby, and next to that, Barclays, again. In my fear and paranoia I tried desperately to understand what was going on. I turned to look at Leopold.

“You don’t work for Barclays do you?” He shook his head sideways and laughed. I realized that didn’t make any sense, especially since he had paid me thousands of dollars and spent thousands more to bring me here.

That’s a silly way to collect a debt, I thought. Just then I felt someone come from behind and grab my left arm. It was Miles. He must have already parked the car.

“This way please,” he said politely as he and Leopold both dragged me off.

They marched me past another building and across Hanover Street, then down a few doors to the left. We paused in front of the glass door of an art gallery with no name, simply labeled with the address, “10 Hanover.” In the middle of the day, it was closed and empty.

There was a touchpad for an alarm. Miles keyed in the code while Leopold held me firm, never loosening his grip on my arm or the pressure of the gun on my ribcage. The door opened and I was ushered inside.

The lights were off, but I could see the main room from the daylight coming through the glass door. I only saw two art pieces on display in the otherwise empty room. One was a giant Band-Aid, about a foot long, stuck to a canvas on the back wall, right next to a staircase leading down. The other was a large square canvas on the wall to my left, maybe 8 feet by 8 feet, painted black with three yellow discs arranged in a downward-pointing triangle formation. Leopold noticed me noticing it.

“What are you thinking?” he asked curiously.

“Oh I was just thinking that this reminds me of an image I saw in a movie once,” I told him.

This whole experience is like being in a movie, I thought to myself.

“Which one?” he prodded.

“I think it was Invocation of My Demon Brother, by Kenneth Anger,” I answered.

“Ah yes, the Aleister Crowley worshipper with the horrible amateur movies that everybody calls ‘art,’” he said.

They shoved me to the left side of the room, around a bend, so that we were now out of sight from the front door. Leopold let me go and gave the gun to Miles, who now pressed it into my back underneath my left shoulder blade.

Leopold lit a cigarette with a zippo. They were Chesterfields. I didn't even know they made Chesterfields anymore! That, of course, made me think fondly of my favorite MI5 agent, wishing he and his partner were there to save me.

"Actually," Leopold explained, "the yellow dots in the Kenneth Anger movie form a downward-pointing triangle. This," he said, jabbing his thumb at the painting behind him, "is based on the coat of arms for William Pitt. There's a statue of him in the park across the street."

He started to walk towards the stairs and then stopped again. He turned around and looked at me, wagging his gnarly index finger at me.

"But see, you were picking up on an Aleister Crowley vibe. That's why I hired you. There's more than just logic and knowledge at work in your brain, though there is that. You're using a sixth sense to do your research too. I've known it for some time. That's why you're the one we need."

He turned around and headed down the stairs. Miles and I followed.

"Why," I asked. "What's this got to do with Aleister Crowley?"

When we reached the bottom of the stairs we were in a dark unfinished basement. I couldn't even see the walls to tell how large it was. Leopold turned towards me and ignited his lighter to illuminate his face.

"Crowley's Astron Argon club had an office in that building down the street, at 10 Hanover Square," he said, pointing back up the stairs. "Or at least, in the building that used to be there."

"But aren't we in 10 Hanover now?" I said, confused. I remembered the address on the front door.

"We're in 10 Hanover Street. The Square is down there, he said, continuing to point. Miles winced.

“It’s OK Miles,” Leopold assured him. “She needs to know these things.

Now, Crowley and his friends had access to the underground tunnel network beneath these streets, which leads to what was once the sub-basement of where the Oriental Club used to meet, at 18 Hanover Square.”

“So not Stratford House?” I inquired.

“That’s right,” he answered. “They moved to Stratford House in the 60s. It’s just a quarter-mile away from here. But before that, Oriental Club was just a few feet away from Astron Argon’s office, right across Hanover Square. Now Crowley spent some time there, not as a dues-paying member, but as a guest. And the person who invited him in, whose name I shall withhold, also shared with him a secret which should not have been disclosed, about the tunnel network. Crowley and his friends then began making nefarious use of the tunnels. We know this because when we were exploring down here, we found one of his secret shrines.”

“What tunnels?” I asked. “And who’s ‘we’?”

“The Worshipful Society of Butchers,” Leopold replied. He walked over to a grimy tile-covered wall, which I could now see only because of the flame from his lighter, and unlatched a hook that had been keeping a thin wooden door closed. It swung open, revealing a toilet, a sink, and an overflowing trash can. Miles let go of me and gave the gun back to Leopold, who held it sticking out towards me. I now had nobody holding me, but I dare not try to run.

Miles pulled the trash can out of the bathroom and into the main room, to get it out of the way. Then he brushed aside the remaining pile of used paper towels, revealing a green wooden hatch door, which he raised. Underneath was a deep shaft, with at least two rungs of a metal ladder visible from the top.

This must be the entrance to the secret network of tunnels they were talking about, I thought.

Miles went down first. Then a few seconds later, Leopold insisted I follow. I put the strap of the laptop case around my neck and let it hang from my back as I climbed down. Leopold extinguished his flame, and waited for me to get to the bottom, still in pitch-darkness. There Miles grabbed me with both hands, and whistled to announce this. Then Leopold descended down the ladder himself.

When he got to the bottom, he flicked his lighter back on temporarily and pointed his gun at me again. Then Miles let go of me, and reached into his coat pocket to pull out a long silver cylinder. It was an LED flashlight, which he turned on, allowing Leopold to put out his lighter and return it to his pocket.

“I’m sorry that I have to point this gun at you,” said Leopold. “But I know that I can’t trust you to cooperate yet.” He pulled something out of his inner coat pocket and snapped it to unfurl it. It was a cloth, like a scarf.

“Turn around,” he said. I complied. He tied the cloth over my eyes. I was completely blind.

“Oh come on,” I said, “I can barely see as it is.”

“There are some details I just can’t trust you with,” he said. “Miles, take her bag please.”

Miles relieved me of my burden, which actually was quite a relief, physically. But now I had to worry about how I was going to get it back. Leopold then grabbed me from behind by the left shoulder.

“Put your arms out to your side, please,” he instructed. I complied, bewildered.

“Forward three paces, please, and through the archway,” Leopold continued.

I walked ahead. After two steps, I felt a wall on either side of me. With a third step I walked through a passageway between them. I stepped into an open room of some sort. I could tell this because there was a change in air pressure, as well as in the acoustics of our footsteps, and a gentle breeze from above.

“Where are we going now?” I said.

“You tell us, my dear Virgil,” he commanded.

“What do you mean?” I asked.

“Directly ahead of you are the entrances to three different corridors that you can go down,” Leopold explained. “Three different avenues all leading to the light. Three different Ways through Strength and Beauty.

“But remember,” he lectured, “these paths all intersect with each other at several points on the journey. So in the long run, there will be numerous opportunities to change the road you are on. Therefore, fear not the outcome.

Simply make a choice, and move ahead. But to make sure that you are perfectly lost, and therefore your choice all the more arbitrary, we shall give you a few spins around, just like a game of pin the tail on the donkey.”

Leopold took me by my left hand, and Miles took me by my right. Then they both began to spin me in a counter-clockwise direction.

Suddenly I understood, at least in part, their purpose for bringing me here.

Leopold had surmised my clairvoyant powers when he realized that I was using intuition and divination tools in my occult research. He had figured out why I had been able to penetrate esoteric mysteries so deeply.

Perhaps he’s also overestimated my powers, I thought, and assumes I can control them. Maybe he doesn’t realize that they work sporadically at best, and aren’t always reliable. Either way, it’s certainly was starting to look like he brought me here to serve as a soothsayer.

“Are you guys trying to use me as a human dowsing rod?” I asked, as I was being turned by them like a corkscrew.

“In a way, yes,” Leopold replied.

They spun me around seven times, at the end of which I was, as they intended, dizzy and completely disoriented. I stumbled forward a few feet. My hands caught the left side of another archway.

“Excellent choice,” said Leopold. “Steady on.”

I walked on through the archway, and into a narrow tunnel, with Leopold’s hand on my shoulder once again. I reckoned that Miles was somewhere behind us.

“Don’t you know where these tunnels lead? Or are you expecting me to tell you? Because I sure as Hell don’t know.”

“Yes, I know where they lead, dear. But I’m just not sure what station we need to be at next. So I am counting on you to intuit that for us. Don’t worry, I have complete faith in you.”

And so we walked on, for what felt like a quarter of a mile, until we hit a wall. I sensed that we had reached another crossroads. I scuttled to the left and found that there was indeed a passageway there, so I turned left. But then I hesitated after a few steps. It smelled wet and moldy, like dirty towels.

“Maybe we should go the other way,” I said. “This might be leading into a sewer.”

“It’s not,” said Leopold. “Go on.”

“But there’s a passageway going the opposite direction too, isn’t there?” I asked. I got the sense that there was, and that I might have made the wrong choice.

“Don’t second-guess yourself,” said Leopold. “Keep going.”

We trekked on for about another quarter of a mile. At one point I was sure that I heard a subway train passing over ahead, and Miles confirmed it. Then sometime after that I saw, in my mind's eye, an old wooden door, with a padlock on it. I stopped dead in my tracks.

“There's no point in going on,” I said. “There's a locked door. We would need the key.”

“She's good!” said Miles. I then heard a keyring jangling, and a key being inserted into the lock.

“Come on through,” he said, guiding me through the door with his hand on my shoulders. “There's only one direction to go in from here.”

I stepped forward. Leopold stepped through behind me. Then he told me to stop.

“Go ahead and take the hoodwink off, Miles,” he ordered.

The blindfold was removed. Now I could see the brick walls and floors of the corridor we were in, illuminated by the LED flashlight. It seemed centuries old.

Up ahead several hundred feet, there was an opening leading to a round room, also lined floor to ceiling with brick.

“You found it,” said Leopold. “Congratulations.”

“I thought you needed me to guide you,” I said resentfully.

“We do,” he replied. “That was just a test. A warm-up exercise.”

Miles pushed me forward again. I walked on, but just then I smelled something familiar. It was an odor I couldn't forget because of the years my parents spent tending a small ranch in Sherwood, Oregon. It was cow shit, unmistakably.

“Are there any animals down here?” I asked. “It smells like cow patties.” It seemed improbable, but my nose didn’t lie. I sensed the beast’s life force, and its fear. Then I heard it low mournfully.

“Yes, well…” Leopold’s voice trailed off for a moment. Miles pushed me forward again. Then Leopold finished his sentence.

“Animals often crap themselves the moment they realize they’re about to die.”

I stumbled through the doorway into the room, terrified now, as a single fluorescent tube light hanging from the ceiling came on. This revealed the scene in front of me. A man in a black leather veil and a matching leather apron over a brown suit was standing in front of four-foot-high wooden table covered also in black leather, with a large axe held aloft.

Upon this table was pressed the neck of a bull, being held with a rope round its neck by another man, similarly dressed. The man with the axe brought it down on the neck of the bull, who bellowed loudly at the moment of first impact.

The head came rolling off, and the blood began spurting outward in jets as I collapsed and fell down onto the brick floor, staring up at the beehive-shaped brick ceiling and the tube light beneath it, which got shot with a jet of blood just before I passed out.

Chapter 10: Scrying at Stratford Place

The Duke of Wellington is said to have given the founders of the Oriental Club two pieces of characteristically succinct advice: ‘Have a club of your own’ and ‘Buy the freehold.’

—Anthony LeJeune, The Gentlemen’s Clubs of London I awoke with my face laying on my arms. I was seated in a straight-back wooden chair with no armrests. My arms and head were lying on a long rectangular dining table, where I was seated at the head. Sitting around the rest of the table were maybe a dozen men and women of various ages, mostly white but not exclusively. They were all dressed quite properly, as if for a night at the opera. All of them were staring directly at me. I saw in their faces, variously, curiosity, amusement, concern, and pity.

At the other end of the table was a projector screen arranged on a stand.

The décor around me was Victorian, everything in a red-stained wood.

Bookshelves filled with antique books lined the walls in front of me and to my left.

Against the wall to my right was a little wooden table with two chairs.

Leopold sat on the right side of the table, with a black rectangular object in his hand. Another gentleman, considerably older than him, sat on the left. Both looked very stern.

I turned to look behind me. There was a portrait of the Duke of Wellington hanging over a white marble fireplace. I knew from the research I had done before the trip that I was in one of the dining rooms of Stratford House, where the Oriental Club held their meetings.

Finally, I looked down at my own person and took note of my condition. I felt terrible. I was tired and dehydrated, with a pounding headache and sore muscles all over. But one condition had improved.

I was no longer wearing the same soiled clothes I'd had on since I left Portland. Instead, I was sporting an elegant blue gown and matching pumps, with a lacy white shawl, white pearls around my neck, and a matching bracelet around my left arm. I reached up and ran my hands through my hair. It had been curled. I tried to rub my eyes, but the young lady next to me put her hand on my arm to stop me.

“Oh, don't ruin your make-up,” she said. “I worked hard on it!”

So they had changed my clothes and made me up, I thought. That means I was naked. What else did they do to me?

“We had you fixed up a bit,” said Leopold. “There's a dress code in this club.”

I glared at him. How did they do all that without waking me up? I wondered.

I figured they must have given me a sedative after I passed out, which would explain why I still felt groggy.

They could have done anything to me, I thought.

“Don't worry, we had the women change your clothes and bathe you,”

Leopold said. “Your decency was kept intact the whole time.”

That only made me feel slightly better, and since I knew he was a liar, I didn't fully believe him. Still, I was nice to have fresh underwear. But then I thought of the bull decapitation, and the blood spurting out. And the gun at my back. And all of the lies.

Not so nice, I thought. Who are these people?

“So is this the Worshipful Company of Butchers?” I asked.

“Society,” Leopold corrected.

“You mean to tell me that this is how the livery companies of London conduct themselves?” I shouted.

“We are not a livery company,” the ancient man next to Leopold insisted.

“We are a different sort of entity.”

“We conduct butchery only when necessary, and to a specific end,” said a young man on the other end of the table on the left side. “We carry on the traditions of sacrifice, and spill the blood that is needed, but only to keep things in balance.”

“To satisfy the divine commandments” said a woman across from him. “To preserve the sacred order.”

“One for the Lord, and one for Azazel,” said Leopold, undoubtedly knowing that this reference would have meaning for me, having read my Baphomet book where it was mentioned.

“We watch over the pillars that hold up the sky,” said another man, immediately to my right, “and the portals that lead to the other realm. We make sure nobody abuses these things, no matter how powerful they might be on Earth. The mighty are always seeking means to even greater power. But some things must be kept inviolate, or else everything will be destroyed.”

“What does all this mean?” I said to them pleadingly. “And what do you want with me?”

Just then a door on the far end of the wall to my right opened, and in stepped Miles. He switched off the light, and Leopold clicked a button on the object he was holding. The projector came on. A line drawing of the lid of the Mete coffer appeared on the screen in front of us. There was Mete pulling the Sun and Moon down with chains. The ancient man next to Leopold spoke again.

“Do you stand by your interpretation that the image on this coffer represents Mete pulling the gods of heaven down from the sky?”

“Yes,” I answered. “I am convinced of my hypothesis and have no reason to think otherwise.”

“You’ve really let the cat out of the bag,” the man said contemptuously.

“Knowledge like this is dangerous. It can give the wrong people the wrong ideas, and that is what you have done.”

“What in the world do you mean?” I said. The man on the far end of the table on the left, who had spoken before, replied to me.

“There is now a very powerful and evil magician who is attempting to challenge the powers of the Archons, spurred on by the content of your book.

And it has come down to us to put a stop to it.”

“You mean he’s trying to make the sky fall down with a child sacrifice ritual?” I asked, referring to my theory regarding what I believe was the Templars’ most important secret ceremony. “So someone’s trying to escape the material world? To penetrate the gates of the gods above and overcome them?”

“Yes, said Leopold. “The Baptism of Wisdom. Just as you described in your book.”

Well, I didn’t describe it in much detail, I thought. Nobody knows the details.

I just figured out what I could from looking at a few pictures.

“I was really just theorizing,” I said. “Based on what I saw, and my research.

I’m not even sure if I was right, and I said so in the book. I certainly didn’t think anybody in modern times would take the idea seriously. How can you destroy existence by doing a ritual?”

“If anybody ever does figure it out, well enough to explain the mechanics of it rationally, by then it will be too late,” said the woman to my left—the one who had done my make-up.

“That’s not what we need to know right now, Pamela,” said Leopold. He clicked his clicker again, and the picture on the screen changed. “What we need to know from you now is what you see here.”

I looked at the picture. It looked like a map. In fact, it looked quite familiar to me. I had been studying similar pictures for days before coming to London, planning my trip there, listing all the lovely historical monuments I would visit while I was in town for what I thought was legitimate business. But the map in front of me now was upside-down.

So is this another stupid test of my psychic abilities? I wondered. Like how they forced me to divine my way to the slaughter room they had already set up for me in the tunnels?

I felt like I had no choice. I had to play along, to stay on their good side long enough to figure a way out of Stratford House before those weirdos killed me. So I spoke my mind.

“Well, it’s London of course,” I said. “The City of London, the old town. But you need to turn it around. Anything else? We can play with a deck of cards. I can probably guess at least one out of ten.”

“By Jove!” exclaimed Leopold, leaping to his feet. He walked over to the projector and turned the picture around. “She’s right! Look, there’s St.

Paul's." He pointed to a dark circle in the middle, the same feature I had identified as matching up to St. Paul's Cathedral.

"And there's the Gherkin," he continued, pointing at another spot to the right of it. "Remember Miles," he said to his valet. "The part that was sticking up like a thumb?"

So this is a modern map of the City of London, I thought, realizing that the Gherkin was that pickle-shaped skyscraper that dominated the skyline. I knew that the part of town officially known as "the City of London" (controlled by "the Corporation of London") is merely a borough of what is now "Greater London." I also knew that it still roughly comprised the same space as the original Roman square mile known as "Londinium."

Although it was often described incompletely as the "financial district" of Greater London, it was really a separate legal entity from the rest of the British empire. The Queen was traditionally supposed to ask permission from the Lord Mayor of the City of London to enter the square mile to conduct formal business.

This is where the centers of corporate power, in counterbalance to regal and ecclesiastic power, were currently based. The Bank of England, the Stock Exchange, and the London Bullion Market Association were there, along with most of the corporate headquarters of Britain-based financial institutions. Even the "Temple" area where the Knights Templar had once kept a preceptory, was located in the City, and had always been the cornerstone of the British court system.

Why are they showing me this map, I thought. And how did they not realize that it was a map? What did Leopold mean about "that part that was sticking up"?

I didn't wonder for long. The man on the left at the opposite end of the table gave me the answer.

"This is a diagram we made just an hour ago, of the liver of the bull that we just sacrificed in the basement, which you were a witness to."

So I'm here to read entrails? I thought. But I wasn't trained as a haruspex! I know nothing about divining from livers. Yet somehow I knew that this liver looked like the City of London. How on Earth is it even possible for the liver of a bull to look like a borough of London?

"So what are you looking for?" I asked.

"Where's the cancer?" asked Leopold. "Tell us where you see the stronghold of the evil magician we described."

"Did you take any photos of the actual liver?" I asked.

"Yes!" Leopold smiled. "That was Miles idea. He took a photo with your phone."

Miles was smiling too, proud of himself. He walked over to me, pulled my phone out of his coat pocket, and handed it over. As soon as I turned it on, I saw the photo of the bloody liver and almost retched. It was mostly the memory of the kill that caused the reaction. I looked up at Miles again.

“Thank you Miles,” I said. “Can I have my laptop case back also?”

“Oh yes,” he replied. “It’s sitting next to the projector.”

I looked down at the photo again and tried to clear my mind, looking for “the cancer,” whatever it was. The longer I remained useful to them, I figured, the longer I would remain alive. As I stared, I saw a ring of sickly green appear on the liver for a moment, right on the end of a triangle of whitish discoloration Then the circle vanished, but the white triangle remained. There was a similar triangle of lines formed on the diagram on the projector.

“I think I see something,” I said. “Here, between St. Paul’s and the Gherkin.”

I got up and walked over to the projector, then pointed on the diagram to where I had seen the green circle appear on the photograph. “It’s right on this triangle here. I saw it with my mind’s eye.”

“God damn it’s that fucking Jew bugger!” said a man on the right side of the table. “The one who thinks he’s more powerful than the Queen.”

“Don’t be so vulgar!” said a woman sitting next to him, looking at me nervously. “We’re not against Jews or homosexuals. We aren’t barbarians.”

I looked away from her. That's exactly what you are, I thought.

“It doesn’t matter. He’ll do us all in if we let him,” said another man, addressing the entire room. “That’s why he bribed the City to let him buy the meth room. That’s why he built that bulky, impenetrable mass in the center of the City. He wants to do it there, right there. To cut a hole in the sky and bring down the pillars it sits on. Doesn’t that make sense now?”

No, it doesn’t make sense. I thought. Did you actually say ‘meth room’?”

I had no idea who they were talking about. I didn’t care. While everyone was talking to one another, I took a moment to kneel down and pick up my laptop case. As I was down beneath the table I punched a few buttons on my phone, grateful that I had input Agent Chesterfield’s phone number already while I was sitting in the Egyptian room at the British Museum.

I silenced the speakers but left the mic open. Then I rang his number and put the phone in the outside pocket of my case, which I left open. I returned to my seat at the end of the table.

“What specifically are you afraid is going to happen,” I asked Leopold, locking eyes with him.

“Pamela, whether you understand or not, rationally, I know you get it intuitively. There really are pillars that hold up the sky. They keep the layers of existence from crashing in on each other. And there are those who are looking for power beyond this world. The man we are telling you about wants to make Atlas shrug for real—no metaphor. We sacrifice bulls to the Archons, to maintain the cosmic order. But he wants to kill the Celestial Bull, and tear down the columns that uphold creation, so that he can climb up, out of here, and rule the destroyed worlds from above. He believes he can make the gods themselves bow down to him. And in the process we may all be crushed or annihilated.”

“You can’t really believe that’s possible,” I said.

“We can’t take the chance that it might be,” the old man next to him answered.

Just then, another door opened up, this time on my left side, and a man dressed like a butler came through.

“What’s the meaning of this!” the old man shouted. “I told you to give us absolute privacy.”

“I’m sorry sir. It’s the police. I had to let them in,” the butler replied.

Behind him, two metropolitan police in black uniforms came through, followed by Agent Paris and Agent Chesterfield. Paris pointed directly at Leopold.

Then he grabbed the butler by the collar angrily.

“You told us he wasn’t here.”

“I didn’t let him in,” the butler insisted. “He must have sneaked in somehow.” He looked around. “Well a lot of you didn’t come through the front door. How’s that?”

“All right, take him in,” said Chesterfield. The police handcuffed Leopold as Chesterfield walked over and took me by the arm.

“You should take his valet in too,” I told him loudly. “They both kidnapped me at gunpoint from the British Museum. Then they took me down to some dungeon and killed a bull in front of me.”

Everyone in the room stopped dead. The room was silent. Everyone stared at me. The WSB members all had looks of complete horror on their faces.

“Will you testify to that?” Agent Paris asked me. Miles stared me down cold, and shook his head sideways.

“No,” I answered. I grabbed on tightly to Chesterfield’s arm.

“Then just take Mr. Weir,” Paris told the policemen. “The rest of you, get out of here. Club’s closed for the night.”

They all began to file out. I tried not to look at anyone directly anymore, and stared at Chesterfield’s shoes.

“Let’s go,” he said to me. I grabbed my laptop case, still looking down, and walked out, letting Chesterfield lead so that he could usher us through the exit line. I could feel Leopold’s eyes on my back, and I wanted to get out of his line of sight as soon as possible.

Chapter 11: Temple Tavern

O, plump head waiter of ‘The Cock,’

To which I most resort

How goes the time? ‘Tis five o’clock?

Go fetch a pint of port!

—Alfred Lloyd Tennyson, The Cock

Chesterfield took me down the stairs and out the front of Stratford House to the sidewalk, at the end of the cul-de-sac called Stratford Place. I didn’t see much of the opulent building because I was looking at my shoes the whole time.

When we got outside into the early evening air, he suggested we duck into the bookshop in the building next door, covered by an immense glass rooftop garden, thus avoiding the rest of the Society of Butchers as they scurried away. It turned out that this building housed the local Kabballah Centre, and it was their book shop. We stopped in front of a display of commentaries on The Zohar so that we could speak for a moment. But when we noticed that everyone in the shop was looking at us, we quieted down to a whisper.

“So you overheard what was going on when I called you and you traced the call to find me?” I asked. “I was shocked at how quickly you arrived.”

“Not exactly,” he answered. “We had been tracking your movements with your mobile phone since we dropped you off at the museum. Then we lost you for a while. We thought you might be in trouble, so we hovered in the area where we had last tracked you. I actually combed through the Tape Nightclub looking for you, and through the Bond Street tube station. Then we picked your signal up again at Stratford Place. We were lurking outside this Kabballah Centre, thinking you were probably here, when I got your call and realized it was coming from the Oriental Club."

"They took me to an art gallery on Hanover Street," I said. "Then we went through an underground tunnel to a tiny room shaped like a beehive, where they beheaded a bull. Then I passed out and woke up in that room you found me in.

Why were you tracking me in the first place?"

"Because I didn't feel good leaving you at the Museum with that creep Weir still afoot," he answered. "And I was right to be cautious."

Just then his cell phone rang, and he answered it. I could hear the other side of the conversation bleeding through. It was Agent Paris. He was suggesting that they take me into "the office" (at Thames House, presumably) for questioning, and let Weir sit in a cell all night waiting for interrogation tomorrow.

"Oh no," he said. "Let me take her out for a drink, and I'll talk to her there.

She's had a rough day. I'm sure she could use a bite and a quaff." He winked at me.

"You old dog," I heard Paris say. "Just make sure you get some real intelligence from her this time before you let her go."

"Oh don't worry," said Chesterfield. "I won't let her get off easy this time."

He chuckled. I didn't. He looked away from me.

"I'll show up tomorrow morning with a full report," he promised his partner.

"So do I have any choice about going out for a drink?" I asked.

“Not unless you’d rather be questioned at an MI5 office building,” he replied. “So just let me know: where would you like to be interrogated, my dear?”

“Do you know any pubs in the Temple district?” I asked. “I’d like to see that old Knights Templar church again,” I said.

“I know just the place,” he replied.

Paris had the company car with him, so we walked out to Oxford Street, and across to Bond Street Station, where we took a ten-minute ride on the Central line to Chancery Lane Station. There, we exited on Holborn, went west to Chancery Lane itself, then followed that road south down to Fleet Street, where our destination was. On the way he pointed out the famous silver vaults, and the former address of Aleister Crowley’s London residence (although the actual building he’d lived in was demolished in 2006). This was his way of flirting, as it was when he told me he had thought I was “cute before, wearing the stinky old jeans and a sweater with no make-up.”

“But now you look positively radiant,” he added.

“Thanks,” I replied. “I guess I clean up well, at least when I have a personal stylist and I’m lying unconscious.”

“You mean they changed your clothes while you were passed out?” he said.

He looked horrified.

“I don’t think they violated me,” I said. “At least no more than what I’ve already told you about.”

We arrived at Ye Olde Cock Tavern, a pub which had been around since 1549. Samuel Pepys, Charles Dickens, and Alfred Lloyd Tennyson all drank there.

After we’d eaten and drunk our fill, Chesterfield said, we could take the back door out the pub and through the enclosed courtyard to see Temple

Church just before it closed for the evening.

We ordered beer and “beef burgers,” as they call them. Then we stuffed ourselves while I spilled my guts to him about everything that had happened since my adventure began. I told him all about the Mete coffer and Leopold, the alleged lecture I’d been hired to give, the flight delay, Leopold dropping out of contact, and being questioned by him and Paris at Parliament, where I found out the truth about Leopold’s identity from him and Agent Paris.

Then I recounted my experience at the museum, where I learned that the coffer was gone, ran into Leopold for reasons unknown, and was chased outside by people I thought worked for Accounts Receivable. Finally, I described the kidnapping, the blindfolded march through the subterranean passage, the bull sacrifice, and the forced divination from the bull liver at Oriental Club. I even mentioned, in passing, their claim that they needed help locating an “evil magician” who intended to destroy existence as we knew it with a ritual to topple the “pillars of Heaven.”

“Chicken Littles!” said Chesterfield, amused. “‘The sky’s falling!’ What a bunch of nutters.”

He couldn’t believe it was that the real Butchers’ livery company was involved, especially considering that Leopold had lied about his name, his so-called barony, and his phony seat in the House of Lords. So Agent Chesterfield got out his smartphone to investigate.

“What did you say it was called again?” he asked. “The Worship Society of Butchers? Or the Worshipful Company? Because ‘Worshipful Company of Butchers’ is the name of the actual livery company.”

I dug through the email archives on my own phone.

“Leopold called it ‘Society.’ He said it several times.” I pondered for a moment. “They did actually tell me specifically that they weren’t a livery company but a ‘different sort of entity.’ So I guess I was looking at the Worshipful Company's website all along, thinking it was for Leopold's group. But it looks like the Butcher's Society is just as fake as his supposed peerage."

"Which would explain why they meet at Oriental Club instead of Butcher's Hall," he said. "Because anyone who can meet the dress code and afford the fees can book time there, even if they don't belong to the actual Oriental Club, which you say Weir never specifically told you he was a member of."

"But the butler acted like he hadn't let them through the front door," I said.

"So maybe they sneaked in through an underground tunnel. Maybe there's a member of the club who knows a secret way in, and let them through. Something that connects with the tunnels I was inside of. And there must be a much wider entrance to the tunnels somewhere, or else how did they get the bull down there in the first place?"

Chesterfield asked me to bring out my laptop so that he could look at a larger image than his phone screen. After just a few seconds, he let out an "a ha!"

and swiveled the screen around to show me something.

"Is this the room where they beheaded the bull?" he asked.

He showed me a report on a building survey from the City of Westminster from 2014. It was commissioned to make sure the new expansions of the Bond Street tube station at nearby Hanover Square didn't interfere with the Stratford House basement. This basement did, as the report showed, jut out significantly from the front of the building, so that it was essentially underneath the middle of Stratford Place, the street out front. Like the rest of the building, the basement dated back to 1774. A photograph included in the report showed that beehive ceiling, which I'll never forget.

“So if there is another intersecting tunnel that leads to 10 Hanover and all the other places you went, it must have been built without city permission sometime after 2014,” said Chesterfield. “And somehow the people building the tube tunnels never ran into it either. Unless one of them is in on it. Which is possible.”

“Really” I said. “You think there are people building new secret tunnels underneath London even today?”

“Oh, we know there are,” he answered, hushing his tone again. “Look, the new boom in both residential and commercial real estate in London is underground. The wealthy are building basements three and four levels down, because square footage is so valuable here. Hundreds of applications are being approved every year. There have got to be some that get built without permission.”

Chesterfield rolled his eyes up sucked in his lips, like he was debating whether or not he should tell me something. Then he continued.

“We at MI5 have found several. We’ve busted some, we’re watching others. We think there are hundreds more that we haven’t found yet. That is something I should not have told you. But maybe now you can trust me with something you wouldn’t have otherwise told me.” He looked at me deeply, expectantly.

“I’ve actually told you everything I know,” I replied. “Everything I can think of that you might be interested in.”

“Well let’s go do something you’re interested in,” he said, standing up.

“Let’s go look at those dead Templars across the courtyard over there.”

We went down the stairs from where we had been sitting and out the pub’s backdoor. Then we walked through the enclosed courtyard, past the tomb of the Irish writer Oliver Goldsmith (which, we were warned by the bartender, was haunted), and through the backdoor of the medieval Temple Church, built by and for the Knights Templar.

I hadn't been there on my first visit to London. This was my first time seeing it. But I had seen many pictures of the old tombs of the Templars recessed in the floor there. Each tomb was decorated with a life-sized relief on top depicting the deceased in full armor, usually with a dog at his feet. I didn't have any revelations until Chesterfield spoke up.

"It's funny how their legs are all crossed isn't it?" he said.

I looked at the Templar effigies. Indeed, the crossed legs were very peculiar.

"And they all look like they're in pain. Almost like somebody just kicked them in the balls. Or chopped their dicks off with a sword. Ha ha!" He spoke too loudly. The two people who were sitting there in the pews quietly praying looked up.

"Sorry!" he said nervously. But it got me thinking.

"You know, the Roman cult of the goddess Cybele had a fully castrated priesthood. They called them the Galli. They would become possessed by the goddess during their festivals. Then they would go crazy and cut off their own genitals in a frenzy, in honor of Attis, Cybele’s consort, who had done the same thing. And Attis was often depicted with his legs cross, just like these Templars.”

“So the priests castrated themselves to be like him, because they thought that’s what their goddess wanted?” Chesterfield said.

“Yep,” I replied. “That was how they were initiated. A couple of days later, they would put the severed sex organs in a sacred coffer and parade them around in a celebratory procession. They actually had all these festivals in late March, around the Spring Equinox, right about now. The castration rite was called the Day of Blood. That was on March 24.”

“Really,” said Chesterfield. He was going pale.

“Yeah, I said. Nobody ever points out that this was the day that men in the Heaven’s Gate cult castrated themselves before they committed suicide. They believed that they were going to be taken up into a portal that they thought was riding past Earth with the Hale Bopp comet that night. They thought they needed to be castrated to get in. They wanted to be the “eunuchs of Heaven” that the Bible talks about. Some people think that comet was actually Nibiru, also called Planet X, which the Babylonians identified with the time of the Spring Equinox.”

“My little joke brought all that to mind, did it?” said Chesterfield, in a very un-joking manner.

“Well I was thinking about the Mete coffer. The British Museum labeled the picture on the lid as being “Cybele.” And Hammer-Purgstall said that it looked like her, except she’s got a beard, and she was labeled Mete. He was sure that she was the same figure as the ‘Baphomet’ demon that the Templars supposedly worshiped in their secret ceremonies.”

SOLVE
ELIPHAS LEVI DEL

“He also said that the Templars were covertly practicing Ophite Gnosticism.

And the Ophites were said to have incorporated the Cybele cult into their syncretistic system. Now here we have the Templar knights, depicted on their tombstones with their legs crossed as though they’ve been injured in the genital region. It’s just like the Fisher King in the Grail stories, which the Templars were associated with. It’s all starting to add up. Look!”

I typed a few words into my phone, and brought up Eliphas Levi’s depiction of the Templar demon Baphomet.

“Look,” I said again. “This is Baphomet. This is the way the occultist Eliphas Levi depicted him. I’m just now realizing why he showed the demon with a caduceus coming out of his crotch instead of a penis, even though he said it was a hermaphrodite. Because it was actually a castrated Hermaphrodite, just like Catullus said Cybele was originally.”

I guess I didn’t care if Chesterfield was able to follow my logic. I was mainly saying it out loud for my own benefit, to aid my thoughts. By this time, the two people trying to pray peacefully in this house of God had gotten up and left in disgust. Chesterfield looked at me directly with a pained expression and stood silently for a moment. At last he spoke.

“Pamela, I think there is something that you need to see. Let’s go back to the tavern so we can use your laptop there. You’ll need a drink after you see it.”

Chapter 12: Easter Sunday April Fool

April is the cruelest month.

— T.S. Eliot, The Wasteland

We walked back into the pub and up the stairs to the third floor. We picked a table next to a window that gave us a view of the former location of the Bank of England, now moved to Threadneedle Street near Walbrook. This same building, on the western side of the corner of Chancery Lane and Fleet Street, had been, before that, home to the very pub we were standing in at one point. However, the original pub burned down in a fire, as we learned from an informative plaque mounted on the wall near our table.

I plugged my computer in and started it up while Chesterfield went and got us a couple of double-shot whiskeys with beer chasers. Then we both sat with our backs to the window and the computer screen on the table in front of us. That way, we figured, we could make sure nobody walked in on us and saw what was on the computer screen. We both downed about half of our whiskeys. Then Chesterfield took a small black thumb drive out of his pocket and held it up in front of me.

“This file was sent to MI5 through our anonymous tip page. It was encrypted into a video of a cat playing with a ball of yarn, and wrapped with a malignant virus which we were able to neutralize. Then we decrypted the video, which I’m about to show you. Don’t tell anyone I showed you, or I will lose my job and go to prison.”

I nodded. He plugged the drive into my computer.

“Play it from the drive. Don’t copy it,” he insisted.

Obviously, I thought to myself.

I opened the drive, and then the file, which was named

“easter.sunday.april.fools.mov.” Chesterfield grabbed my hand and clasped tightly as he looked at the screen in absolute dread.

The video—or rather, the video of the “film” (for it was, it appeared to me, shot on 35 mm black and white celluloid)—started with a sequence of three old-fashioned title pages of the type once used for dialogue on silent films. They said: In an effort to birth a grand new cultus, ‘the synthesis of all persecuted beliefs’. . . .

. . . the Grand Chaplain of the Temple Militia remarried Our Father to the Great Mother. . . .

Together they engendered a child destined to upset the order of the Aeons.

The son became the Sun, the Sun became Our Father. Then he married the Great Mother again.

The next scenes are hard to describe, because they are so awful. I shall do so matter-of-factly, because that’s all I can do.

First, we saw a group of boys, ages spanning from ten to twelve. They were all wearing suits and ties and smoking cigarettes on some steps outside. The shot widened to show the now-familiar statue of Anteros at Piccadilly Circus, with the sign for the Eros Cinema visible in the background. Then there was another title page.

Enticed by the promised revelation of love’s mysteries, the Easter Fool stumbles down the rabbit hole into the lair of counter-love.

In the next shot, framed up on the boys again, an adult white male hand emerged from screen left holding a copy of Playboy Magazine. The cover featured the back of the head of a white rabbit who was watching a woman in a blue dress smiling in front of a film camera. When the kids saw the magazine, their faces lit up as they grabbed at it excitedly. The one on the left got his hands on it first.

Then the adult hand holding it started moving over to the right, with the child following along. At that point, the film abruptly cut to the next title page, which said:

The fish has been caught, and is dragged down to Hades.

This cut to a shot of a bust of the Roman god Serapis, a.k.a. Hades, Dispater or Pluto, with his traditional modius (a grain-measuring basket) on top of his head. This was set against a dark background. Next, there was a wider shot of the head, showing that it was sitting on top of a crumbling column. This was followed by a shot with an even broader frame, revealing that the column was part of the decayed foundation of an ancient rectangular building now in ruins.

There were never more than two or three stones stacked up in any one place, so no part of it was more than three feet high. But it looked like it was set up inside of larger, more modern windowless room, with a metal-plated light switch visible on the wall. Beneath the dilapidated stones one could see, in places, a tiled checkerboard floor.

Laying down on his back across a row of these ancient blocks was the same boy lured by the magazine in the previous scene. He was now naked, blindfolded, and screaming hysterically. Two figures in hooded black robes with black bird masks were holding him by the hands and feet as he flailed.

The camera then zoomed in to focus just on them. Next, a figure in a leather veil and apron, just like the two men I had seen in the basement of Stratford House, stepped into the scene. Meanwhile, a third figure, again wearing a black bird mask, held a stone bowl beneath the boy's crotch and used a white-gloved hand to hold the genitals up about a finger's width.

The butcher then brandished a pair of cleavers. The camera zoomed in to the child's sex organs, which were snipped off. Huge amounts of blood, as well as the parts themselves, were collected in the bowl before the camera finally cut away from the gaping wound and thrashing limbs to a black screen.

At this point, Chesterfield paused the video as I ran to the bathroom to vomit. I wretched and wretched until nothing but bile was coming up. Thankfully, nobody else was using the other stalls, and the facilities were quite tidy. There's nothing worse than puking in a dirty public toilet.

Once again, I thanked the Lord for small favors. Something about being on my knees in front of the "throne" made me want to pray. I noticed that I had a tendency to do this, and this only, as my expression of religion.

Why didn't I thank God when I survived the kidnapping and the bull sacrifice? I wondered. And why didn't I pray for my own safety throughout the entire event, or before? Why don't I pray for God to get me out of this mess right now?

And there it was. I stood there in front of the bathroom mirror wondering why I wasn't taking a particular course of action.

It hardly even amounts to action in the physical sense, I thought. Unless you actually choose to kneel down while praying, or to speak your prayer out loud, which most people don't even do these days.

Not only that, I thought. A real religious person would have prayed for others too. Prayed for the boy in the film, and others who were victimized like him.

Prayed that the perpetrators be brought to justice. Maybe they would even pray that the guilty ones come to realize their evil and ask for forgiveness before it was too late.

But I just stood there staring at myself, trying to use my thumb to wipe away the eye liner that had smeared due to the perspiration that came with vomiting.

If you think about it though, I could have been more cowardly. Not once did I think about running away from this entire sordid affair. I was under no obligation to continue my involvement. I could have gone straight to the airport and insisted they move up my departure date, since I still had the tickets for the flight home.

Instead, I returned to the table and sat back down next to Agent Chesterfield. I asked him if there was more on the video.

“Sadly, yes,” he answered.

I asked him if I really needed to see it. He said it “might be helpful.” So I agreed. I took a few more minutes to finish my whiskey and beer. Then we continued.

The next scene showed the bowl with the gore in it being placed by gloved hands with robed arms upon an altar that was shown sitting among the same ruins. There were two other bowls that were similar, but empty, sitting on top of the altar as well. The next shot showed the sides of the altar. One featured a tree from which hung two flutes and a tympanum—the ceremonial hand drum used in the rites of Cybele—was hung, along with two pipes.

The relief on the other side of the altar showed two of her Galli priests, wearing their traditional Phrygian hats. They were carrying a coffer on poles mounted on their shoulders, just like the Ark of the Covenant was depicted as being carried. On top of the box was the Hetoimasiac throne of the goddess, depicted in aniconic form with a cista—a ritual basket—placed as a stand-in for the invisible goddess.

I instantly recognized this as a genuine altar of Cybele that once belonged to a wealthy gentleman in London at the turn of the twentieth century, whereabouts now unknown. I had read about it recently in the JSTOR archives while doing research for an article I had published in an anthropology journal. I knew there was another side to it, not shown in the film, which depicted the goddess standing with a bowl in her hand while two Galli stood at either side of her. Both were shown crossing their legs uncomfortably, just like the Templar effigies on the graves at Temple Church.

Next, the film showed the gloved hands straining the organs out of the blood in the bowl with a slotted ladle. They were then placed in two other bowls: the penis in one, the testicles in the other. The hands then lifted each bowl, one at a time, while another pair of gloved hands appeared from off screen and placed a small, form-fitting basket beneath each one. Following this, the baskets, with the bowls still inside, were covered with a wicker lid so that each one now resembled the basketed cista that were depicted on top of the throne shown in relief on the side of the altar.

After that, the second set of hands gave the first pair an ancient-looking cylindrical metal casket, about four inches tall and two inches in circumference. It was decorated with dilapidated scenes of men fighting with various wild animals.

It was carried by a metal chain that it hung from.

The first pair of hands took off the top of the casket, which remained hanging from the chain. They then removed a small ball made of metal wire, dripping wet, which hung on a chain of its own and contained a dark substance. I figured it was a strainer containing herbs of some sort. The hands poured liquid that looked like murky water from the casket into the bowl with the blood while the second set of hands held the basket lid up.

Then a more modern-looking metal bucket with a handle was given to the first pair of hands by the second pair. It contained a clear, thick, slimy substance that appeared to be fat, which was poured into the bowl with the blood. Then a large metal spoon came into the shot from screen right, and was used to stir the contents of the bowl.

Following this, the film cut to another shot. The camera was pointing down at the bowl in the basket, with the lid off and the spoon still in it, which now appeared to be sitting on one of the ruined walls. Then, three erect and circumcised adult white penises appeared from off screen. Three large white male hands, ungloved, were seen masturbating them. After almost a minute, all three penises had ejaculated into the bowl, one right after the other, with only a few seconds in-between each climax. The penises then left the screen. Gloved hands appeared again to stir the mixture with the spoon and place the basket lid back on.

The subsequent shot showed what was unmistakably the Mete coffer, sitting there on the antique stone bricks stacked next to the altar. The lid with the picture of Mete was removed by one set of gloved hands, and the three baskets were placed inside by another pair. The lid of the coffer was carefully replaced.

Then came a title page which read:

We process in the paterns [sic] of the Sun-runner.

In the next shot, four figures in dark robes with hoods and black bird masks were seen circumambulating an old building with a gurney mounted on their backs and the coffer riding on top. In front of them was another hooded figure, shorter than the others, with a white veil draped over his or her face, and held on by an attached headband. This person was holding a small metal aspergillum and was using it to spray lustrations onto the building as they walked around it. Then we were given a wide shot, and we could see the building they were walking around, topped with a large dome. I thought it was most likely St. Paul’s Cathedral there in London. They walked around it seven times.

Then the scene changed, and we saw them walking along a street in London, next to a building with a tiny metal grate embedded in its corner. The camera focused on the grate as the people with the coffer walked past. The short veiled person stayed behind and shook the aspergillum at the grate, behind which we could see a small, roughly-hewn, somewhat square white stone, about half a foot wide and a few inches tall.

Then the shot changed to show the group marching along the Thames.

They were walking next to a building positioned right on the shore of the river with two wooden ramps leading out of a large opening on the side facing the water. This led down to a couple of small boats that were docked right next to it.

The shot was head-on as the entourage walked forward.

This cut quickly to a shot inside one of the boats. The coffer could be seen sitting in the foreground without the gurney or its holders. It was sitting on top of one end of a mid-tone-colored blanket folded in half. A gloved hand on a robed arm folded the other end of the blanket over the coffer.

Next, the camera raised up. All we could see above the sides of the boat was sky, but we could tell when the boat started moving from the change in the clouds. Then we saw it turn left and go underneath something. Suddenly everything went dark. Then there was another title page. It said: Sacrifice to the guardians of the tower.

In the next shot, a metal cage with several black crow-like birds was shown.

Another gloved hand reached for the lock and opened the cage. Then one of the basketed cista was shown sitting on grass in front of a park bench.

The shot widened, and we saw the birds standing in the surrounding grass, pecking at the inside of the basket. Then it was opened, and the contents—bloody bits of flesh (presumably the sacrificed testicles)—were emptied out onto the grass. All of the birds immediately converged upon them and began eating them.

As the birds walked away with the meat in their beaks, a gloved hand came onscreen holding a shovel with a handle about three feet long. It was pushed into the dirt beneath the grass. Then the shot widened to show a man (judging by the shoes) in a black robe with a sun face mask pressing down the shovel with his foot to insert it deeper.

Next we were shown a stone effigy of a tomb with the stone rolled out, standing empty. We could tell it was an effigy when the camera panned up quickly to show a cross mounted above. There was a dove winging its way down to the bottom of the cross, and two angels kneeling in prayer on either side of it.

Then the camera panned down and showed a close-up of the tombstone.

On it were etched the words "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" Then the thumb of a wrinkled white male hand came forward from behind the camera and covered up the word "Why."

In the following shot, a young, barely-pubescent girl wearing an Easter dress and bonnet was shown holding hands with a finely-dressed man and woman whose faces were not shown. The first shot showed mostly just her. In the second, we saw the group from behind. They appeared to be at a church, as pews and a statue of the Virgin could be seen in the background of the second shot.

The girl looked very sad. Quite inappropriately, she seemed to be wearing make-up on her face. She had eyeliner, eye shadow, and lipstick on. Her face was made pale with cake foundation. After this shot, another title page was shown, which said:

The Sacred Marriage of the Stone and the Bosse.

The next image was filmed looking through the front windshield of a car driving through a gateway underneath a medieval-looking archway. It was very tall, with one large arch in the middle, through which the car drove. Then there were two more narrow openings on either side, only wide enough for foot traffic, or perhaps a bicycle.

There was a structure on top almost as tall as the arch itself. It featured two statues, each set inside of a niche, and between them a stained-glass window.

Extending outward on either side were tall hedges, and behind these, an even taller black metal fence. The two smaller archways were barred by metal gates of the same style, but the gate for the large one in the middle was set open.

It was raining, and the wipers were on as the car went under the arch.

Beyond was a driveway lined with trees. We saw the car go down the driveway to a very large red-bricked manor house.

This cut to the interior of a decayed medieval-looking stone room with a small round window showing only darkness beyond. Two hooded people, this time wearing lion masks, stood on either side of the window holding torches, which appeared to be providing the light. The camera pointed down. There, the same girl from the scene before was now shown standing in a white robe, shivering and crying. Eyeliner streamed down her face while two people with robes and bird masks held her by the arms.

Another man then stepped into the picture, also wearing a dark robe, but with a sun mask. He was holding a staff that ended in the shape of a small erect phallus. The staff was dark, but the phallus was light-colored. The girl was forced by the people in the bird masks to bend down on one knee before the man in the sun mask, and to hold her hands in front of her in an attitude of prayer. The people in the bird masks demonstrated to her how she was to hold her hands.

Then afterwards she sat there pleading and sobbing for a few seconds, another title page came up.

See the Virgin genuflect to Our Father.

We then were shown a close-up of the girl’s face as the sun-man put the phallus-wand directly up to her lips. She turned away in disgust. I noticed that it looked almost as though it were covered with actual human skin, and I wondered if it was.

Next, we saw the phallus-wand’s tip submerged into one of the basketed cista, shown sitting on the floor. The wand was used to stir the mixture of blood, fat and herbs, which now looked quite congealed. The natural lubricant caused the dildo to glisten in the torchlight. Following that, there was a shot from the side of the girl lying on her stomach on a blanket on the ground with the top of her head butted up against a roughly-hewn, vaguely square-shaped stone.

The poor girl screamed and balled her hands up into tight fists as the man in the sun mask knelt behind her. He inserted the wand into her rectum, much to her extreme agony, pushing and pulling it several times. Her pain then seemed to increase immensely when he mounted her and replaced the wand with his own swollen member. As she screamed, we saw the girl’s head repeatedly bang up against the stone which, I noticed, resembled the one seen earlier in the film sitting behind a grate in the corner of a building. Then came another title page:

“The sacred womb is seeded with the ancient rite. Afterwards, an Easter egg is laid upon the chamber floor.”

The last shot was horrifying and disgusting beyond measure. While I regret to have to disturb you further, dear reader, these things must be said. What we saw was a tight shot of a string of beads covered in dark slime being pulled by an off-screen gloved hand from a swollen, prolapsed and distended anus. The beads were white and carved from either stone, ivory, or some form of bone.

Between each set of ten round beads (yes, I counted), there was a bead carved into the shape of either a hand or a foot, for a total of four. At the end of the string there was one made to look like a Janus head, with the face of Jesus on one side, and the face of a skull on the other. After this came out, a large black mass which I presumed to be bloody stool began to emerge amid profuse bleeding. But before it took any discernible shape, the film mercifully ended.

When the final, awful shot at last faded to black, I was in shock. I was also flushed and sweating heavily as another wave of nausea overtook me. I went to the bathroom to empty my stomach again.

Chapter 13: Raven Conspiracy

The weeping child could not be heard,

The weeping parents wept in vain;

They stripp’d him to his little shirt,

And bound him in an iron chain;

And burn’d him in a holy place,

Where many had been burn’d before:

The weeping parents wept in vain.

Are such things done on Albion’s shore?

— William Blake, “A Little Boy Lost” from Songs of Experience

After a few minutes I returned to the table to join Chesterfield, who was sitting there looking sad and sick.

“So what have you figured out so far about it?” I asked

“Well, several things,” he answered. He appeared to perk up at the thought of doing something practical to solve the problem. He took a fancy red ceramic pen and a small notepad with a black leather cover out of his jacket pocket. Then he opened the notebook and used the pen to enumerate items on a list he had made.

“First, we think it was shot in 1950s. That’s what we presume from the ‘Teddy boy’ style of dress worn by the kids in the opening scene. The Playboy Magazine is from March 1956. That’s also the last year that Easter fell on April first, which will happen again this year, in three days.”

“So that’s the meaning of the reference to Easter and the ‘April fool?’”

“Yes,” he said. “Unless you can add some occult wisdom about the significance too.”

I thought about it. “The only thing I can think of to add right now is that the New Year used to be celebrated on March 25th in medieval Europe, around the Spring Equinox.”

“Ah yes, the Feast of the Annunciation, when Mary was impregnated by God. Or ‘Lady Day,’ as we call it in the Church of England,” said Chesterfield. I continued.

“Yes, and it was part of a week-long festival that would end on April first. So when the New Year began to be celebrated on the first of January, those who still clung to the old dates for the holiday were called ‘April fools.’”

“Hmm. So April Fool’s Day is part of a festival connected to the old New Year’s Day, which just so happens to come one day after that “Day of Blood” for the goddess Cybele that you told me about, where they would castrate the priests.”

“Yes,” I said. “In imitation of what Cybele did to her own son Attis. She forced him to be her lover. Then when he predictably fell in love with a younger woman, she got mad and castrated him while he was tied to a tree, so that he bled out and died. But then she felt guilty afterwards and decided to resurrect him. That’s why the resurrection of Attis was celebrated the next day, March 25, by the eunuch priests of the Cybele cult.”

“On Lady Day?” he asked, incredulous.

“Indeed,” I replied. “And this of course is all connected to the symbolism of Easter, obviously. Death and resurrection of the sun god. Attis often had a crown of sun rays, just like Christ has a sun halo.”

Chesterfield raised his eyebrows, and then opened hs notebook again.

“We’ve also figured out several of the locations shown in film. Now here’s where it gets really disturbing.”

“How could it be any more disturbing than it already is?” I asked.

“When you realize where these places are and who would have had access to them, you will see what I mean. First, there’s that building they were walking around. That’s St. Paul’s Cathedral.”

“I thought as much,” I said. “I saw the dome.”

“It’s always been open to the public, yes,” said Chesterfield. “But why did they feel so comfortable walking around dressed up in those bizarre costumes with a box containing the severed genitals of a kidnapped boy? It seemed like they were out early in the morning."

"Yeah, and the box they were carrying was the Mete coffer I was telling you about," I added. "The one that Leopold said had been stolen from the museum."

At this, Chesterfield was very surprised.

"So you mean they borrowed it back in 1956, then put it back, and someone stole it again this year, right before the next April Fool's Easter?" he suggested.

"It appears that way," I said. "Also, I'm pretty sure the altar they used is a real ancient Roman Cybele altar. Someone wrote about it in this old antiquarian journal." I opened up the PDF that I had downloaded from JSTOR on my laptop, and showed him that the altar had once been owned by a Mr. G.A. Warren of Streatham Hill, London, in 1892, though nobody was sure where it came from or where it went to after that. The pictures of the item matched up perfectly with what we had seen in the film.

“So we’re dealing with a network of ancient artifact collectors, thieves and borrowers that has been operating in London in continuity for at least 62 years, possibly much longer,” he said. “And they’ve been using these artifacts in rituals where children are raped, tortured and mutilated. Good God.” He shook his head.

“The archway that the car is seen driving through--that’s Temple Bar itself.”

I gasped. The former entryway to the old City of London, right here in the Temple district! I thought.

“Isn’t that right in this neighborhood, next to Temple Church?” I asked.

“It used to be near here,” said Chesterfield. “But in 1880 it was sold to Henry Meux, a brewer, who brought it out to his mansion in Hertfordshire, a place called Theobald Park.”

He showed me a website with recent pictures of the interior of the building.

“That’s where they raped the girl!” I exclaimed, shocked. It was clearly the same place, with the same little round window and peeling stone walls.

“Right,” said Chesterfield. “He bought it on the advice of his wife, Valerie Meux, who was a famous socialite and antiquities collector. There’s actually a little chamber within the upper part of the archway, and they say Lady Meux used to have dinner parties there with King Edward VII and Winston Churchill.” He showed me the Wikipedia page, which confirmed these statements.

“Wow,” I said. “She must have been really important.”

“Strangely, yes,” he answered. “When she died, widowed and childless, she left Theobald Park, and indeed her entire estate, to a young man in the Royal Navy whom she’d just met, named Hedworth Lambdon. He had to change his last name to Meux to satisfy the terms of the will. Later the property became a secondary school, which it would have still been at the time this film was shot.

Now it’s a De Vere hotel.”

“So someone who worked at the school must have been involved,” I said.

“It seems that way,” he agreed.

“What about the ruins where the boy was castrated?” I asked.

“Don’t know,” he said. “We’re still working on that.”

“Then what about facial recognition of the kids in the film?” I said. He shook his head.

“They don’t match up with any face of any child reported missing from that time period,” he replied. “Nor do they match with any face of any child that has yet been uploaded to the internet anywhere in the world. So we have a team of people scanning the yearbooks from all the surrounding schools for the era in question, hoping to find a match. And if we had photos of adults to compare them to, our computers could tell us whether or not they are the same people, within an infinitesimally small margin of error. But we would need at least a clue as to where to look.”

“So you think the kids might have survived after this?” I asked.

“I don’t know, I hope,” he replied. “But from what you told me, it sounds like at least the castration victim may be dead. Bled out like Attis, as you say. Plus that’s how these kid sex crimes usually end.”

“Yeah, but in her cult they survived to become her priests. And it was voluntary, or so they say.”

“What about the stone behind the metal grate in the side of the building?” I asked. “The one that they were sprinkling with holy water?”

“That’s the London Stone,” said Chesterfield. “It’s actually one of our most important historic relics, but it’s been largely forgotten. It used to be the center-point from which everything else in the city was measured. Until recently, it was actually stored in the corner of a building on Cannon Street, just as you saw. Now it’s in the Museum of London. Nobody ever talks about it. But some people think it’s the stone that Arthur pulled the Excalibur sword from.”

“Oh yes, I’ve heard of this,” I said. “It is amazing how little it’s talked about.

But John Dee, the court astrologer for Queen Elizabeth I, believed that it had magical powers. He even moved to Cannon Street to be near it.” Chesterfield laughed.

“I didn’t know that. But I did know about Dee. He was much more than a court astrologer. He was the first 007. He did all sorts of shady special ops on Her Majesty’s Secret Service. The folks at SIS consider him a godfather of sorts.”

This was amazing to hear from a person in Chesterfield’s position.

“I’ve heard that before,” I said. “But I wasn’t sure if I should take the claim seriously. Now I have to believe it.”

I looked up the London Stone on Wikipedia to refresh my memory. I found a picture of it sitting behind the grating in the recess that used to house it.

Then I did a Google search, and landed on a poem in Middle English from 1521 called “The Marriage of London Stone and the Boss of Billingsgate.” This was the same phrase used on one of the title pages in the horrible film!

“Uh, Chesterfield, look at this ,” I said.

“I know,” he replied. “I’ve seen it. We found it when we analyzed the film.

But I don’t fully understand the significance of the poem, or why its title was used in the film. However, the building next to the River Thames with the boats docked next to it was Billingsgate, the fish market. Old Billingsgate, before they moved it to Canary Wharf on the Isle of Dogs.”

I looked up “Bosse of Billingsgate” next, and landed on a sample on Google Play Books from a recent work called The Secret Lore of London by Iain Sinclair.

There, it was explained that the "Bosse" was actually a phallus which in pre-Christian days had been venerated as a form of the "Great Mother" goddess Britomart, after whom Britain was named.

Another Great Mother, just like Cybele, I thought to myself. And only a hermaphrodite goddess like Cybele could be represented with a phallus.

I read on. I learned that until the seventeenth century the Bosse had stood there at the gate of Belin (now Billingsgate), believed to provide protection. It was named after Belinus, who, as I recalled, was an ancient king of the Britons, as well as a Celtic sun god, thought by many to equate with the Babylonian Baal.

Orientalist L.A. Waddell had argued in his book The British Edda from 1930 that there was a single person behind the myths of all three figures.

Baal, in turn, was analogous to Attis. Like Attis, Baal was a victim who played essentially the same role with the goddess Inanna (a.k.a. Ishtar) that Attis did in the Cybele cult. The anniversary of her murder of her own son/husband, for the exact same reason that Cybele killed Attis (erotic jealousy), was observed as a holiday of morning by her worshippers, as it was with Cybele's. Likewise, Baal's resurrection was celebrated joyously a few days afterwards. This took place during the Spring Equinox, which was also their New Year's Day, morphing eventually into the European holiday of Easter, which was named after Ishtar/Inanna.

There in Mesopotamia, her priests were called the Gallu, almost the exact same word as the title of Cybele's priests, the Galli. It's derived from the Sumerian word "gal," meaning "cup" or "vagina." The Gallu, just like the Galli, were also castrated and dressed as women. In both cults, the priests were actually considered women from this point on, and addressed as such.

The Babylonian equinox rites also included the sacrifice of the Celestial Bull, Gugalanna, just like Cybele was honored with the taurobolium, a bull sacrifice in which her priests were completely drenched in the blood of the victim. This was performed in Cybele's specially-outfitted slaughterhouse temples, known as metroons, after her title “Magna Mater” (“Great Mother”).

Could this ‘metroon’ be what that one guy at the Butchers meeting meant when I thought I heard him say the words ‘Meth room’? I wondered.

Then I remembered that a couple of years ago, Oxford University had created a 2/3 scale copy of the arch from the Temple of Baal in Palmyra, Syria after ISIS had destroyed the original, and had the replica erected in Trafalgar Square in London during the Autumnal Equinox of 2016. I recalled that the original had been blown up right after the Spring Equinox of that same year, which I pointed out during an interview on a paranormal radio talk show, Ground Zero with Clyde Lewis.

At the time, Mr. Lewis and I had talked about the fact that the Islamic State’s original name, which the Western media still insisted on using, was identical to that of Isis, the Egyptian word for the goddess same goddess as Inanna and Ishtar. Amazingly, while I was sitting there at the pub in England reading more about Isis, I stumbled upon information that the portion of the River Thames that flows through Oxford is actually called “the Isis.” Thus one of the university’s rowing teams has the same name as the Egyptian goddess, and the Islamic State.

This got me thinking about the origin of the name “Thames,” so I looked that up too. There are theories circulating that it might have come from any of a number of words from various languages that all denote the concept of darkness.

But nobody’s certain.

As for the River Isis, some old maps have the entire river labeled with that name. A few historians have suggested that it was just a truncation of the Latin name for the river, “Tamesis.” But then there were people saying that there was a temple of Isis in roman London located on the banks of the river near the present-day on ramp to London Bridge.

So then it makes sense for the river to be named after her, I thought.

Then I remembered Tammuz, another Semitic name (derived from the Sumerian “Dumuzid”) for the figure of Baal, the sacrificed son of Inanna/Ishtar.

Is that the possible origin of ‘Thames’? I wondered. If the river from its source to Dorchester was once called ‘Isis’ after the Great Mother, maybe the river from there to its mouth was named after her castrated zombie son and consort. It seemed like a reasonable thesis, and when I Googled it in the form of a question, I found the writings of many who agreed with me.

My head was reeling with all these connections. Then I read more about the Bosse of Billingsgate in the “Secret London” book. It said: The local porters would insist on passers-by kissing the Bosse or else they picked them up and bumped them on the seat against the stone.

I figured this was a sanitized version.

In other words, anal rape with the sacred dildo would at least be simulated, I thought. Or worse, not simulated.

I showed my findings to Chesterfield. Now we understood, at least in part, the symbolism of the anal rape “marriage” ceremony we had witnessed.

“I think that the London Stone was used in the rape scene,” I said. “It was the square rock that they kept knocking her head against.”

“I know,” said Chesterfield.

“So that means they somehow had access to it,” I noted.

“Yes,” he replied curtly. I suppose I was stating the obvious.

“Also, the goddess Cybele was symbolized by a stone,” I added. “She was worshiped in the form of a black meteorite in Rome. I’ve even seen claims that the Kaaba stone in Mecca is actually the Cybele stone.”

Chesterfield was silent. His arms were folded in front of him. He was angry and depressed. I reviewed the scenes in my mind, trying not to dwell on the suffering I had witnessed. Instead I focused only on the objects, the places, and the symbols involved. Then I remembered what became of the boy’s testicles in the film.

“What about the birds in the cages?” I said. “The ones that were fed with the … meat?”

“Yes, that might be the most disturbing, really. Those are the famous ravens of the Tower of London.”

“What are those?” I asked.

“You don’t know?” he said. “Nine ravens are always kept at the Tower of London. It’s been going on for hundreds of years. There’s a legend that if there aren’t at least six ravens on site at any given moment, the kingdom will fall. You haven’t heard this before?”

“No,” I answered.

“Well the thing is, those birds are guarded at all times. It’s a matter of national defense. The only way anybody could get access to them would be if the Raven-Master allowed it.”

I Googled this term and, sure enough, found a video of the current Raven-Master, dressed like the guy on the Beefeater vodka bottle. He was feeding nine birds with clipped wings in the very same park where we had watched their predecessors eating what might have been the raw testicles of a young boy.

“So it’s looking like a rather large conspiracy then,” I said.

“Is that a joke?” said Chesterfield. “I’m really not in the mood for jokes right now.”

“It’s just a term for a criminal collusion,” I said. “By definition that’s a conspiracy, even if it doesn’t involve people in the government, which this clearly does.” I was so sick of the way in which intelligence agencies use the term

“conspiracy theory” (a phrase actually invented by the CIA for this very purpose).

They made it a term of derision that could be used to belittle anyone who tries to figure out what they and their deep state accomplices are up to.

“Oh,” said Chesterfield, still looking dour. “I thought you were referring to the fact that a group of ravens is called a ‘conspiracy.’ Like a ‘murder of crows.’”

“They are?” I thought that was hilarious, yet I dared not laugh. “But aren’t ravens the same as crows?”

“They're in the same family,” he replied gloomily.

“So where’s the estate where the Temple Bar was moved to?” I asked.

“It’s a bit far out,” he answered. “But anyway, it’s not there anymore. It was moved back to the City of London a few years ago.”

“Really?” I said. “Where is it now?”

“Oh, it’s over in Paternoster Square now, in front of St. Paul’s,” said an older brunette woman standing in front of our table. She was wearing a white apron over a pink dress with a name tag that said “Mary.” She worked for the pub.

Chesterfield and I both jumped in our seats. We hadn’t realized that anyone was standing there.

“Sorry to startle you,” she said. “I just wanted to let you know that we’re closing the kitchen for the night. But we still have two hours ‘til last call.”

“That’s alright,” said Chesterfield. “I think we’re done drinking here anyway, and I’m certain we won’t be hungry for awhile.” He started shutting down my computer.

“They just moved the Temple of Mithras too,” Mary said. “It’s going to be right down the street from St. Paul’s. It’s opening tomorrow.”

“Excuse me, did you just say ‘the Temple of Mithras’?’” I asked.

“Yep,” she said. “It used to be out there at Temple Court, on Queen Victoria Street. But then someone bought it, dug it up, and moved it to the new plaza they’re building on Walbrook, next to the Mansion House.”

“You mean the Mansion House where the Lord Mayor lives?” asked Chesterfield.

“The very same,” said the waitress.

Mary left and we began to pack up our things. I reminded Chesterfield that the word ‘Meth room,’ had been used in the divination meeting at Oriental Club.

“Maybe he was saying mithraeum, I suggested. “That’s the Latin word for a temple of Mithras. I didn’t even know London had a Mithras temple, or else I might have thought about that. But it’s also strange that mithraeum is so similar to metroon, the name for a Cybele temple. I wonder if there’s a connection.”

Then as I turned around to pick up my coat, I noticed a person watching me in the window of the building directly across the street— not the former Bank of England building, but another one to the east of it on the opposite side of the corner of Chancery Lane and Fleet. As soon as I caught sight of the figure, it disappeared.

The room across the street was too dark for me to see any details. I wondered how long he or she had been watching us, as well as how clearly the details of my computer screen might have been from that view, since our table was well-lit. This remained on my mind as we exited the tavern and walked out into the brisk night air.

Chapter 14: Rerouting…

Many roads Thou hast fashioned: all of them lead to the Light.

— Rudyard Kipling, “The Song of Mithras” from Puck of Pook’s Hill

I wasn’t sure what Chesterfield had in mind for me next. But I intended to tell him that I was too physically exhausted to continue for the night. He seemed annoyed about something. I couldn’t help worrying that it wasn’t just the disturbing investigation, but actually me that was pissing him off. I was just about to open my mouth about this when a familiar black Vauxhall Astra Elite pulled up right in front of us. The tinted driver’s side window rolled down.

“Car service!” Agent Paris called out to us.

“Where did he come from?” I asked Chesterfield.

“He called while you were in the toilets,” Chesterfield replied. “He offered to pick us up. But you’re welcome to walk back to the tube station by yourself if you want. As for me, I’m freezing my arse off!” He rushed over to back car door and opened it, then stepped aside.

“Are you coming?” he asked. I got in. This time, he closed the door and then got into the front passenger seat instead of sitting next to me.

“Thanks for the ride, Parvin,” he told his partner.

“Parvin? Is that your first name?” I asked Agent Paris. “I know a lady at the British Museum with almost the same name.”

“It’s a common Persian name for both men and women, with several variants,” he answered. “It’s Farsi for the Pleaides.”

“Oh,” I said. “That’s interesting. Say, would you mind dropping me off at the Regent Palace?” Chesterfield turned around and stared at me incredulously.

“You seriously want to go back to the Regent Palace?” he said. “That place is a dump! And the Worshipful Butchers know your room number. It’s not safe!”

“Well, I don’t have anywhere else to sleep,” I said. And I can’t stay awake much longer.” I would have gleefully laid down on just about any horizontal surface right then.

“Chesterfield and I were wondering if you’d like to have a slumber party at his place tonight,” said Paris. The car fell absolutely silent. I was sure there was a punchline coming. After an awkward minute, I felt I had to say something.

“Well, I’m not normally in the habit of having slumber parties with groups of men that I’ve just met.” I set it up and waited for the punchline. Knock knock, who’s there? Finally, Chesterfield responded.

“And we are normally in the habit of having people we want to interrogate arrested, then held without formal charges for as long as legally possible. But we thought we’d get more cooperation from you if we approached it in a more friendly manner. Besides, aren’t you curious? Don’t you want to help with the investigation, to see where it leads? It’s directly related to your Templar research, isn’t it? And haven’t we already figured out so many amazing things together?”

He turned around to face the front, but Paris continued with the argument.

“We need your help solving this case, Pamela. There are sensitive details that we can’t make public which are so bizarre and arcane that only an expert like you could us help analyze them. And really, there aren’t any other experts like you—not in your particular subjects.”

“Look, honestly, if you want my help, let me return home tomorrow, and we can correspond through email,” I said. “I’m not doing this off the books anymore, and I’m certainly not going with you guys to Chesterfield’s apartment.”

“You’re in this whether you like it or not,” Chesterfield rebutted. “You are connected to the fake Baron of Alphamstone, to whose apartments in Chancery Lane we traced the transmission of the child porn and torture video you and I just watched at the Old Cock Tavern. And that video showed children being raped and mutilated. So now we think this might have been done by the same people who you say kidnapped you and forced you to watch the killing of an animal.

Therefore, if you don’t want to help us find the people that did these things, and bring them to justice, to stop them from hurting anyone else, I’ve got to assume it’s because you haven’t told me the truth, in which case you’re not a victim, you’re an accomplice.”

“Wait a minute,” I said. “You traced the origin of the video? So the anonymous tip page wasn’t really anonymous?”

“Of course not, don’t be stupid,” said Chesterfield. Paris studied my reaction in the rearview mirror as he turned through a roundabout.

“And you traced it to Chancery Lane, that same street that we walked down to get to the pub at Temple?”

“Yes, and of course you know who lives there.”

“I don’t know anything about it,” I answered. “You said Aleister Crowley used to live there. That’s all I know.”

“Oh, so Leopold Black never gave you the address to his apartment next to the silver vaults?” Chesterfield asked, not believing me. As he spoke I noted that we were coincidentally going right by the silver vaults on Chancery Lane once again before turning west on High Holborn.

“I assumed that he lived in Alphamstone in some grand estate!” I said. “I obviously didn’t know anything about him that was actually true. I told you that!”

“And now we’re telling you that he’s involved in making these child torture films, in addition to everything else we’ve told you about him,” said Agent Paris.

“Doesn’t that make you want to help us stop him?”

“Yes,” I said. “But why do we have to do it at Chesterfield’s house? Surely that’s not MI5 procedure.”

“Well, MI5 may have been decapitated tonight, or else, it is thoroughly compromised,” Paris answered. “And nobody outside the agency knows it yet, except you.”

“What do you mean?” I said, thoroughly confused. “Explain.”

“For some reason, our Director, Mr. Pindar, made a special request to interview Thomas Weir personally in the basement of the Old Bailey, right after he was booked and about to be transferred to a holding cell. Then the two disappeared shortly thereafter.”

“So Leopold is on the loose right now?” I said. “And he’s kidnapped the Director?” For some reason I couldn’t stop calling that man by his fake name.

“Either that or they’re both in on it, which is what I suspect,” answered Paris. “So do you understand why it isn’t safe for you to go back to the hotel, or back home, or for us to have you interrogated through the normal channels? We have to figure out what’s going on by ourselves, or else none of us are safe. And who knows what the bad guys are going to do next, or who else may be in danger.”

“Isn’t that an extreme accusation?” I said.

“We’ve had Russian agents directing both MI5 & MI6 before,” said Chesterfield. “I don’t see why these occult weirdos, whatever they are, couldn’t worm their way into that den of vipers as well.”

I assumed he was talking about the allegations from the best-selling 1980s book Spycatcher, claiming that Roger Hollis had been a Russian spy when he served as MI5 Director General in the 50s and 60s. The author believed that Hollis and many others were in league with the infamous Cambridge Five spy ring that had already been caught and defected. Of course, these allegations had in no way ever been proven, as Chesterfield had implied. But I wasn’t going to argue with him. He was probably right anyway.

“So how did they disappear from the prison?” I asked. “How many others are in on it?”

“The number of accomplices is unknown, but it needn’t have been very many. All that was required was a few dumb cops following orders without question. Turns out there's a trap door in the floor of the Old Bailey's basement that leads to the sewers, out of which they disappeared."

"So is anybody looking for them?" I asked.

"Yeah, we've got cops and other agents up to their necks in shit looking underneath the City for them, but so far nothing," said Paris. "They really could be anywhere by now. Our guys let an hour pass for this interrogation before anybody checked on them." He was obviously disgusted.

Just then, the cell phones of both agents rang at the same time. They had different ringtones. It was a jarring cacophony. They both answered, received some sort of shocking news, and then looked at each other in horror before hanging up. Paris abruptly turned his vehicle around and changed the destination on his GPS.

"Where are we going now? What's going on?" I demanded. Chesterfield turned around and looked at me solemnly.

"Director Pindar's head was just found spiked to the main arch of Temple Bar at Paternoster Square," he said.

Chapter 15: Empyrean and Beyond

O Satan, my youngest born, art thou not Prince of the Starry Hosts, lo And of the Wheels of Heaven, to turn the Mills day & night?

—William Blake, Milton

Before I had time to absorb the news, we were already there, pulling up on Warwick Lane, right next to the monument. The area was already cordoned off with a flurry of police presence. We all got out of the car simultaneously and began to walk briskly towards the action. A woman in a mustard-colored trench coat, who seemed to know both agents, hurried towards us. She briefed them on what she knew while I stood aside. Then Paris continued to talk to her about details while Chesterfield relayed the highlights to me while.

“The head was tacked to the front,” he said, “and the body was stuffed inside the upper chamber.”

“The same location as the rape scene in the video,” I noted. Chesterfield nodded.

“They used to hang the heads of traitors on Temple Bar,” he remarked.

“So Leopold considers the Director of MI5 a traitor?” I said, thinking aloud.

“And he was able to kidnap and kill him after the man requested a private meeting with him? I thought you said he was a fake nobleman running a scam for money. How does he have the power to do this?”

“That’s what I’m trying to figure out,” he said. “In the meantime, Miss Beverly Equitone is the acting head of MI5 until a replacement is made.

Now I have no idea what side she’s on, or what the sides in this matter even are. But there’s something else I want you to see.”

He grabbed my hand and walked me over to the monument, then lifted the cordon to let me underneath. We walked to the little door in the back, sitting open and guarded by two Metropolitan police officers with bright reflective yellow jackets. Chesterfield flashed his badge and asked the cops to let us examine the crime scene, to which they both nodded in affirmation. Then we walked up the tiny stairway into the upper chamber which, Chesterfield informed me, had at one time served as a small prison.

There were three police officers in the room: a white man taking pictures, a white man dusting for fingerprints, and one white woman with green hair (the faded remnants of a punk-looking dye job), who appeared to be supervising them.

There was blood splattered on the floor. Chesterfield asked them if the body had already been removed.

“No, just the head,” said the lady cop. The body’s up there.”

She pointed up to the ceiling in the middle of the room. The body hung naked from the rafters, tied with black wire by the hands and feet so that it was curled into a circle with the stomach pointing down. In addition to the removal of the head, there was a puncture wound near the navel.

“So that’s how the blood got splattered like that,” said Chesterfield, apparently to himself.

“Yeah, all over the black magic symbols on the ground,” said the photographer.

“What do you mean?” I asked. I didn’t see any black magic symbols.

“You have to use blue light to see them,” he said. “450 nanometers. And I had to use a special camera to photograph it.” He flicked off the one light in the room at the switch. He handed me and Chesterfield each a pair of amber-colored goggles. Then he pointed his blue flashlight where the blood drops were. To my surprise, I did see symbols standing out, looking white in the light, written underneath the spatter.

An invisible ink had been used to create an arrangement of words, letters, and other symbols. At the top it said “To Empyrean and Beyond,” with an odd sigil forming the exclamation point. It was a circle with a dot in the middle, topped with an arrow pointing upward, the astrological sign for Uranus.

Beneath this was one of the oldest magical devices used in the Western world, the Sator Square, a palindrome which goes: SATOR

AREPO

TENET

ROTAS

The entire display took up an area of about a foot square.

“It’s all written in semen,” the photographer said.

“The invisible ink used by SIS!” said Chesterfield.

“What do you mean?” I said, waiting for an explanation.

“Yeah, what do you mean?” the photographer asked. The other male cop, the fingerprint collector, came closer to listen.

“Well, see,” Chesterfield continued, “it was really an inside joke. It was a reference to the fact during the First World War, when the spy service was new just then being formed, they used semen as an invisible ink for sending secret messages to each other. ‘Every man his own stylo,’ they used to say. Their director, Mansfield Cumming, came up with that himself.

“His last name was actually ‘Cumming’?” I said. I couldn’t help myself.

“This guy’s first name was actually ‘Côme,’” Chesterfield replied without humor, pointing to the body above us. He pronounced it like “comb.”

“It’s a French variant of the name ‘Cosmo,’” said the photographer.

“I wonder if that’s why this message was written in this medium,” the fingerprint collector interjected. “It could have been a reference to Mansfield Cumming’s invisible ink, something that would be understood only by people who work in national intelligence and security, or who are familiar with their history.”

Chesterfield shrugged his shoulder. “Who knows at this point. We assume it’s the killer’s semen, right? I mean, it doesn’t keep well, so he must have jerked off somewhere right here, don’t you think?”

“Yes, before he strung up the body,” said the fingerprint guy.

“So did you find a source pool of semen?” asked Chesterfield. “Or did he collect it in his hand, or a cup or something, before he started writing and drawing with it?”

“He collected it in the victim’s eye socket,” said the green-haired lady, who walked towards us now, looking deadpan. “The director was subjected to ‘ocular penetration.’ We found spermatic fluid around and within the left eye socket, but we haven’t yet determined if the victim was still alive when it was deposited. And the eye is missing.” Chesterfield’s eyes widened in horror.

Skullfucked, I thought. I guess it really does happen. How awful.

“Oh, I think he must have had a larger supply than just that one inkwell,” said the fingerprint collector. “I think he brought a supply with him, kept fresh somehow. He would have needed more to do all this writing.”

While the three cops discussed this, Chesterfield pulled me back a few steps, closer to the stairwell, so that we could speak to each other directly. He lowered his voice—not to a whisper, but just enough so that we wouldn’t interrupt the others.

“What’s this about?” Chesterfield asked me, pointing to the symbols.

“It’s an ancient magic spell. The oldest one they ever found was in the ruins of Herculeaum near Vesuvius. It means ‘The ploughman Arepo works the wheels.”

But nobody knows who Arepo is, or what the whole thing means at all.

"What's it supposed to do?" he asked.

"I think it could be used for blessing or cursing, whichever you choose," I said.

I realized this was totally vague. But my mind was distracted by the other graffiti next to the magic square. On either side of it were the "Alpha" and "Omega" symbols. Beneath the Alpha on the left was an image of a crudely-drawn penis and testicles descending into a vase. Underneath the Omega symbol there was a picture of a baby's head emerging from an identical vase.

"So I suppose the other pictures represent what happened to the boy in the movie," Chesterfield theorized. "Also, the castration, and maybe the references in the film to laying 'an Easter egg.' It could be connected to this picture of the baby hatching out of the vase, right?"

"Yes," I said. "And Empyrean is the highest chamber in Heaven, although I don't know what that weird arrow is about."

"Oh," said Chesterfield. "I thought for sure it was a quote from Buzz Lightyear."

I ignored his joke, although I had noted the similarity to the phrase "To Infinity and Beyond" as well. I also thought about the final segment of the film 2001: A Space Odyssey, entitled "Jupiter and Beyond the Infinite," although in Arthur C. Clarke's original plans for the story, the planet named was Saturn.

"There's more," I said. "I recognize these images. They came from the Templar artifacts in the Hammer-Purgstall book—the one I had translated and published along with my own book last year."

I shook my head in an effort to snap myself back into reality. Then I dug into my phone and Google-image-searched until I found a website where some asshole had illegally uploaded a PDF of my book about Baphomet. I skimmed through the document until I found the image I was looking for.

“Here it is,” I announced. I showed him the picture of the human figure (let’s assume it’s male for the sake of grammar) sitting on an eagle. He had what looked like a dead goose or duck draped over his head, so that the bird’s neck dangled over his face, its beak lining up with his chin. Behind him, the bird’s wings were extended out, as if they were coming out of his own back.

Two identical stomach-shaped vases were depicted sitting next to the figure, one on either side. The one on the right had a baby emerging from its top, beneath an angry sun face (exactly where the Omega symbol had been substituted in the version in front of us). The vase on the left side had a crudely-drawn penis and balls descending into it beneath a crescent moon with a sad face, in the same spot where the killer had placed the Greek Alpha in his disgusting homage.

In the original line drawing in Hammer-Purgstall’s book, the genitals had been omitted. They were only restored when the picture was reprinted a few decades later in Thomas Wright’s scandalous book Worship of the Generative Powers, about the allegedly widespread penis-worshipping “cult of Priapus” in early Christian Europe. Wright had believed that all of the disembodied penis votives discovered throughout the continent and British Isles were part of a secret movement to worship a virile satyr with a giant schlong by venerating idols of the schlong itself. This supposed underground religion reportedly engaged in wild orgies, bacchanalias and witch sabbats where the Goat God of Lust was honored as the Devil.

All this purported veneration of male sexuality seemed to me so incongruent with the present use of this symbol by a cult that practiced emasculation, as seen on the film Easter Sunday April Fool. (I was assuming, of course, that there was some connection between whoever produced that film and whoever murdered Pindar.) But, as I noted to Chesterfield, if someone believes that there's magic in men's genitals, then it isn't farfetched to imagine them removing someone else's genitals in a ritual to be used for magical purposes.

"So far we've got a secret society that does rites involving the symbols of the Templars, Cybele, Priapus… What else? It seems like a hodgepodge of nonsense," said Chesterfield. The photographer flicked the light back on as he exited down the stairs behind us.

"Well, Eliphas Levi wrote that the aim of the Templars had been to create 'the synthesis of all persecuted beliefs,' meaning a combination of all heresies and pre-Christian religions," I said. "Pope Pius IX accused them of trying to start a new religion, inspired by cabbalism, Gnosticism, and heretical beliefs about John the Baptist. Hammer-Purgstall believed that the Templars were Ophite Gnostics, or Naassenes. And Hippolytus described the Naassenes as a cult of synthesis derived from the mystery religions of Rome, but mixed with Christian heresy, including blasphemous inversions of Christian symbols and myths. He said they practiced horrible sex rites. Let me find the quote."

I Googled on my phone until I found what I needed. But it said more than I had remembered. I read it out loud:

On account of these and such like reasons, these constantly attend the mysteries called those of the Great Mother, supposing especially that they behold by means of the ceremonies performed there the entire mystery.

The succinctness of his claim stunned me. I actually took a step back in awe.

"Oh my God," I said. "The Great Mother. That's Cybele. He said that the Naassenes secretly worshiped Cybele. That means Hammer-Purgstall believed that the Templars did as well. Which would explain why they might have depicted Mete or Baphomet on the coffer looking much like Cybele. It would also explain this picture of severed genitals going into a vase. And why the Templars were buried with their legs crossed. And why Eliphas Levi’s Baphomet is missing his penis.”

Suddenly Chesterfield piped up with an amazing contribution that I didn’t expect.

“You know what else Hippolytus said? He said that St. Paul was a eunuch, because he thought that Jesus was too. That’s what he said Paul thought the term

‘eunuchs of heaven’ meant. Just like the guy in the Heaven’s Gate cult you told me about. And here we are now, right next to St. Paul’s Cathedral, standing underneath the dead body of a man quite possibly murdered by a castration cult.”

I was impressed with his commentary. I did not think that Chesterfield would know anything about Hippolytus!

“I studied for the seminary before I became a spook,” he said, responding to my obvious bewilderment. “And by the way, that set of beads we saw at the end of the movie?”

“Yeah?” I said, encouraging him to go on.

“They’re actually called ‘paternosters.’ It’s a monk’s rosary, for reciting the paternoster 150 times, the same as the number of chapters in The Book of Psalms. That’s why there were 50 beads. You’re supposed to go through the set three times a day.”

“And don’t forget the Mithras connection too,” said a voice coming from the staircase below. Agent Paris was walking up to join us.

“How did you know about the Mithras connection?” I asked. “We just found out about it right before we left the tavern. Surely Chesterfield hasn’t had a chance to tell you.”

“Well, I was just thinking about the magic square on the floor,” he answered. “The photographer came out and showed me a photo he took with a UV-sensitive camera. The Sator Square is associated with Mithras, right?”

“It is?” I said. I hadn’t thought so.

If I’d read that before, I’d forgotten it. But Paris came over and showed me a website open on his phone addressing the theory that the talisman had originated with the Mithraic cult.

Apparently, the “Sator” (a Latin word meaning “ploughman,” “planter” and, by extension, “begetter,” “producer” or “father”) was thought to refer in this instance to Saturn, the planet to which the highest grade of Mithraism was dedicated. The letters of the square could be rearranged to make the word

“Paternoster” twice, Latin for “our Father.” This was thought to be a reference to the title of this grade, “Pater.” The two “Paternosters” could then be combined to form a cross, with four remaining letters—two letters A and two letters O—to stand for “Alpha” and “Omega” on each side of the cross. The resulting formation looked like this:

As I continued to read the website on Paris’ phone, I learned that in the Mithraic taurtoctony (the tradition containing their famous bull-slaying fable), Mithras apparently allowed the beast’s testicles to be severed by the pinchers of a scorpion. Then they were offered as a sacrifice to the moon goddess, who used the blood and sperm within the testicles to engender new forms of life on Earth.

Mithras then began to harvest and cultivate these lifeforms, thus forming his association with agriculture.

I recalled that Chronos (a.k.a. the Roman Saturn) had been said by the Greeks centuries earlier to be the inventor of agriculture. This matched up with what I was now reading about Mithras, who was seen as a form of Saturn. I learned that images of Mithras reaping corn stalks emerging from the rectum of the sacrificial bull have been discovered in more than one mithraeum.

The website quoted another author claiming that in Mithraic rites, a bull would be sodomized by the priest and then killed as soon as the priest climaxed.

Pointing out that the Mithraic temples forbade female members, the quote segment stated that the cult’s misogyny was represented in their creation myth.

Mithras had been born from a rock instead of a woman. Furthermore, it also said: To eliminate the female principle from their creation myth, Mithraists replaced the Mother of All Living in the primal garden of paradise (Pairdaeza) with the bull named Sole-Created. Instead of Eve, this bull was the partner of the first man. (It doesn't take much imagination to figure out what happened between Man and Bull.

Man engaged in bestiality by raping Bull and then killed Bull out of repugnance, fear and guilt. And then sought out other Bulls so he could do it all over again….) [sp.]

I had to admit, I didn't really know enough about Mithraism, and this was a surprise to me. As my head spun with a thousand new theories, I gave my companions the Cliff Notes version of what I had just read, then handed Paris' phone back to him.

"Oh, why can't we be more like our ancient ancestors," said Chesterfield sarcastically to the ceiling. "They were so much more in touch with nature. Ugh!"

Paris had wrinkled his nosed in disgust. "Yeah, well that's not all. Turns out there's a magic square just like this in a church in England. And guess where."

He pressed the "back" button on his phone's internet browser, and brought up another page. It was an article from The Telegraph titled "Unique Sator-Rotas Square Discovered." It said the location was a sixteenth-century Anglican church dedicated to St. Barnabas in none other than Alphamstone, the location of Leopold Black's fake barony. There was a picture of a white female priest, older with short grey hair, wearing glasses, and standing next to an inscription of the magic square on a medieval-looking wall.

"Unbelievable," I said. "This is amazing."

I wondered to myself if the word "Alphamstone" contained a hidden reference to "Alpha" and "Omega," given the connection between the church and the Sator Square, as well as the fact that these two Greek letters were written next to the version now on the floor in front of us. I also recalled once seeing a terrible low-budget movie from the 1970s called Curse of the Alpha Stone. It was about a professor who discovered an alchemical substance that made men sexually violent, and even turned gay guys straight.

“So what was it about Mithras that you and my partner found out while you were at the Olde Cock Tavern?” Paris asked. I struggled to remember. We had been drinking, and so many shocking things had happened that night already.

“Her friends at the fake Butchers’ Society said that some guy somewhere in London was doing something nefarious at a Temple of Mithras,” answered Chesterfield. “Then our waitress told us that there was a Temple of Mithras in London that had just been moved back to its original location on Walbrook, a stone’s throw from St. Paul’s. She said that tomorrow they’re opening the new building that it’s in.”

“Yeah, that’s at Rosenberg Plaza right down there,” said the punk-haired lady cop. I had already noticed that she’d been eavesdropping on me, Paris and Chesterfield as much as possible.

“They’re having a ping-pong tournament there tomorrow as part of the festivities,” she continued. “I’m on one of the teams that’s playing.”

“A ping-pong tournament?” I asked. “To celebrate a temple to Mithras opening?” I couldn’t see the connection.

“Well it’s not just the temple,” she replied. “That’s just part of it. There’s the rest of the Plaza too. It’s huge. Two buildings, one of them the most massive in London really. Not the tallest, but the biggest in bulk. And there are going to be several restaurants in the lobby, including a pizza parlor with ping pong tables, where I’ll be playing on the same team as my son Dennis.”

I looked at her with my mouth slightly ajar. I must have looked stupid. Both MI5 agents eyed me curiously. I pulled them both close to me and whispered, very faintly this time, since I knew the lady cop was trying to catch every word.

“Do you remember a scandal called Pizzagate? From right before the US Presidential election two years ago?”

“Um, no, that’s an English football scandal” said Chesterfield. He was referring to something else that went by the same name.

“Yes, I remember, but I thought it was bullshit,” whispered Paris. “Fake news? Russian propaganda?”

“Kids supposedly getting raped and dismembered by cultists,” I said through barely-parted lips. “Just like you saw on the Easter film, right?”

Chesterfield stroked his chin and thought. Agent Paris’ phone rang again and he went off to the corner to answer it. I asked the lady cop what time the opening ceremonies were at the mithraeum.

“I believe they begin at noon tomorrow,” she said. “That’s when they cut the ribbon with giant scissors. The rest happens shortly after that.”

“Well that sounds like something too good to be missed,” said Paris, who had ended his call quickly returned already. “Now I think we should leave this dreary scene in the capable hands the Met. As for us, we’ve got to be going. Come along friends.”

He nodded at me and Chesterfield while beckoning towards the stairway with his right hand. We took the hint and followed him immediately, telling the lady cop, who introduced herself as “Drexella,” that it had been pleasant meeting her. I told her my name was “Amanda Styles.” I made it up on the spot.

“The only ‘Drexella’ I’ve ever known is the wife of an American TV preacher,” I said to the other two as we descended the stairs.

“Quiet.” whispered Paris. We remained mute until we got out of the Temple Bar and a few feet away from the police cordon. Paris walked us over to the pylon with the golden flame on top in the middle of the square. Then Chesterfield and I huddled next to him to hear what he couldn’t say in front of the cops.

“So Miss Equitone’s secretary just called. She wants me to meet with her and some people from Scotland Yard tomorrow. I tried to get her to push it ‘til noon, saying its been a long night. But the latest she would accept was 10 a.m. So we’d better get someplace where we can safely sleep and do our research as much as possible before then.”

“What about me?” said Chesterfield. “Shouldn’t she want to talk to me as well? I handled the Weir case with you.”

“Yes, I thought that sounded odd too, perhaps ominous of an internal investigation of you. So we’d better get our shit together tonight and tomorrow morning. Who knows what’s about to get dropped on us.”

“Sure,” said Chesterfield. “So do you know where this Temple of Mithras is going to open tomorrow? Drexella said it was close.”

“Just over there,” Paris said, pointing west. “Where Cannon Street and Queen Victoria meet.

“Isn’t that about where the London Stone used to be displayed at the Cannon Tapps?” Chesterfield said to his partner. “Remember reading that last night?”

“Ah yes,” Paris answered. “Well isn’t that interesting.”

As he spoke, I walked around the column looking for symbolism. I found a plaque stating that the pylon—called the “Flaming Orb Monument”—had been installed in 1996, which explained its modern, boring appearance. The plaque also said that the monument acted as a ventilation shaft for an underground service road.

Then I noticed a small metal door a few feet around to the right. It was slightly ajar. I reached for the handle and pulled it. Sure enough, it opened right up to a dark cavern inside, and a subterranean spiral metal stairway leading down into the unknown depths below.

“Do you suppose they could have gotten out of the sewers through here?” I said. Chesterfield and Paris were staring in stupefaction.

“Well, we’ll find out,” said Paris, grabbing my hand and removing it from the door handle. “I’m sure the CCTV footage is back by now. Let’s go tell the cops what we found. Then let’s get out of here.”

We all walked briskly back to the police cordon area around Temple Bar and stopped at the edge of the tape line. Paris stepped over the tape and talked to an older white man in a black trench coat with salt and pepper hair. He must have told him about the stairway beneath the pylon, as they both pointed and looked at it. Then the man told Paris something that made him shout out.

“Christ on a crutch! What the bloody Hell?!” He was enraged. The man shrugged and shook his head sideways. Paris spat on the ground and then marched back over to us.

“Well guess what. The power on the whole block was blacked out for about ten minutes, inexplicably. None of the cameras recorded the action. Imagine that.” This gave Chesterfield great fear. Clearly a deep-level plot was afoot.

“We need to go right now,” he said. “Before somebody kills us.”

Chapter 16: Tower House

…Participants are free to use the information received, but neither the identity nor the affiliation of the speaker(s), nor that of any other participant, may be revealed.

— Chatham House Rule, Royal Institute of International Affairs

We drove in somber silence to Chesterfield's cozy little one-bedroom flat in "Tower House." This was a gigantic 120-year-old former "Rowton house" (a type of worker's hostel) in Whitechapel, The first thing I noticed was a white marble bust of Pallas Athena, yet another wisdom goddess, placed above the inside of his front door.

"You must be a huge fan of Edgar Allan Poe," I said.

"Nevermore!" said Chesterfield jokingly. "I was mostly into him in college, when I installed that thing, and I've actually lived in the same flat since then. Just a lonely bachelor. But I keep it there to remind me of my mother, whose name was Lenore. And that's also the name of my cat." He picked up the fat gray kitty, who had come to rub on his leg.

"Oh, has your mother passed?" I said. "I'm sorry." I sat in one of the two brown leather armchairs set in front of the fireplace and facing the large flat-screen television mounted on the wall. Paris took the other. The fireplace was gas-powered with ceramic logs. Chesterfield turned it on straight away. Up against another wall, perpendicular to the armchairs and television, was a blue and red plaid-patterned tweed-covered sofa, where he began piling our coats and bags on the right side.

"She and Dad both," he said. "Long ago."

He pointed to a lovely old framed black-and-white photograph of a young white couple standing with a baby before an Anglican priest.

“Here they are having me christened at St. Martin’s, right next to St. Paul’s.

They’re both Christopher Wren-designed churches. My parents named me Martin after the church. Care for a Laphroaig?”

He stepped into the adjoining kitchen and began pouring three scotches on ice without waiting for a reply. Then he carried them over to us without spilling a drop, just like a pro. After sitting down on the couch next to Agent Paris with his cat and a drink of his own, Chesterfield flipped on the telly.

It was already tuned to the Sky News channel, which was playing a commercial for Barclays Bank. Then it cut to a report about the murder of the MI5

Director at Paternoster Square. It looked like the news has just hit. Chesterfield turned up the sound.

The news report was slightly truthful and slightly misleading, as I suspected it would be. They said that the Director had been interviewing a “suspect in an espionage case” at the Central Criminal Court when both men had disappeared. A short while later, police issued a report to the media that Director Pindar’s body had been found at Temple Bar in Paternoster Square.

No details were given about the condition of the body or the use of underground tunnels to escape. They didn’t mention the name of the “suspect” or any of the real charges against him. They did state that Equitone was the current acting head.

The Prime Minister, who had been informed of the news, released a statement expressing condolences for Pindar’s family. She also promised that there would be a press conference on the matter the following day. A panel of b-team reporters and intelligence experts began to speculate wildly based on what little information they had. Chesterfield turned the volume down again to a whisper.

“Now,” he announced, pointing to the ceiling with his contorted right index finder, “since we are under the protection of the rose, let us use these last few moments of consciousness to speak freely with one another.”

I looked up to where he was pointing. There was indeed a red and white Tudor rose painted on the ceiling, with green leaves poking out between the five petals and a golden bud emerging in the center. I knew that sub rosa, or “under the rose,” was a code that meant “under the protection of mutual vows of secrecy.” The paint was cracked, just like it was on the rest of the ceiling and walls. It looked like it could have been there for centuries, and most likely had been.

“Chatham House rules, right?” said Paris, winking at him. “Everybody says what they think and what they know. Afterwards we all forget who said what.”

“Exactly,” Chesterfield replied to his partner, smiling and nodding. I said nothing, and promised nothing, which is why I feel free to share this information with you now.

“So is this an all-out coup now or what?” Chesterfield asked Paris, getting things started. “Do you really think it’s the Cybele-worshipping Templar dick-cutters, or is it the Russians?” The last part he said with an air of humor, which Paris picked up on.

“Naw, it’s the Illuminati,” said Paris, only half-joking. “Pindar’s a Frenchy by birth. Never trust those frogs. Never forget how they chopped off all those Christian heads during the Revolution. Or how they helped the American colonies with their treason.”

“Your name is Paris, for God’s sake!” Chesterfield shouted, throwing a couch pillow at his partner playfully.

"But he was a Trojan Prince, Martin," said Paris. "Just like Brutus, who founded London as New Troy. I'm no frog-lover, my friend. They've always conspired against the governments of Europe. Them and the Jews, just like my mum said."

Paris drained his glass and then got up to refill it, taking Chesterfield's with him also. I was still nursing mine. In fact, I was starting to nod off. I caught myself leaning forward, and straightened up. Chesterfield responded to Parvin's playful pretense at racist paranoia.

"You Asians always think the Jews did everything. What about the Jesuits?

They burned down London in 1666. And they've been diddling all the altar boys for at least as long. They hanged that guy at Blackfriars Bridge in the 1980s. This job tonight was a lot like that, you know."

I too had thought the same about Roberto Calvi's murder in 1982, allegedly done at the behest of a bizarre Masonic group called "P2" or Propaganda Due.

Despite the papal ban on Catholics joining masonry, P2 had become a power within the Vatican itself, as well as in Italy and Latin America. Calvi, a member of P2, had worked for the Banco Ambrosiano, an Italian bank which had been doing business with the order, which included laundering illegal money for the Vatican.

After the money-laundering scheme was discovered by Italian authorities, and prosecutions began, Calvi was found hanging from a bridge over the Thames.

He had fled the country after his initial arrest, presumably running from prosecution but also, according to his family, because of threats from the P2 goons. The newspapers speculated that the manner of his death was a Masonic retribution ritual for traitors to the brotherhood. The bridge they had chosen, Blackfriars, was thought to have been used as a reference to the frati neri, or “black brothers,” a nickname that P2 members had chosen for themselves.

“You know what my dad told me?” said Paris. “When he worked for SIS he found out that those P2 guys killed Paulo Pasolini too. Right while he was editing 120 Days of Sodom. All that crap about him raping the prostitute boy with a stick was a lie, and they set that kid up.”

Chesterfield arched his eyebrows in surprise. I too was intrigued that the conversation had turned down this avenue. I would not have imagined that MI5 agents, and even agents of MI6 (a.k.a. “SIS,” whom Paris’ father had apparently worked for) would be investigating the murder of an underground filmmaker because of his adaptation of an obscure unfinished porno-horror novel from the eighteenth century. The possibility of a P2 connection to this was completely foreign to me. Paris leaned forward and continued in a lower voice.

“The truth is the Jesuit Masons got him. There were several rolls of film that were supposed to be in the movie which got stolen. In those rolls, Pasolini had told the truth about what the Satanists in the Vatican are all up to. And it’s just like that Pizzagate stuff you were talking about, Pamela.” He pointed at me.

I was struggling to stay awake, but I was very interested in what he was saying. I recalled as best I could the facts I knew about Pier Paulo Pasolini, the film director. He was murdered in 1975 by a male teenage prostitute, who ran over him with his own car at a beach in Ostia, Italy. Supposedly, the director had hired the kid for sex, but then tried to sodomize him with a large stick, against his will, leading to his own violent end.

The only reason why I knew about it was because as a teenager I had been a fan of a band called Coil, who wrote a song about the murder. I had also seen Pasolini’s last film, Salo, or the 120 Days of Sodom, which he had been editing when he died. It did indeed depict the brutal rape and murder of young teenagers, both male and female. In the story, they were kidnapped on the orders of a group of aristocrats and powerful clerics. The men in this group then imprisoned them in an isolated mansion where they all eventually died in the most awful ways. It was based on a Marquis de Sade novel, with the location changed from revolutionary France to fascist-era Italy.

“Well now I’ve heard everything,” I said, conscious that I might be slurring a bit. “I’d heard that the Papists burned down London. I’ve heard Father Malachi Martin say that there were Satanists running the Vatican now. But I didn’t know that P2 killed Pasolini.

“Yeah, well they got Malachi Martin too,” said Chesterfield. “They cursed him with a demon that finally overcame him. Don’t think that was an accident.”

The dead Irish cleric he spoke of had been an accomplished exorcist, and everyone knew he was the guy that the priest in the Exorcist movie was based on.

Father Martin died of a cerebral hemorrhage after a fall in his Manhattan apartment, which he told friends had been caused by a demonic attack.

Purportedly, he was also a close confidant of Jean Paul II, and was privy to many Vatican secrets, which he wrote about in several books.

These included the fact that—he claimed—Satanists had infiltrated its highest ranks. He said that the widespread molestation of children in the Church was being organized by the Satanists for ritual purposes. Father Martin also alleged that the Pope had told him the third secret of Fatima, given by the Virgin Mary to three children in Portugal in 1917, which the Church has never openly revealed. According to him, it was a prophecy that the Final Pope would be “under the control of Satan.”

“So why are people in the spy business more paranoid than everyone else?” I asked.

“Because we don’t just think we know, we know we know,” said Chesterfield. He aimed the remote control at the TV and tuned it in to one of the other channels. It showed a lady dressed up kind of like Napoleon, waving a British flag from the point of a scabbard while singing in a high-pitched operatic voice.

“Oh yes!” said Chesterfield excitedly. “This is from 2009!” He cranked up the sound.

Just then the singer got to the chorus. The whole audience, and the two men in the room with me, joined in the singing. Then I realized that I vaguely recognized the song from hearing it before somewhere.

Rule Britannia! Britannia rule the waves!

Britons never, never, never shall be slaves!

They both resounded gleefully and drunkenly through the rest of the performance. It ended with a strange encore that came after the initial round of applause from the audience, and even after a summation from an off-screen presenter stating that it was recorded at Royal Albert Hall. When it was over, my friends informed me that this was a sample from the “Last Night of the Proms,” which was some kind of traditional annual patriotic opera show.

I had finished my whiskey, so Chesterfield got up to get us both another.

Paris declined a refill, and instead chose to stretch out on the couch when his partner stood up. As for me, this seems to be the last thing I remember from that night.

Chapter 17: Saturn’s Return

O Rose thou art sick.

The invisible worm,

That flies in the night

In the howling storm:

Has found out thy bed

Of crimson joy:

And his dark secret love

Does thy life destroy.

—William Blake, The Sick Rose

When you wake up from a dream, do you sometimes find that you can't remember what order things actually happened in? Do you ever wonder if your mind has really just organized things the way you remember in an effort to create the illusion of causality—that one thing led to another? Is it possible that the order of events has been imposed ex post facto by your own conscious mind upon waking? Do you ever wonder if perhaps your mind has even inserted certain story elements after the fact to give form to an otherwise incoherent chaotic cacophony of sounds and images from the abyss of the unconscious? Does this explain why humans allegedly see everything while dreaming in black and white, like colorblind dogs, but remember it otherwise?

I am pretty sure the part that I remember being "first" in that night's dream was actually inserted at the end, as I began to wake up. I walked into a room like a dark cave, with an orb of light shining from the top, and reflecting on a mirror that covered the wall in front of me. There was a man a dark suit standing there in front of me looking at the mirror. But I could not see his face. I could not look at it for some reason.

I tried to look at the mirror to see his reflection. But suddenly in front of his head, where I should have been able to see the left side of his face, a black-and-white photograph had been superimposed, showing a squinting old balding white man with a mustache who I didn't recognize. The sight of him frightened me.

Then he spoke. I found his voice harsh and menacing.

"I want to scare you so that you'll remember when you wake up."

At that moment, I recall being utterly terrified. I was dreaming. Not only that, but someone else in the dream knew that I was scared, and he had the power to cloak himself. That meant anything could happen. I thought in lucid dreams you were supposed to be able to realize your power in the situation and take control of the narrative. But here this person seemed to be exercising control over my dream life. And of course, like the worst of my nightmares, I was frozen, unable to scream or move.

"I'll put the important part here at the end so that you won't forget it." He laughed. His voice was masculine but he had the wicked laugh of a mean old lady.

Somehow, the scene shifted to that of two giant, slimy worms having disgusting sex. They were glued to each other on both ends, like they were doing the old "69" position. It seemed like they were both fighting and fucking, trying to simultaneously eat and rape one another.

Then I remembered how it happened. I was going backwards in time it seems, upon reflection. I had been sleeping, and then something woke me up.

Somebody was on top of me. I had thought I was alone, but someone was on top of me. I woke up and realized I was fucking someone. Or rather, perhaps, that someone was fucking me.

I couldn’t be sure. I couldn’t tell if it was a man or a woman, or even what kind of thing I was.

Am I a worm? I remember wondering. A blind worm?

I couldn’t see anything. All was dark. I tried to push him off.

Him?

I reached out and grabbed something: a knife.

I stabbed at the attacker blindly, but immediately my thigh was filled with shooting pain.

Then finally, I could scream. Finally he got off of me. Finally I could see, as the light came through the window. Chesterfield opened the blinds, hollering obscenities.

I was awake now. He was in his boxer shorts and wife-beater with an open white terry cloth bathrobe, looking at me like I was a maniac.

“What the fuck is going on!” he shouted.

“You were raping me!” I answered, shielding my eyes from the light. My vision was still blurry. My head was pounding. A hangover.

“No, I was merely sleeping next to you!” he responded. “You rolled over on top of me. Then you started stabbing yourself with my nose-trimmers.”

“Eww!” I recoiled. I found that I was on the floor between his bed and his radiator, kneeling down in front of him. I looked down at the wound in my leg, still bleeding and throbbing. I pressed down on it with my hand as I realized I was in my underwear and wearing a man’s white undershirt, just like the one Chesterfield was wearing.

“You took my clothes off while I was sleeping?!” I shouted in outrage.

“That’s the second time that’s happened to me in the last 24 hours! What the fuck!”

Chesterfield shrugged as he took his bathrobe off and draped it over my shoulders.

“No,” he said, “I went into the kitchen to get us some cheese and crackers.

When I got back to the living room you were gone. I found you lying in my bed dressed as you are now, wearing my undershirt. It was clean, you know.”

“Good,” I thought. I was already grossed out about having it on. He walked out of the room for a moment and came back with a wet washcloth for me to put on my injured thigh.

“I guess I really tied one on then,” I said. I was embarrassed that I had gotten drunk enough to black out like that. I was also very sick to my stomach.

“Yeah well file your sexual harassment complaint up your arse,” he sneered, not looking at me directly.

“I’m sorry!” I said.

He seemed to accept this, but I could tell his feelings were still hurt. To get away from the awkwardness, I asked to use the bathroom.

I was in there for a while. It was spacious compared to the one in the Regent Hotel, although it too lacked a bathtub. However, like the rest of the apartment, it was surprisingly clean for a bachelor pad, and I enjoyed a nice hot shower.

As the fresh steamy water pounded down on my face, I thought about by dream, especially the worms. I made me think about the story of Chronos again.

You’ll recall that he swallowed his babies as soon as they were born, afraid that one of his children would usurp his position as king of the gods.

I envisioned Chronos with his mouth constantly on the mother's vagina as soon as the mating had finished, to make sure nothing escaped. I imagined that he probably also had to be quite careful that none of his semen spilled out anywhere else, because the sperm of all immortals is described in the myths as being super-fertile, capable of generating progeny on anything it touches. As per example: Aphrodite, who was born from the semen that clung to the sides of the bloody penis of Ouranos as it fell into the seas below. This was, of course, after his son Chronos cut it off.

The Greeks said that Ouranos was the Sky and his wife Gaia was the Earth.

They were the first parents in the universe. They produced Chronos and the rest of the Titans, a nasty brood of dragons, giants and monsters.

At one point, it was said, Ouranos and Gaia were one being, presumably locked in endless sexual embrace, if you consider the fact that they were engendering children together, along with the rest of the known details. The myths didn't spell it out, but one can deduce that the castration took place inside the mother's vagina, the exit being deliberately blocked for the offspring by their father's penis. This brings the obvious question: where did the weapon (said to be a ceremonial scythe called a harpe) come from?

Some said he did this because of a "prophecy" that Ouranos would be killed and have his role taken over by one of his children. It is uncertain whether the prophecy arose within his own mind, or if his wife told him that, or perhaps some unnamed third party. Some versions say he feared his children's births because he somehow knew that they were simply too ugly to be looked at. I figured this meant that they represent the chaos the preceded creation, what the alchemists call the prima materia of the universe, which had not yet taken any definite form.

Chronos did in fact take over as the leader of the gods. He and Rhea, his wife, ruled over a time recalled as the "Golden Age." It was described as a time when everyone was free and nobody was called into the service of another. At this point, "everybody" presumably consisted of just Chronos, Rhea, and their Titan siblings.

But it wasn’t until after Chronos was usurped by Zeus, and the Titans vanquished, that one of their number, Atlas, was conscripted with the arduous task of holding up the sky on his shoulders. This was done to prevent the sky, Ouranos, from “resuming his embrace” with Gaia the Earth. If this were to happen, they said, everything that exists would be snuffed out. It is only because Atlas does his job that we have a “stage” upon which to act (as Shakespeare would describe the worldly plane).

So how and where, then, I wondered, did events of the Golden Age occur, when nobody was there to keep the Earth and Sky apart, since no person was slave to another?

I also recalled that the same story was told in the Kabbalistic Zohar about the serpent-demons Lilith (“night”) and Samael (“the blind one”), who had once been two halves of the only creature in existence. God had split them apart deliberately, castrating the male, but they still longed for one another. It was said that if they were ever able to mate again, it would destroy creation. These demons were associated by nineteenth-century occultist Stanislas de Guaita with the hermaphrodite Baphomet in the sigils he created, one of which was later adopted by the Church of Satan as its official logo.

Satan, it seems, wants to see what is separate become whole again, in order to undo God’s creation, I thought to myself, and not for the first time.

When I came out of the shower, I found that Chesterfield had gone to the Alder Gate Cash & Carry, which was apparently nearby. There he had bought me a pair of dark gray jeans, just my size, and a red sweater that fit perfectly, from. He had also brought us all coffee and a bag full of scones from Starbucks. Paris, who was just coming awake, took his coffee and scones into the bathroom without looking up.

Maybe he’s mad at me too, I thought. Chesterfield probably told him what had happened between us in his bedroom.

Chesterfield was also being gruff, not talking much other than to say “you’re welcome” blandly when I thanked him for the clothes and coffee. We both sat down at the little white Formica table in the kitchen’s breakfast nook and starred at our laptops for a while.

It was 8 a.m. now, and I thought I should probably check the news first. Yet I couldn’t shake the image of the mating worms in my dream. I knew that Leviathan, that dreaded sea serpent in the Bible, was often depicted just like the Ouroboros, swallowing its own tail, and encompassing the entire cosmos within its coil.

Like the monstrous Titans, Ouroboros was a representation of the chaos that was thought to preexist the creation of matter. But sometimes it was depicted as two serpents shown swallowing each other, much like the mutually fucking and devouring hermaphrodite worms in my dream.

I looked it up, and sure enough, earthworms are hermaphrodites, so this is how they mate. I remembered that the words for “worm” and “serpent” were the same in ancient Sumer: orm. I decided to look to see if there were any etymological links between orm, “Ouroboros,” and “Ouranos.” What I found was something better.

As it turned out, “Ouranos” and “Ouroboros” are definitely connected. I used “Google Translate” and found that the word which Wikipedia had rendered as “sky” actually means “rain-maker,” or, more specifically, “urinater.” Rain was thus likened to urine from the sky. And Ouroboros didn’t mean “tail-swallower,” as the same source had claimed. That was clearly a euphemism. I discovered a more literal rendering: “urine-drinker.”

The Ouroboros is the uncreated one, I thought. He needs nothing. He produces what he needs. And because he is eternal, because there is no future where he is, that is sufficient.

But like Gaia and Ouranos, I mused, this Eternal Serpent was cut up. Isn’t that in Egyptian myth somewhere? Worms can regenerate if you slice them in half, and that’s what this one did. It became two. Then they started fucking and sucking on each other. It meant the same thing because their mouths and their wombs were the same thing. And the "children" in their wombs were the source of their nourishment. Their wombs were also their stomachs.

This seemed to me like a logical deduction to make from the known details of the story. I felt a flash of pride that I had figured it out. It was an ancient riddle that probably very few had even realized was a riddle, much less pondered about, in the intervening millennia.

But where did the knife come from to cut the worm? I continued to wonder.

Its necessary existence represented some kind of perverse blasphemy that I hadn't divined yet.

"Have you figured out anything relevant to our case yet?" Chesterfield said, at last breaking the silence that must have been bothering him. I jumped a bit, startled.

"I don't think so. Not so far," I said.

"What are you doing, looking at cats?" he chastised. "We're running out of time here!"

I looked down at my computer dutifully. After a minute of staring blankly, I asked a stupid question.

"What exactly am I supposed to be looking for?"

"Well, let's go over the case again, shall we?" He got up and began to pace around the kitchen. "It started last Saturday, March 24, five days before I met you. Now you say that's the Day of Blood, when the cult of Cybele used to do their castration rituals. That's the day on which MI5 received the anonymous upload of Easter Sunday April Fool."

"Which you admit was not really anonymous," I interjected.

“Right,” he acknowledged. “That film depicts—I would say, ‘documents’—a boy being kidnapped from Piccadilly Circus right before Easter 1956. And this event took place at the exact same intersection where you chose to stay in a hotel room yesterday, just before Easter, which falls on the same day this year that it did in 1956.”

“No, Leopold’s people booked the hotel,” I insisted. “I had nothing to do with it.”

“OK, fine,” he said, dismissing my objection with a wave of his hand. “So anyway, the film shows the boy being castrated among ancient ruins somewhere in a ritual you say is similar to the initiation rites of the cult of Cybele. The boy is then possibly killed and fed to the ravens at the Tower of London.”

I shrugged my shoulders. I knew that the story, true though it was, sounded insane.

“Then in the same film, a little girl is sodomized next to the London Stone in the upper chamber of Temple Bar, which was then sitting on property attached to a boarding school. The girl is first raped with a dildo on a stick, which, as it turns out, is connected to the symbolism of the ancient monument of Billingsgate in London. It’s also similar to the way in which medieval witchcraft cults used to introduce intoxicating substances into the orifices of the initiates at Sabbaths.”

I nodded.

“Then, at the same time that I am, illegally and against my employer’s protocol, allowing you to see this film, my ultimate boss, the Director of MI5, is kidnapped by your fake baron friend and then killed in that very same chamber of Temple Bar, which has now been moved to Paternoster Square. But…”

He pivoted on his foot and then turned to face me, pointing at me accusingly.

“Temple Bar originally sat right next to the Olde Cock Tavern in Temple, where you ask me to take you while all of this stuff is coincidentally happening.

The Director’s head is mounted to the front of the bar like he’s a traitor, and the murder scene includes a Mithraic magic square, which also shows up at this Alphamstone place that your fake baron friend pretended to be from. It also includes alleged Templar symbols of severed male genitals in a vase that just so happen to be showcased in your latest book. And this brings me to the subject of you, Pamela.”

He sat down next to me and put his face within an inch of my own, looking at me sternly. I could almost feel his red mustache tickling my cheek. He continued.

“You claim that this same person kidnapped you yesterday and forced you to witness a bull sacrifice in a secret underground tunnel. But you also refuse to testify to this fact, which is why we don’t have his co-conspirators in the fake butcher company arrested, and why he is then able to escape.”

There was a lot of anger in his voice, and his words indicated that he might not really believe what I told him about what happened to me the day before. Or, at least, he wanted me to think so. It was supposed to make me feel bad, and it worked, even though I knew I was in no way to blame for anything. I decided to ignore his manipulation tactics.

“Yes,” I acknowledged. “And bull sacrifices are associated with both the cult of Cybele and the mysteries of Mithras. Also, a bull sacrifice was depicted on the side of the allegedly Templar-originated Mete coffer that disappeared from the museum. So maybe I should research that angle to connect the Templars, Mithras and Cybele. Because I still don’t know how these things all go together.”

I looked back down at my computer and began to type into Google.

Chesterfield sat back down at his laptop and resumed his own research.

I started off by looking for connections between Mithras and Cybele. I found quickly that a debate had been raging among scholars on the subject for the last 250 years. They couldn’t agree on whether or not these two cults, both of Eastern origin and active concurrently in the late Roman Empire, were related at all. It was mostly modern scholars who were claiming that they were not.

Cybele had been adopted into Hellenistic Greece from their western Anatolian colonies as early as the sixth century BC. The Greeks compounded her with Rhea, the wife of Chronos and mother of Zeus. The aspect of her relationship with Attis, some historians said, was really only fully adopted by the Western version of the cult after the Romans absorbed it into their official religion in the second century BC.

But as I had mentioned to Chesterfield before, the Gallu of the temples of the Great Mother Goddess Inanna in Sumer also practiced the same rite, and had a myth about the son of the goddess which was identical in many ways to that of Attis.

Mithraism, however, had been imported from Persia much later, starting in the first century after Christ. There were many obvious differences. Mithraism was an all-male cult that, at first blush, seems to promote masculine attributes and shun everything feminine. It was popular in the military, particularly among the foreign legions, and indeed, that’s where it had originally begun its spread throughout the empire.

It took a couple of centuries for it to be anything more than a barely tolerated subterranean mystery school (operating literally underground, in caves on the frontiers, and in the basements of other buildings in cities). But eventually, some of the emperors were converted, and the cult, which had originally forbidden its members to join any other religious groups, began to allow amalgamation with the followers of “Sol Invictus” (“Invincible Sun”), a.k.a. Helios.

This new and improved Mithraism became the dominant religious force at the end of the empire, until its rival, Christianity, with which it shared mutual influence, eclipsed it altogether.

Early in the twentieth century, two authors—Franz Cumont and Jessie Weston—separately published important works arguing that Mithraists had also made formal pacts with Cybele worshippers. Cumont had stated it as though it were established fact in his 1903 book The Mysteries of Mithra. There he had argued that:

…in conciliating the priests of Magna Mater, the sectaries of Mithra obtained the support of a powerful and officially recognized clergy, and so shared in some measure in the protection afforded it by the State.

He also pointed out that the temples of both cults (mithraeums and metroons) were often very close to one another. In Ostia in Italy, where the oldest known mithraeum has been found (along with dozens of others scattered throughout the same town), the two temples were actually attached contiguously. Cumont suggested that they may have shared ritual materials, and perhaps even conducted joint rituals.

Now, wasn't Ostia the place where that Pasolini guy was murdered? I thought to myself.

If the two cults did work together, it would actually put to rest one of the points of argument between historians on the subject. Cumont had claimed that both the Cybelists and the Mithraists practiced the rite of taurobolium. This was the ceremony wherein the priest would rip open the guts of the victim on a platform with a metal grate over it so that the blood would pour down onto an initiate positioned below. It was a form of sanguinary baptism, after which the recipient was said to be renatus in aeternum "reborn for eternity").

Modern scholars, criticizing Cumont, argue that, although the central myth of the cult is about Mithras hunting and killing a bull, a true taurobolium would have been impossible to conduct inside of a tiny underground mithraeum. But they ignore the fact that Cumont had already addressed this issue. He said the evidence suggested that Mithraists performed few if any of their own sacrifices of.

Instead, he thought that they most likely contracted this work out to a professional victimarius (sacrificial butcher), which was a common practice at the time. Any metroon would have been equipped for this, and the Cybelists may have been the ones to fulfill this purpose. Cumont also noted that mithraeums were usually built directly upon a source of running water. He proposed that the relatively sophisticated plumbing systems they usually sported might have been useful to the Cybelists, and that access to these things might have been traded to them by the Mithraists in exchange for help with butchery.

It occurred to me that Cybele's anti-male transvestite priesthood and the Mithraists' aversion to femininity may have made them an odd yet complimentary pair: they both were against traditional sexuality. Furthermore the mythologies of both cult figures complemented each other in the same way. I told you before that according to some sources, Cybele wasn't always just a woman.

Prudentius, a Roman Christian poet, writing in the fourth century, said in Peristephanon: 10.1071-3:

Both sexes are displeasing to Cybele's holiness, so he keeps a middle gender between the two.

As I mentioned, initiates of Cybele's priesthood went through an orgiastic public ritual in which they were expected to go mad on drugs and wine. They would then become possessed by the goddess, just like Attis, so that they would be inspired to castrate themselves just like he did. These priests were thereafter referred to as women, just like the Gallu priests of Sumer before them, and just like a post-op transgender person would be in modern times. Like the Gallu, they dressed in women's clothes, spoke in affected effeminate voices, and sang in an effeminate manner that was supposed to be pleasing to the goddess.

Earlier, in the first century BC, another Roman poet, Gaius Valerius Catullus, had written in Carmina, Poem 63 about how Attis castrated himself and thus became a priestess of Cybele. From that point on, she was thereby immediately referred to as feminine:

> Over the vast main borne by swift-sailing ship, Attis, as with hasty hurried foot he reached the Phrygian wood and gained the tree-girt gloomy sanctuary of the Goddess, there roused by rabid rage and mind astray, with sharp-edged flint downwards dashed his burden of virility. Then as he felt his limbs were left without their manhood, and the fresh spilt blood staining the soil, with bloodless hand she hastily took a tambour light to hold, your tambourine, Cybele, your initiate rite, and with feeble fingers beating the hollowed bullock's back, she rose up quivering…

Later, when her reason returned to her, she lamented the loss of her penis and the fact that she was now a "slave" to the mother goddess: Then when from quiet rest torn, her delirium over, Attis at once recalled to mind her deed, and with lucid thought saw what she had lost, and where she stood, with heaving heart she backwards traced her steps to the landing-place. There, gazing over the vast main with tear-filled eyes, with saddened voice in tristful soliloquy thus did she lament…

This all appears to be an echo of the earliest versions of the Cybele myth, influenced more closely by the Phrygian version. In these, she was called "Agditis," and was said to have originated in the realm of the gods. She had been formed when some of Zeus' semen fell upon a rock called "Agdo." But the other gods found Agditis to be a freak, and so they had her castrated, and cast her down to Earth. This, then, would explain why Cybele was sometimes represented by a rock, particularly a meteorite—a "stone that fell from heaven."

As the story continues, according to a Greek travelogue from Pausanias in the second century AD, the goddess then became pregnant with a boy, whom she abandoned at birth and left for dead. The boy was born so beautiful that he was rescued by a she-goat that felt pity for him. Eventually, when she found him again, his own mother fell in love with him.

He was later engaged to a princess. But during the wedding, Agditis/Cybele possessed his mind and inspired him to castrate himself, resulting in his death.

Afterwards, in regret, she "persuaded Zeus to grant the body of Attis should neither rot at all nor decay" (according to a travelogue of Phrygia written in the second century AD by the Greek geographer Pausanias). This is the skeletal story, upon which a variety of flourishes about the boy's death, resurrection, and alleged "love" for his mother were added.

Some obvious parallels between this and the story of Mithras jump out right away. Just as they say Agditis was born from a petra genetrix ("fecund rock"), so too was Mithras. Votive depictions of the god's birth show him emerging as a fully-grown young man, with a torch in one hand and a knife in the other, which he used to find his way and tear himself out.

On either side of the rock they always depicted the two Chiaramonti ("Torchbearers"), two male youths who wore Phrygian hats just like Mithras, and just Attis Cybele's Galli priests. The Chiaramonti were also often shown in that same peculiar cross-legged attitude; just like how Attis and the Galli were often shown, whether standing or laying; just like the effigies of the cross-legged knights on the graves at Temple church. The names of the two Chiaramonti were Cautes and Cautophanes. Each held a torch, with one pointing it upwards, and the other pointing it downwards, respectively. Seeing this reminded me again of Eliphas Levi's depiction of the Templar demon Baphomet, with one hand pointing up, and the other pointing down, along with a torch burning between his goat horns.

The ultimate provenance of Mithras is a mystery. It was a true parthenogenesis, "fertilized by the heavenly father's phallic lightning," as Barbara Walker wrote. He was truly the self-born," like the nameless figure identified by Jesus in the apocryphal Gospel of Thomas, where he said: When you see him who was not born of woman, fall down upon your faces and worship him; that one is your Father.

Thus during the initiations, according to the one-surviving Mithras Liturgy, inductees took an oath to the god which included the words: I… who was born from the mortal womb of (his mother's name) and from the fluid of semen, and who, since he has been born again from you today…resolves to worship you.

In the myth of Mithras, when the time came to have progeny of his own, he chose to mate with a rock because he detested females. A writer known as "Pseudo-Plutarch" wrote in De Fluviis 23.4 about a certain mountain in Armenia called "Diorphos." This was named after "Diorphos the Earth-born (or the Titan)," about whom it was said:

Mithras, who wanted to have a son but hated the race of women, ejaculated onto a stone. The stone became pregnant and—after the appropriate time—produced a boy called Diorphos.

The name of this figure brought to mind the myth of the "Orphic Egg" from the Orphic Mystery Schools, which went back to Greece in the fifth century. They taught that the primordial being was a figure named "Phanes," whom they also called "Eros." The creator of this egg was "Nyx," whose name meant "Night," just like what the name of the Kabbalistic demoness Lilith translates to. I felt that Phanes might also relate to Ophion, a serpent who, with his Titan bride Eurynome, was said to have ruled the Earth for a spell after being "cast down" by Chronos and Rhea. This again indicates an identification with Diorphos, the son of Mithras, identified with Chronos/Saturn.

Depictions of Phanes with his body surrounded by a serpent, strongly resemble the images of the leontocephaline (lion-headed) version of Mithras as Saturn (also shown wrapped in a snake) that were found in many mithraeums, as were Orphic depictions of the cosmic egg. Other related symbols include the one-snaked rod of Asclepius and the double-snaked rod of Hermes, the caduceus. This last object was shown by Eliphas Levi sitting between the legs of Baphomet instead of a penis.

Like Baphomet, the Persians had originally seen their Mitra as an intermediary power, helping connect creatures on our plane with both the celestial powers above and the infernal powers below. In the Roman mystery school version, he became identified with Saturn, the furthest from Earth of the planets then known about, seen in classical astrology as the highest of the heavens. But he was also identified, especially in the latter years of the Roman Empire, with Sol, the Sun. In the old geocentric systems, Sol occupied the middle sphere of the heavens, with other spheres, including those of Jupiter and Saturn, on top of that.

The worshippers of Sol Invictus, like the Egyptians, saw the Sun as the ultimate symbol of an omnipotent god. But in the Mithraic Mysteries, which attempted to incorporate this cult in its later years, the initiate made a symbolic journey through each of the heavens, in imitation of this enhanced story of the adventures of Mithras. This did not merely involve him passing through the various gates of Heaven with special passwords. This (taught by Gnostic and Hermetic schools as necessary for the soul to ascend to the highest realm after death). Rather, in this case, it seems that Mithras actually conquered the intelligences that ruled over these spheres, subduing them to his will.

After slaying the bull from which the material world was made, he ascended this stairway to heaven, the “ladder of lights” we know as the seven classical planets, until he got to Sol’s kingdom. There, after the sun was overthrown, the luminary was forced to bow down on one knee to his new master, Mithras. The two then shook hands as friends, and then feasted together on the bull, with the domination of the new sun god now having been established. Then Mithras took the reigns of the Sun’s chariot and ascended to the next realm, which was that of Saturn. Mithras then took on as his own identity as well, indicating that he overtook that god like he did the others, and henceforth ruled all of the kingdoms below.

So Mithras is both Saturn and the Sun, I thought to myself. But I’ve read that Saturn is associated in alchemical symbolism with the process of putrefaction, called the Nigrido . This is when the ‘primal material’ of the universe is sacrificed and dismembered. And the sign of the Nigrido is a black sun. They say this sun is somehow ‘in the center of the Earth,’ just like how Chronos, who is Saturn, is imprisoned in Tartarus by Zeus, who is Jupiter. I wonder what that means.

I Googled “Mithras” + “black sun.” I also opened other tabs to search the terms “midnight sun” and “second sun” in combination with “Mithras.” That’s when I discovered an amazing new angle.

Because he victoriously overthrew both the Sun and Saturn, then took on both of their roles, Mithras was seen as the source of a light more primordial, beyond the known universe, the “sun beyond the Sun.” The realm of light beyond the sphere of Saturn was called “Hyperuranium.” It was named after Saturn’s father Uranus, for the same reason the planet beyond Saturn was so named by modern astronomers. A document called “the Mithras Liturgy” described a Mithraic initiate, in imitation of Mithras, entering the palace of the “Seven Pole Lords” with the faces of black bulls. These are the guys who turn the wheels of the heavens, causing earthquakes, thunder and lightning. But Mithras basically makes slavish bitches out of them all.

The fact that Mithras was known for literally “storming heaven,” invading the highest realm of the universe with shock and awe, seemed to be part of why his cult was popular with the military of an imperial power. Cybele was already an official patroness of the Roman military, and it is no accident that her holy week took place during the month dedicated to the war god Mars.

But whereas the Magna Mater was seen as the protectress of the state, and the status quo (much like the Egyptian goddess Maat, whose name meant “world order”), Mithras was a god of rebellion.

The red Phrygian cap worn by Mithras—as well as by Cybele’s Galli, coincidentally—is also known as a “liberty cap,” because in Rome it was the symbol of a slave that had been freed. All slaves wore them during the festival of Saturnalia at the winter solstice, because they were considered free during this time period. Indeed, all rules were considered null during these days, giving way to orgies, drinking, and much mischief.

This was done in honor of Saturn and his Golden Age, when nobody had to work. It is the reason why we all take vacation around Christmas, and why Santa Claus wears that funny red hat. It’s also why we get wildly drunk on New Year’s Eve, just like the “Feast of Fools” celebrated in medieval Europe, when the social order would be upturned in honor of the “Lord of Misrule.” It’s why the liberty cap became the symbol of the French Revolution, inspired by Freemasons, who, like the Mithraists, gave no regard to social status within the boundaries of their lodges. The seals of the US Army and the US Senate bear this symbol as well.

Thinking about this at Chesterfield’s breakfast table, while he clicked away on his computer across the table from me, I now understood the cosmology of the Smurfs. Papa Smurf, with his red Phrygian hat, was the “Pater,” the Father, just like the leader of a Mithraic school was called. His subjects in the communist Smurf dictatorship were all male, like those in the temples of Mithras, except for Smurfette, who had been created through dark alchemy by Gargamel in order to mislead the Smurfs. Papa Smurf, however, had been able to magically turn her over to his will, and let her live with his subjects. But none of them had mothers and, from my recollection, all of them had been created alchemically.

“So,” said Chesterfield, clearing his throat. “Learned anything about Cybele and Mithras?”

“Yes,” I said. “Quite a lot.”

“Well I know that Cybele likes to castrate boys and Mithras likes to fuck bulls in the arse while he kills them. What other sick stuff did they get up to?”

I laughed. “The record on the Mithraists is a bit confusing. On the one hand, there are sources saying that the cult valued abstinence from sex, as an extension of their general hatred of women, and that many of their priests took vows of chastity.”

“Yes,” he said, nodding as he glanced at his computer briefly. I continued

“But at the same time they had a ceremony for the second degree of their order, which is called “Nymphus”—“the Bride.” It was dedicated to the love goddess Venus. The initiate would be married to another brother in the order, dressed in a bridal veil.”

“Go on,” he said, looking again at his computer as if he were checking off items on a list.

I gave him a breakdown of the material I had found indicating that both Cybele and Mithras were against normal sexual relations, and that both had been born from inseminated rocks. I mentioned the castration of Cybele, and her original hermaphroditic state. I compared her to Baphomet, also missing his penis according to Eliphas Levi.

“The Knights Templar officially rejected sex with women as well, vowing not to touch them, although we know that they did confess to sometimes using female prostitutes in their orgies, always for sodomy. But in order to stem their desires for procreative acts, they vowed not to reject the sexual advancements of their brothers. The masters told the initiates that it was better to indulge in this than to ‘burn with desire’ for females. That’s probably why they kissed each other’s penises and butts at the end of the induction ceremony.”

He looked at me incredulously. “I’ve never heard that before.”

“This was all revealed a few years ago by the Vatican,” I told him. “It happened when they discovered the Chinon Parchment. It came out that the knights had confessed all of this stuff to Pope Clement V without torture. And this is in addition to the Satanic rituals they confessed about to the King of France years earlier.”

“So they were a gay knighthood?” he said. He seemed crestfallen. I guess he really bought into the hype that the Templars were a wrongly maligned group of pure Christian martyrs.

“There’s more,” I said. “Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall found monuments he believed were of Templar origin, as I told you. Well, some of them had depictions of little boys being sodomized and made to have sex with animals.

They also showed kids being sacrificed in a ‘baptism of fire’ ritual.”

“And why would they have done this?” he asked.

“Well, I haven’t figured it out entirely.”

He rolled his eyes.

“I mean, I think it was an attempt to destroy creation through magic. But I don’t know how it was supposed to work.”

“Where did you get the idea then?” he asked.

“The Mete coffer.” I said. “Remember it shows Cybele with a beard pulling the Sun and Moon down from the sky? She’s uprooting the heavens, where the Archons rule from.”

“Who are the Archons?” he said, getting visibly annoyed at the labyrinthine symbolism I was attempting to explain.

“The heavenly bodies,” I answered. “The rulers of fate, whom the Ophite Gnostics saw as their enemies. They were the seven visible planets, which included the Moon and the Sun. Hammer-Purgstall thought the Templars were secret Ophite Gnostics. And the Ophite Gnostics, according to Hippolytus, incorporated the Cybele mysteries into their dogma.”

“OK…” said Chesterfield. I continued.

“Another thing Hammer-Purgstall claimed was a Templar artifact was an engraving in a Bavarian castle showing someone standing in-between and holding two columns that were falling over. Beneath this was written a code that he decoded into the phrase ‘the Distinguished Charity of Mete Uproots the Enemy.’”

“What does that mean?” Chesterfield asked with a sigh.

“Well, I’m about to tell you,” I said. “I think the ‘Distinguished Charity’ part means ‘strange love,’ peculiar love, like the sick sex rituals. Somehow they thought that by having sex in an unnatural way, they could shake the foundations of nature herself, to bring the gods down from their thrones. They saw creation as a prison to be escaped.”

There was silence for a moment.

“How would that work?” he finally said.

“That’s the part I don’t know,” I replied. “But that’s how I read it. Our ancestors saw things differently than we do. It’s difficult to comprehend their logic.”

“So could sodomizing the bull while killing it be considered “‘strange Love?’” he suggested.

“Yes!” I said. It was like a lightning bolt hit my mind. “And you know who else advocated strange love? Aleister Crowley. He did rituals where he raped animals and then killed them during his climax, just like the Mithraists. And he hated women, just like the Mithraists. He thought anal sex magick was the highest form of ritual. The created a secret society where admittance to the highest rank involved getting kidnapped and anally raped by all the other members. He named it after the Templars, and he called himself “Baphomet” as a special nickname.

But do you know what he said Baphomet’s name meant? ‘Father Mithras!’”

I had long considered Crowley’s attempt to etymologize the name of Baphomet to be the least useful of all the theories that had been proffered by scholars throughout the years. I agreed with Hammer-Purgstall’s conclusion that it meant “Baptism of Wisdom,” and most of the suggestions made by others had been similar in meaning. Now I had to rethink it.

Why did he say that, anyway? I wondered.

I Googled and found a quote from Crowley’s Confessions: Baphomet was Father Mithras, the cubical stone which was the corner of the Temple.

He also mentioned that the word “totaled 729” when interpreted kabbalistically, which I noted in my head was the number of days in a solar year (365) added to the number of days in a lunar year (364). I also recalled that Crowley had published a text called “Liber 729.” So I looked that up too.

This, it turned out, was the same thing called The Amalantrah Working, which I had heard of before. It seemed to be a bunch of incoherent, personal stream-of-consciousness nonsense channeled from some entity called “the Wizard,” presumably Saturn-Mithras (as he took the form of an old hermit). The Wizard kept referring to a quest for an “egg” that Crowley was supposed to embark upon. It urged him:

The egg is a work which must be done – the great work. By doing the work we get to the key.

I read this out loud to Chesterfield.

“So the stone is Cybele. The stone becomes impregnated, and then it’s an egg,” he noted. “And the new Sun of the new universe, who is Mithras, who is Saturn, is born from that—he cuts his way out.”

This struck me as a very good way of summing it up. I nodded in approval.

“This must be connected to the use of the London Stone in the ritual rape.

Didn’t you find that it was made of ‘egg stone’?”

“Yes. Yes I suppose it must be connected,” I agreed.

“The ritual took place on Easter,” he went on. “And the film mentioned

“Easter eggs” just before it cut out.”

“And it showed her laying an egg,” I said.

He gulped. “From her bum?”

“It’s something that Crowley specifically mentioned he wanted to do: make a homunculus born rectally, whose birth would herald the start of a new era. It’s also something that happened in the Egyptian pantheon. In the Ogdoad cosmology, Thoth gave birth to several of his children by laying an egg from his anus.”

“What’s a homunculus?” Chesterfield asked.

“An artificial person,” I said. “In Hebrew it’s called a ‘golem.’ There are lots of different thoughts on how you could do it. The simplest way is making an idol out of clay and bringing it to life magically with the use of sperm and incantations.

Making a robot and doing the same thing with it is an even more sophisticated approach. The first so-called ‘androids’ were built in the Middle Ages with exactly this purpose. They were meant to me animated through supernatural means.”

“Animated with what?” he asked.

“Well, you would invoke a spirit to rise up into it,” I said, “whether it be the spirit of a dead person, or of something else, like a demon, or a god.”

He raised his eyebrows.

“Theoretically, of course,” I said. “I mean, that’s what some people believe.

I’m not saying I believe it.”

“I see. Could you put a spirit into a dead body, for instance?” he asked.

“Yes, you could use a dead body,” I answered. “Or just parts of one. Or you could stitch together parts of a dead body and animate then, like Dr.

Frankenstein’s monster. You could even combine the parts of different creatures, like how the Egyptian gods were depicted. Chimeras, they’re called.”

“So the gods of the ancient world could have been these demonically-animated Frankenstein creatures made from dead human and animal bodies?” he asked.

“That’s actually what I think they were,” I said, surprised at his insight.

“Crowley tried to bring a skeleton to life at his Black Temple on Chancery Lane,” said Chesterfield, once again revealing that he knew quite a lot about Crowley’s biography. “He was feeding it human blood and dead birds. I suppose that was an attempt to make a golem from a dead body, right?”

“Certainly,” I said. “And the Templars’ chief mascot, their secret captain, their lucky talisman and their idol of worship was a product of exactly this kind of sorcery.”

“Baphomet, you mean?” Chesterfield guessed.

“Yes,” I answered. “They say it started out as a skull with two leg bones.

Specifically, these bones belonged to the body of a girl named Yse, who had been loved by one of the original Templar knights. But she had died before their love was consummated, and so the knight took it upon himself to break open her coffin and have his way with her corpse. After he was done, he heard a voice speaking to him that is described as coming from ‘beyond the Void.’ It told him to shut up the grave and return nine months later, when he would find a son waiting for him.”

I looked at Chesterfield. He was literally on the edge of his chair, tilted forward so that the back legs were rising off the floor as he stared at me with his eyes wide, waiting for me to finish, like it was the best ghost story ever. I continued.

“The knight obeyed this instruction, and when he came back he found the skull and leg bones waiting for him. It spoke to him, promising to bring him luck in business and battle if he brought it with him everywhere and took its advice.

That’s how the original Baphomet skull came to the Temple’s possession, and that supposedly had much to do with the extent of their worldly success.”

“Interesting,” said Chesterfield. “You know, just a couple of years ago we had a murder case in that De Vere hotel in Theobald Park—the one they made out of Lady Meux’s old mansion, right in front of where she had the Temple Bar parked. Some guy—a lawyer and a friend of Boris Johnson—killed a young teacher in his room there on Christmas Eve. Then he had sex with her dead body.

He said a voice in his head told him to take her there and do exactly that.”

He finished his story and stared at me. I didn’t react. So many weird things were connecting together, and this was just one more.

“It’s just that Temple Bar is part of our mystery,” he said, as if he had to explain the connection. “And Temple Bar is associated with Templars….”

“And lawyers,” I added. “That’s where the legal profession is headquartered. That’s where we get the bar exam that lawyers have to take. The practice of law is like a secret society in itself.” I was drifting off topic.

“I know,” said Chesterfield. “So the head talked to them and told them what to do, how to fight, how to build a banking empire….”

“How to blackmail the Papacy into giving them an exemption from all laws and all taxes….” I interrupted.

“So that’s the big secret of the Templars? A talking skull that gave them business advice?”

“Talking idols made from decapitated heads were quite common in the ancient East,” I said. “They were called teraphim, and they were generally made from the heads of sacrificed young boys. But the head of a prophet was considered quite powerful, and could be used to enslave the soul of the prophet, to make use of his power. This is what the Templars were rumored to have done with the mummified head of John the Baptist to make into Baphomet, the Baptizer of Wisdom.”

“But I thought Baphomet was a goat-headed human hermaphrodite?” said Chesterfield.

“I think they augmented it over time,” I replied. “Like the chimeras we mentioned. Perhaps only the head was original. I also think they made other versions of the idol for all their other chapters, using the same magical principles, but that somehow they were all connected together and couldn’t work independently. They were just conduits to the group’s shared patron demon.”

“And then they worshiped it as a god, right?” he said.

“I guess so. I mean, they bowed down to it and kissed it. Sacrificed to it.

Testified that it could ‘save’ them, make them ‘wealthy,’ and make their crops prosperous. They said that it gave them ‘wisdom.’ They had to take an oath of allegiance to it, and renounce Jesus Christ in the process. It sounds like a religion to me.”

“So they made up their own religion, like you were saying, out of bowing down to this idol, combined with other bits and bobs they collected from pagan cults, Satanic cults, Gnostic heresies, Greek and Roman mystery schools…. Am I missing anything?” he said.

“No, that’s it. And the god they made for themselves was like a compound of all these different gods and goddesses, as well as demons, from all the various traditions. Just like a Dr. Frankenstein’s monster, it was a bunch of parts from different bodies all stuck together. But they felt that it made their god and their religion stronger to be forged from so many different, even contradictory sources of power. They created an egregore that for a time took over the world, and still influences it immensely today.”

“An egregore?” he said.

“A collective thought-form animated by magic,” I replied. “The Baphomet golem was just the physical touchpoint that allowed the Baphomet egregore to manifest.”

“So Mithras and Cybele, though they may have been contradictory in many ways, could have been combined by the Templar magicians into one thoughtform that was more powerful than both of them,” he said.

“My thoughts exactly,” I told him.

“And when did Mithras celebrate his birthday. Christmas, right?” said Chesterfield.

“Yes, supposedly,” I replied. “But Franz Cumont thought that only came to be observed after Mithras was conflated with Sol Invictus towards the end of the empire. He said that Mithraic initiations typically took place during March, and that they particularly celebrated the time around the Spring Equinox. Just like Cybele’s Day of Blood and the rest of her holy week festivals.”

Just then, Agent Paris walked in and took a place at the table. He had been listening for several minutes from the next room while he was sitting at Chesterfield’s desk, printing out documents from his own laptop with Chesterfield’s computer. He had his own remarks to share.

“You know, what’s interesting?” he said. “The end of March, or early April, was the time of year when they finished the orgies and murdered everyone in 120 Days of Sodom. There’s a bit of ambiguity because the Marquis never finished the novel. He ran out of paper when he was imprisoned in the Bastille. But he made an outline of how it would end. The 120 days of sex orgies started on November 1st. The child victims were kidnapped and taken to the Duke’s hidden mansion in the woods on Halloween Night.”

Chesterfield and I both leaned in, fascinated by what Paris was telling us.

He continued.

“Now, those orgies ended on February 28th of the following year, in which 10 of the people died. That was the spell of 120 days that the title refers to. But then he planned it to go into a new phase of total torture and murder over the following three weeks. More and more people’s tongues were to be torn out, eyes gouged out, fingers cut off, testicles crushed, organs removed or rearranged, etc., resulting in death for most of them. Twice as many people were to have died in these final festivities, which were set to end on March 21.”

“There does seem to be something about the Spring Equinox, and the entire Lenten season, which brings out human savagery,” I remarked, amazed by the coincidence but not sure what else to say about it.

“What’s also interesting is that Lent started this year on Valentine’s Day, and that’s also the birthday of Blake Rosenberg,” Chesterfield proffered.

“The former mayor of New York?” I said.

“Yeah.” He replied.

“What’s this got to do with him?” I asked.

“He’s the guy that owns Rosenberg Plaza, where the mithraeum is,” Paris replied, looking at me like I was stupid.

“Yeah, that’s the guy I’ve been researching for the last hour,” said Chesterfield. “A real weirdo. But he’s the sixth richest person in the world. 32 times richer than the Queen.”

“I had no idea!” I said. “I mean, I knew he was rich. But I guess I didn’t know how rich. Is it all from that financial news company he owns?”

“No, he started that after he got rich,” said Paris. He made it big selling the ‘Niptron Terminal.’ It’s literally a computer full of proprietary software that every single major trader in financial securities uses as a trading platform. Most of the trades made all over the world are going through one of his devices, and the users are all paying monthly licensing fees to his company.”

“Wow, I can’t believe I didn’t know that,” I said. “Doesn’t that mean his company could potentially interfere with trading on a massive scale if they wanted to? And doesn’t that mean they know every trader’s strategy before it’s executed? Couldn’t they use that information to cheat on their own trades, or sell it to others?”

“Or front-run the entire market,” said Paris, “using the data they’re skimming and high-frequency trading to drive the traders exactly where they want them to go.”

“Like sheep to a slaughter,” said Chesterfield. “I found tons of articles alleging that they were doing exactly that. The company’s been investigated for it numerous times, but the charges never stick.”

“As it is, he’s also pushing investment in gold,” said Paris. “And hoarding it himself. He’s always telling everybody that the markets are going to crash, and the currencies are going to fail, so they need to stockpile precious metal investments for Armageddon. That’s why he’s been nicknamed ‘Doomberg.’”

“That word Niptron sounds really familiar,” I said “I guess I must have heard of the terminal before.”

“Maybe,” said Paris. “But you probably also saw the word ‘Niptron’ when you were researching Mithraism. It’s the term they use in the ‘Lion’ grade to refer to the ‘baptism of fire’ that happens in the ritual, which is symbolic of the universal conflagration that will burn up the unrighteous at the end of time.”

“That’s right,” said Chesterfield. “At St. Martin’s Ludgate there’s a palindrome on the holy water font that says ‘ Nipson anomemata me monan opsin, which means ‘Wash my sin and not my face only.’ So nipson and niptron are different conjugations of the same word.”

“So do we think he was obsessed with Mithras way back when he started his company?” I asked “Back when the mithraeum was still sitting in a courtyard in the middle of Great Queen Street?”

“Probably,” said Chesterfield. “He’s also been obsessed with England for a long time, and doing business in the City for decades. But when the Queen offered to knight him, he ‘respectfully’ declined the offer, because it would have involved genuflecting to the queen during the investiture. He said he couldn’t ‘bow down’ to anybody for ‘personal reasons’ he couldn’t discuss.”

“That’s odd,” said Paris. “I also noted that his newspaper has published several articles in recent years implying that the monarchy is strapped for cash.”

“Have you found any connections between him and Thomas Weir?”

Chesterfield asked. “Or the Oriental Club? Or Director Pindar?”

“Just the Alphamstone connection,” Paris replied.

“What’s that? Chesterfield and I both said simultaneously.

“The Rector from the Church of St. Barnabas there—the one that has the Sator Square in it. . . .”

“Yes…” Chesterfield and I both said in exasperation.

“She’s just been named the Bishop of the London Diocese of the Church of England. And her first mass at St. Paul’s Cathedral will be on Easter.”

Our jaws dropped.

“What’s her name?” we both said.

“Consivia Springhole,” Paris replied.

“Springhole?” Chesterfield laughed. “It must have been tough getting through school with that name.”

“She spent her teen years in a girl’s hostel in Forest Gate in London,” said Paris. “But it closed in the 1960s. I haven’t figured out where she came from before that.”

“What else do you know about her?” asked Chesterfield.

“You won’t believe it,” said Paris.

“What?” we both said impatiently.

“She’s been the civil partner of Blake Rosenberg for the past twelve years.”

“What?” We both gasped.

“You’re telling me that Rosenberg, one of the world’s richest men, is matched up with the rector of that tiny village.”

“Yeah,” he went on. “And rumor has it, it’s an ‘open relationship.’ They have an adopted daughter. She’s twelve. She sometimes gets in the tabloids for competing at royal equestrian steeplechases.”

“Is that acceptable in the Church of England now?” I asked. “Bishops in open relationships?”

“Oh yeah, anything goes in Her Majesty’s Church now,” Chesterfield said, rolling his eyes.

“He’s a Jew too. Secular,” said Paris. “Most of his comments about Christianity have been pretty hostile. So the richest and perhaps most irreverent Jewish American in London is swinging with the leader of the Church for all of London. Bizarre, isn’t it? But I’m sure nobody’s complained because nobody wants to offend anybody.”

“Then there’s the fact that he hates women,” remarked Chesterfield. “So what’s he doing with a woman of the cloth, who is undoubtedly, due to the challenges of her nontraditional job, a feminist?”

“What’s your evidence that he hates women?” I asked.

“Women and children,” he answered. “According to the papers he’s made a number of disparaging remarks about females. He openly insists that the women who work for him maintain a sexy appearance at all times, no matter how serious the job supposedly is. He’s only allowed a handful of females to rise to the top of his business, and none of them had children.”

I thought about how this might fit in with the man’s reported obsession with Mithraism.

“In fact,” Chesterfield continued, “his female employees usually get demoted once their bosses learn that they’re pregnant. He once told a pregnant underling directly: ‘Kill it, or kill your career.’ Yet strangely, as Mayor of New York, he enthusiastically supported gay marriage so strongly that he insisted on performing the city’s first same-sex ceremony himself, on two of his own employees.”

Chesterfield turned his computer around to show me a newspaper article with a photo of Rosenberg, a Poindexter with brown hair, slightly crossed eyes and a medium build in an expensive navy suit. He was standing gleefully behind two men in equally costly suits, crowned with celebratory laurel wreaths and holding hands lovingly. In front of them stood their two adopted sons, ages 6 and 8.

“Employees of the City of New York? Or employees of Rosenberg Industries?”

“Of his own company,” Chesterfield answered. He was about to add something else, but there was a knock at the door. Everybody suddenly got quiet.

Chesterfield sat frozen, his eyes wide.

“That’s odd,” he whispered. “Normally visitors use the buzzer at the front door downstairs.” He was clearly alarmed, with no reason to expect that anybody would be calling on him now.

“Well it could be a neighbor,” Paris said in a conversational tone. But Chesterfield frantically quieted him.

“Shhh!”

He crept out of the kitchen and around the corner to the front door. Paris and I tip-toed quietly behind him. He looked through the peephole. Then he turned around, bewildered.

“There’s nobody there,” he whispered. Then he turned back around, looked through the hole again, and began turning the handle.

“Wait, aren’t you going to get your guns out?” I said to the two spooks.

“We don’t have guns,” Paris sneered. “It’s not the Wild West.”

Chesterfield opened the door. Indeed there was no one standing there. On the ground, however, there was an empty glass Coke bottle sitting there, sealed on top with the bloody severed head of a black bird.

We all gasped. Chesterfield shut the door rapidly. Then he gestured for Paris to come over to him. Paris appeared to hesitate, and looked around the room frantically. Then he took an autographed cricket bat from the wall where it was mounted a few feet away from him, and walked up right behind his partner with the bat held high. Chesterfield rolled his eyes and opened the door wide.

Still, no one was there. Both men crept out into the hallway and searched it, then quickly returned to the doorway. By this time I had noticed that there was a rolled-up piece of paper inside of the Coke bottle, and mentioned it to them.

Chesterfield put his jacket sleeve over his hand and picked up the bottle with disgust.

“God, I hope I don’t get rabies from this,” he said. He took the bottle into the kitchen and placed it on the counter, where we all gathered around to inspect it.

The dead bird’s head had been sealed in place with red wax. Chesterfield took a steak knife from one of the drawers and unsealed it. He placed the head on a paper napkin, which he then rolled up and put inside of a sandwich bag, then in the refrigerator.

After that, he took the bottle and broke the neck off on the side of the sink so that the shards would fall inside the sink. Then he shook the bottle upside down, and the rolled-up paper fell out onto the counter. He put the broken bottle and its neck inside of the fridge as well, right next to the bird head.

I didn’t ask, but presumed he was preserving these things as evidence, and planned to report the crime later. Nobody said anything. We were all trying to be as quiet as possible.

When Chesterfield returned to the counter, Paris was already using the steak knife to open the paper roll, which was also sealed with red wax. It looked like parchment. He unfurled it, and we all read the message, which appeared to be written in blood.

Sweet are the livers of the birds, but care reigns.

“What the fuck does that mean?” Chesterfield whispered. “What kind of sick weirdos are we dealing with?”

Agent Paris silently extended his hand to display his smartphone, on which he had already looked up the phrase from the scroll. It showed a website where these words were quoted as being written on the wall of a mithraeum in the Santa Prisca church in Rome.

Chesterfield rolled his eyes again. “Whatever. I’m getting my cat out of here. Who knows what they might do to her. Get your things ready, guys. We need to get going. Paris can’t be late for his meeting and we need to check out Rosenberg Plaza.”

“Are you going to report this as a crime?” I asked.

“Later,” he said, already exiting the kitchen. “It doesn’t matter right now.”

He was clearly quite frightened, and understandably eager to leave the apartment.

Paris and I packed up our briefcases. Chesterfield returned momentarily with Lenore the cat inside a carrier. We silently walked out the front door and cautiously proceeded down the hall to the elevator. But when we got to the bottom floor, there was another surprise waiting for us.

Sitting on the two pink sofas facing each other in the lobby were two Metropolitan police, along with the building’s manager—an old white man—and several other tenants. On the coffee table between the sofas was the decapitated body of a black bird, feet sticking straight up. One of the officers was examining a tag on the bird’s right foot.

Despite Chesterfield’s attempt to stop him, Paris headed right over to talk to the cops. Reluctantly, Chesterfield went over there as well, stooping under the burden of his cat carrier, and I followed behind. But by the time we got there, the short conversation was already wrapping up.

“I don’t know,” said Paris. “I’ll get in touch with my contacts and see what I can find out.” He shook the man’s hand and we all walked out of the building towards the car.

“So what did you find out?” I asked him in a hushed voice.

“They found it in the elevator. It’s one of the ravens from the Tower of London. The tag on the food IDs it. And it even has its wings clipped just like the Tower ravens. Yet when the cops called Tower security, they said the Raven Master has reported nothing amiss so far. Which means it’s a state secret. The Home Office has decided to keep it hush-hush. So the cops don’t even know the truth.”

At that moment, the cell phones of both agents rang simultaneously.

“But MI5 does,” Paris sighed, clicking his car key to unlock the doors. They both pulled out their phones while I took the cat and got into the car to wait for them.

Chapter 18: Omnia Cum Deo

The industrial use of semen will revolutionize human society.

—Aleister Crowley, diary entry, August 8, 1923

“It does everything but give you a blowjob!” Rosenberg had said of the new building for his London headquarters at an opening dinner for the office staff stationed there. It was an inside joke, a repetition of something he had once gotten in trouble for saying about the Niptron Terminal when it first came out.

But reports from employees who were already working there indicated that Rosenberg Plaza might very well be capable of giving you a blowjob. At least, that’s what it said in the Wired Magazine article I was reading on my laptop, connected to my mobile phone for data. I was reading it as we inched along in London’s morning rush hour in the Vauxhall. The article cited certain anonymous posts by alleged Rosenberg employees on 4chan, which I also began reading.

Rosenberg Plaza was built to be the “smartest building in Europe”

(construction having started back when England was considered part of Europe).

It was now the building that covered the largest land mass of any in the City of London. It supposedly was able to generate all of its own energy, due to being covered entirely in “solar windows.” In fact, it was actually generating more energy than it used, creating a surplus that was sold to the employees’ profit.

There were other schemes for generating energy within the building also.

Energy was harnessed from the exercise equipment in the gym, with workers given fixed times that they were expected to spend there. This was enforced with alarms programmed for them onto their employer-issued smart phones.

Reportedly, there was a secret power generator located in a subbasement of the main building that converted organic compost from employee lunches into energy. But only certain high-level executives had ever seen it, and they weren’t allowed to talk about it.

Because of the covert way in which the program was being run, nobody could officially confirm this, and therefore nobody knew how well the energy conversion was working, but presumably it was worth doing. The recycling of organic material had continued unabated from the time the building had opened for workers, almost a year earlier, until then, the day on which the public parts of the Plaza were going to be opened, including the mithraeum. Since there were actually two buildings in Rosenberg’s new Plaza—including a smaller one built to lease to other tenants, connected by a sky bridge, I wondered if the other tenants were required to participate in Rosenberg’s organic recycling scheme, and if all of its bathrooms were hooked up to the same system.

I wonder if the other tenants of the Plaza are required to participate in Rosenberg’s organic recycling scheme, I thought to myself.

From my reading, I further learned that the Rosenberg office building was super energy-efficient because it was equipped with a “digital ceiling.” This means that the building itself responded to people’s needs by spying on them constantly to figure out exactly when and where they required light, heat, or air conditioning. For this, cameras and microphones were everywhere, along with other sensors of every imaginable type, feeding data into a network of AIs that ran the entire Plaza as one integrated system. All artificial light was provided by a field of hexagonal white “flowers” containing high-efficiency LEDS that covered the ceilings. But this was largely supplemented by the gigantic sunroof on top that supplied natural light. There were also several much smaller sunroof portals that channeled sunlight into specific areas of the building.

The building also contained quite a lot of amenities to provide comfort and ease for those who worked there. Robotic vending machines on wheels could be ordered at the push of a button, so people could work at a desk for long hours without having to leave to get food. In fact, the digital ceiling allowed them to program hand signals or other body movements that could be used as passwords to summon food, or the police, or an ambulance, or simply to tell one’s subordinate to come immediately.

This was possible, of course, because it was sensing and tracking everybody’s movements at all times. All of these features could also be utilized with a smart phone. Indeed, everybody had to use their phone every day just to find an available desk, work station or meeting room, which is why there were phone charging stations everywhere. It was better than the Clapper, better than a Life Alert button. A complete George Jetson office. A Starship Enterprise docked in the City of London.

But it got weirder. Of course it did.

Rosenberg had been an early investor in sex robot industry also. Thus, my presumption that the building itself could provide sexual favors was not unfounded. In fact, I next discovered a 4chan thread, barely a week old, in which several alleged Rosenberg employees discussed the hidden secrets of the building known only to the elites among the organization. They said that there was a special bathroom, available only to certain employees (all of them men) which was equipped with a robotic glory hole.

Quite literally, there was a hole in the wall, covered with a small round door, in which a man could insert his penis and receive, at the push of a button, an artificially-induced orgasm. Afterwards, he would press another button, which caused the door to close again, and the hole would rinse itself with a sterilizing solution, making itself ready for the next user. There was a barbarous code word for this special room: “Qaphqa.”

None of the people talking about the glory hole would admit to having used it. I suspected some were lying about that. However, there didn’t seem to be the same kind of shame about using the company’s sex robots at office parties, which several of them had apparently been treated to. I thought it was odd that this didn’t embarrass them, because it basically amounted to the same thing in my mind. I also found myself wondering if the semen was being recycled like the other organic material in the building.

Heck, maybe even the toilets are hooked up to the generator, I thought, recalling that both urine and feces were thought of by alchemists as substances of great power. I remembered that Hennig Brand had discovered phosphorus in 1669 while performing alchemical experiments with urine. More recently, I recalled, a team of Nigerian girls had built a urine-powered generator just a few years back. So it seemed possible, though improbable.

Then I read another detail, about the women’s bathrooms in Rosenberg Plaza—those for general female employee use—that seemed to fit in with such a scenario. The toilets were equipped with separate flush buttons for liquid and solid waste.

Nothing too weird about that, I thought at first. They do that at the airports in Portland. Wastes less water that way. The liquid flush uses less than the solid flush.

But then I read the next few lines of a 4chan post.

To be clear: we are specifically asked to ensure that there is no solid waste in our urine flushes. After each flush, the bowl uses sound waves to cleanse itself. I’ve never tested it, because people who make mistakes around here get fired the first time. But I’ll bet that if you mixed your poop and pee, the building would know, and you would get caught right away.

Then there was another comment from the same person, adding another amazing detail:

There aren't many women working here, and most of those are past menopause. But I've heard that this handful of younger women get the day off whenever it's the first day of their period. There's a special room in the first basement where these women lay all day on a modified dissection table —nicknamed 'the Periodic Table—equipped with conduits and a reservoir for collecting the blood. She gets paid for doing this instead of working all day, and is forbidden from discussing it with other employees, although somebody obviously discussed it with me.

She would not be able to hide the fact that she's menstruating even if she wanted to. The building knows you're going to menstruate two days before you start, and sends an alert to your smartphone confirming your appointment in the subterranean menstrual hut.

Is Rosenberg secretly harnessing some age-old alchemical technology in his "smart building"? I wondered.

"I think you should have a look at these aerials of the Plaza," Paris said, handing me a stack of documents. On top was a color print-out showing a bird's eye photo of the whole site.

"Tell me if you see any symbolism there," he said.

I looked. The main building was an odd shape, kind of like a keystone, but not really. The other, smaller building resembled a coffin shape. The sides of the building and the rims of the roofs were a shimmering gold color, while the rest of the rooftops were filled in with powder blue. In the middle of the roof of the main building was a large white circular bubble, which I thought to be the sunroof.

I squinted my eyes and tried turning it around several times. I noticed that the shape formed by the five streets surrounding the site—Cannon Street, Queen Street, Queen Victoria Street, Bucklersbury, and Walbrook—resembled the diamond shape used in the Superman logo.

But what could that possibly mean? I wondered.

Then I noticed how the triangular pieces of sidewalk on the ends of the diamond completed it, like the horns on a bull, to form a very particular triangle shape. It was the same triangle shape I had seen in my mind’s eye when I was at Stratford House looking at the map made from the bull intestines. Cannon Street and Victoria Street seemed to encompass the contents of the triangle like the blades on a pair of scissors.

I decided to thumb through the rest of the papers. Next in the stack was a blueprint for a trefoil spiral ramp that apparently wrapped all the way around the larger building in lieu of a staircase. It wasn’t exactly a “triskelion”—the Celtic symbol made from three spirals—although it resembled one. Instead, it was all made from one line, wound in a way that almost seemed like a Mobius strip staircase from an M.C. Escher drawing.

I saw that the building had been constructed in a certain way that most of the above-ground floors were entirely open in the middle, and almost every such floor was visible from every other floor when standing near the center. The ramp connected them all, so that if you rode a skateboard from the top to the bottom, you would visit all of the sides of the building, which was made from six huge walls surrounding seven pillars.

The main lobby on the ground floor, however, had a full ceiling. But it was dominated by an object in the center called “the Vortex.” I could not tell what it was from looking at the pictures, so I searched the 4chan board for employee posts about it. I found one, written by a janitor who worked there.

Apparently, it was some kind of glass-enclosed decorative feature containing what appeared to be water and other fluids of various “earth tone” colors, swirling around inside. It was made in the shape of a “curved triangle.” The management of the company was very secretive about the Vortex, what it contained, and what it emptied into. Nobody knew if it had a purpose beyond mere decoration. They only let certain people perform maintenance on it, and none of the lower-level employees had ever talked to those people.

The janitor theorized that the toilets and the glory holes were hooked up to pipes that somehow emptied into the Vortex. He thought it was actually a fountain of untreated sewer water purporting to be a decoration. He also said there were pipes leading to the Vortex from the “Coffin House” (their actual nickname for the coffin-shaped auxiliary building that was ostensibly empty at present). Then from there, he said, pipes led to the generator in the basement.

As I read on about Rosenberg Plaza, particularly the large building that housed the company’s own headquarters, I learned that instead of having individual offices or even cubicles for the employees, the space was constructed of hexagonal pods put together like Legos. There was usually one side left open as an entrance, which could be easily rearranged at will. Individual offices were discouraged, and there were only a few for certain executives.

So people shared hexagons, and shared (or perhaps competed for) the specially-designed L-shaped desks lining the sides of the hexagons. None of them had doors, so they were easy to move from room to room. The ratio of workers to desks was 2.5 to 1. It was something called “hot-desking.” This was apparently all the rage in the European business world. There, a philosophy called het nieuwe werken (“the new work”) was being foisted upon every poor sucker who needed to earn an income.

This approach, the literature quoted Rosenberg as saying, “encourages people to work together.” It forced them to move around constantly, rather than being stuck at a single desk. People kept their personal items in storage lockers.

Even these they were encouraged to change constantly. It was against the rules to use the same locker three days in a row.

A labyrinth of hexagons, I thought. Just like a beehive. Then I remembered the design of the library in Jorge Luis Borges’ surrealist novel The Lottery in Babylon, which was almost identical. There, the hexagonal cubicles contained books made from all possible combinations of a 25-letter character set (most of them gibberish). The similarity was so close it couldn’t be accidental.

To me, someone who suffers from acute social anxiety, values privacy, and would stay home from school as a child to avoid group projects, the thought of working in a place like this seemed like an absolute nightmare. But, after a minute of thought, it occurred to me that this whole design—the hexagonal pods and the spiral ramp--was probably meant to facilitate the movement of robots. It wasn’t just about the robots that were already serving food to employees there, or cleaning up their food crumbs, or sucking their dicks at office parties.

In the near future, surely robots will soon replace the vast majority of those employees, I thought. And robots don’t need privacy.

In fact, the machines that would soon be running the place would be better able to spy on the few humans that were left if there weren’t any walls or ceilings in the way. A little more reading confirmed that the place was patrolled by “robocops” at night. These tin cans on wheels were not armed, but alerted the security team to anything unusual.

Also, as per the concept of “smart cleaning,” the sensors around the building collected data on “all activity” within. This was so that the cleaning robots would know exactly when, where and how something needed to be cleaned without having to be told. If you put your gum underneath the desk you were borrowing, a robot would immediately come clean it up, and probably also tattle on you to your boss.

I thought again about my theory that Rosenberg Plaza housed an alchemical laboratory converting the urine, feces, semen, and menstrual blood of his workers into energy, and/or other products. It occurred to me that such a system could easily be masked within the labyrinth of long tubes that were shown on the plans running throughout all of the walls, ceilings and ramps for “radiant climate control.” These were all connected to a large cluster of objects in the first subbasement labeled “water storage tanks” in the blueprints. But they were of different shapes and sizes, all networked together with pipes, and clearly not all just for storing water.

Their function is being masked, I thought silently. This is the secret generator.

Then I noticed that the largest of the tanks was positioned directly beneath

“the Vortex.” Pipes were also shown connecting the Vortex directly to the other tanks in the basement. It was a confusing circle of connections. I couldn’t tell what was flowing into what.

I kept these observations to myself. Chesterfield asked to look at the papers, so I handed them over, pointing out the unique properties of the spiral ramp. This sparked something in him. His eyes lit up.

“The triskelion was a womb symbol to the Celts,” he said, looking at me proudly. “Often there was a sun symbol in the middle, which could be taken to represent the rebirth of the sun god. It could be related. On Rosenberg’s roof he’s got a white circular sunroof to represent that part of the symbol.”

“And the site as a whole looks like the Superman logo,” Paris said. “Which, if you think about it, resembles a female pelvis.”

I was shocked by both of their contributions. Most amazing was that Paris had also noted the resemblance to the Superman symbol. The resemblance to female anatomy had occurred to me too, but I had dismissed it, since I didn’t take the Superman connection seriously in the first place.

Now I thought about the fact that Superman wore what appeared to be a pair of red bikini briefs on the outside of his blue leggings, as if to draw attention to the pelvic shape. A tingle went down the back of my neck. I knew we were on to something.

“OK,” I said. “I’ve never heard that before, but if you thought of it, that means somebody else probably did too.”

I contemplated the origin of the word “Super Man” involving the “overman” theories of Nietzsche, and how Hitler adopted them, thinking there was a new “Master Race” on the horizon. According to Herman Rauschning, Hitler once said of this:

I have seen the new man. He is intrepid and cruel. I was afraid of him.

Then there was the first use of the term “Superman” in English. This came from Aleister Crowley’s novel Moonchild, the one where he wrote about creating a child with divine parentage through sex magick. Regarding this process, he had said:

…the idea has been almost universal in one form or another; the wish has always been for a Messiah or Superman, and the method some attempt to produce man by artificial or at least abnormal means.

My meditation on these subjects was broken when I realized that we were going by St. Paul’s Cathedral again. Then before I knew it, the car stopped at a stoplight between two office buildings. Paris turned around to speak to me.

“OK, you guys can get out.”

“Where are we?” I asked.

“Rosenberg Plaza,” he said. “The ribbon-cutting will happen on the Walbrook side, east, right in front of the entrance to the mithraeum. Then go on to the conference room. That’s where Rosenberg will give a speech.”

“Should we bring the cat?” I said.

The question was directed at Chesterfield, who was already getting out of the car.

“No, don’t worry. I’ll take care of her. I have a special place where I can put her until it’s safe. Try to figure out what’s going on at this building. I’ll let you know how my meeting goes.”

I said ‘goodbye’ and got out. Before I closed the door, Chesterfield leaned over the back seat, where his cat had been sitting next to me, and stuck his fingers through the bars of the cage. He told her he would miss her, and then thanked Paris for taking care of his “little girl.” Then the other agent drove off, leaving us standing next to the “bulky, impenetrable mass” that housed the Temple of Mithras.

I looked down the street to get a scope of the entirety of the site. We were on the western corner of the “Superman logo” formed by the site, with the buildings on our right. I looked down the street, north-west, and saw the division between the two structures, with the footpath leading down between them to the “arcade” as it was called in the paperwork I’d seen. There we would surely find the promised “dining and retail establishments” that the plans said would be there. Having only had a scone since the regurgitated meal at the pub the previous night, I was hungry.

“Let’s find a restaurant,” I said. “We have 40 minutes to kill until the ribbon-cutting.”

“OK, sure,” Chesterfield agreed.

“What’s the coffin-shaped building for?” I wondered aloud as we walked past it. “I didn’t see much about it in the design plans.”

“I saw it in the permit applications,” said Chesterfield. “They were at the back of the stack. Supposedly they’re going to sublease it. But I’ll bet it’s still completely empty. It’s just for real estate speculation. That’s what most of the office buildings in the City are used for, honestly. Hardly any of them are more than half-full. It’s a shame.”

“Did you notice anything else in the permit apps?” I asked.

“Yes, actually, he replied. “There used to be a tunnel from the basement of Bucklersbury House, which is the building that used to be here. That tunnel connected to the basement of Mansion House, where the Lord Mayor lives.

Rosenberg petitioned to keep this structure and incorporate it into his new building. Rosenberg is quite friendly with the Lord Mayor. So I do wonder what they may be getting up to together.”

We turned down the walkway between the buildings—which, according to the street sign, was actually the “historic Watling Street,” now restored to its former trajectory, but with a stone tile floor and a glass ceiling. Within a few feet we immediately noticed a sign for “Oz Pizza and Ping-Pong Parlour,” with Lewis Carroll characters painted in the windows. A hand-written sign taped to the inside of the door advertised their ping-pong tournament for that afternoon, coinciding with the mithraeum opening.

I realized that this was the place Drexella the police lady had mentioned. I found something about it inherently revolting. But Chesterfield wanted to go in, and I was starving, so I went along.

The restaurant contained six dining tables and two ping-pong tables, beyond which was a set of doors that seemed to lead out into the lobby of the Rosenberg office building. So far nobody had arrived yet for the “tournament.”

The place was empty except for us and the greasy-skinned white teenage boy covered with tattoos and piercings who worked behind the counter. He looked like he was either on drugs or suffering from some neurologic problem. He stared at us with an open mouth.

In addition to the pictures of Alice and the Cheshire Cat painted on the windows, there were murals with similar themes on the walls inside. Lamps were mounted on the walls, all held in place with plastic human arms. Behind the counter, there was a framed painting of a trinacria, which is a gorgon head with three legs for a body, and not much else.

A trinacria is a heraldic emblem, part of the flag of Sicily. It’s associated with a legend that I was familiar with. The story is that the legs represent the three pillars which, according to myth, hold up the island. The head in the middle signified a little boy named Colapesce. It was said that he voluntarily swam under the island and replaced one of the pillars, which was broken, with himself, thereafter serving to help bear that burden eternally.

The owners of Oz Pizza must be Sicilian, I thought.

Other wall art, however, was not as easily explained. In the center of the main wall was a poster advertising their "signeture pizza" (sp.), which was called "the Beast." What struck me even more than the awful typo in a professionally-produced full-color poster was the odd way in which the pizza was sliced and the toppings arranged.

The pie, which, at "10.8 inches," was no bigger than their regular "large" size (11 inches), featured only four pieces of pepperoni, accompanied by just one other topping: a single black olive. The pepperoni pieces were all overlapping in the center. On the bottom were two pieces, intersecting so as to form a vesica pisces shape. Then on top of this, in the center and slightly below, were two more pieces, both intersecting with each other, and with the other two. Together, if you traced the outline of the shape formed by the stack of pepperoni, you would see a classic trefoil clover shape.

The pizza itself had been cut so as to form a seven-pointed unicursal star.

This meant that there was an outer ring with fourteen slices—seven thin ones and seven fat ones. These surrounded five tiny triangles and a heptagon in the center.

However, the pepperoni slices were stacked on top of these, so that you could only see two of the tiny triangles, and only three sides of the heptagon. This meant that the pizza had been cut and cooked before the pepperoni was put on.

Over the top of the upper portion of the pizza, the price—£9.99—was written in a black font with a red border, but each digit was slightly misaligned with the others.

It makes no practical sense to design it this way, I thought. And why call it

“the Beast” when it’s not especially large and doesn’t have an extraordinary amount of toppings—in fact, hardly any?

I stared at the poster. So did Chesterfield. Then we stared each other. I shrugged my shoulders and mouthed the words “I have no idea.”

Chesterfield, apparently more hungry than curious, turned back around to the counter and ordered.

“A simple slice of cheese pizza, please,” he said. The boy at the counter continued to stare at his face for 20 seconds before he registered a belated response.

“Oh, sure,” he said. “Anything for you?” he asked me.

“No thanks,” I replied.

“But you said you were hungry,” argued Chesterfield. “Come on, I’ll buy again.”

“No thanks,” I said. “I lost my appetite.” I was feeling uneasy there for some reason, but I didn’t know why. The boy put a slice of cheese pizza in the oven for Chesterfield.

“How long has this place been open?” I asked.

“Oh, about four months,” the boy responded. “My Mum got me a job here.

She knows the guy who owns the building.”

“You mean Rosenberg?” I said. “She knows him?”

“Yeah, I guess,” he replied. Clearly, he either didn’t know the details of who the man was and how his mother knew him, or else he just wasn’t going to tell us.

He picked at his fingernails for a minute and then pulled the pizza out of the oven.

“Do you want the Drizzle?” he asked Chesterfield, holding it out on a paper plate.

“The what?” the agent replied, bewildered.

“Oh, the Drizzle is our special hot sauce,” he said. “You want to try it?” He held up a clear squeeze bottle filled with a red liquid.

“OK, sure,” said Chesterfield. The boy put the plate with the hot pizza slice down on the counter, then proceeded to pour “the Drizzle” onto the pizza.

Something about the odor of the sauce, and the spooging sound it made as he squeezed it out, caused me to experience a sharp wave of nausea. This brought clarity. As he applied the Drizzle with more care than a real moron could muster, forming a perfect counter-clockwise triangular spiral, I flashed on where I had seen that symbol before.

It was from the FBI’s website, on their official list of symbols used by the pedophile community. The spiral triangle was the international sign of “boylovers.” It had been infamously found on the logo of a politically-connected pizza parlor in Washington D.C. that some believed was part of a child trafficking ring. This caused a scandal that led to the company changing their logo in December of 2016.

Then, while thinking about Aleister Crowley and his voracious defense of pederasty in his own writings, I instinctively clasped my hand to my mouth in horror as the next realization hit me. Looking again at the poster for the “Beast” pizza, it now occurred to me what it represented. I used my phone to do a Google Image Search, just to confirm what I already knew.

Sure enough, the pizza on the poster was decorated to look exactly like the “Signet of the Beast” designed by Aleister Crowley. It was a symbol printed, among other places, as an illustration to go with a text by Crowley called “Liber Oz,” which proclaimed the “right” of his followers to “love” whoever and however their “will” desired. It also stated their “right to kill” anybody who got in their way. The Signet consisted of a heptagram inside of a circle, with four circles in the middle, represented on the poster by the pepperoni.

The source I read couldn’t explain what the circles in the middle truly meant, except to say that their resemblance to a penis and testicles was "intentional." At the bottom of the Signet, Crowley had put the number "666," a number he identified with personally, as he fancied himself the Antichrist. On the poster, the Signet had been cleverly turned upside-down so that the three sixes became the three nines of the pizza's price.

I turned back to Chesterfield to explain this to him. But then I saw him chomping down happily on the disgusting slice of filth. I instinctively grabbed it out of his mouth.

"Don't eat it!" I shouted. He and the teenage boy looked at me with confusion. I grabbed Chesterfield by the necktie and led him out the door, tossing the pizza slice in the garbage can near the exit. He wisely said nothing until we got outside, but he put a five-pound note in the boy's tip jar, presumably to make up for my rudeness.

"What's wrong?" he said. "I was hungry! And I paid for that!"

"There are Crowley sigils and pedophile symbols all over that place," I said.

"God knows what they put in 'the Drizzle.' Who knows what they even put in the cheese."

"What exactly do you mean?" he asked.

I showed him how the pizza on the poster corresponded to the Signet of the Beast. Then I explained how much Crowley valued the ingestion of sperm, menstrual blood, urine and feces as spiritually beneficial. I told him how Crowley's cult members would put these substances in their Eucharist cakes, called "Cakes of Light," for their "Gnostic Mass" rituals, which were open to the public. Guests attending these rituals were not warned of the cakes' contents.

As I elucidated, Chesterfield began to turn green. He walked to a nearby water-fountain and rinsed his mouth out. Then he stuck his fingers in and appeared to contemplate gagging himself to purge his stomach. But he decided not to.

“Now think,” I said to Chesterfield. “You know we’re following the trail of some weird occultists who conjure demons, fuck kids, murder people and chop them up. Didn’t you even think for a minute that there might be cum in the pizza before you started putting it in your mouth?”

“No that didn’t occur to me,” he answered, embarrassed and annoyed. “So I guess wine and cheese at the lecture is off the menu too, right? Speaking of which, let’s get going. I want to get a nice spot up front so I can get a good look at this boyfucker who sells cum pizza and worships Mithras.” He began to walk southeast down the arcade towards Walbrook.

“He’s probably just subleasing to the cum pizza people,” I said. As I walked away, I noticed a small sign in the window that I hadn’t seen before. It said, so strangely:

PIZZA BY THE HOUR

INQUIRE WITHIN

I took a photo of it with my phone. Then I saw the kid that worked there walking towards the glass door, staring angrily at me. I hustled to catch up with Chesterfield.

We got to the end of the arcade and turned left. There we saw a crowd of maybe 60 people all huddled around one of the doors of the building. The street had been blocked off both ways by police tape, and there were a couple of cops on each end standing guard lazily.

We worked our way to the front. We saw that there were posters on the walls identifying this as the location of the temple. These included photos of some of the artifacts inside, and of the archeology that had taken place over the previous few years. The historian inside of me began to get excited.

Within a few moments, there was a bit of clamor and commotion.

Rosenberg and his entourage, including several bodyguards, were arriving from the north side of the street. The lead man himself wore a tailored black pinstripe suite with brown stripes, and a red rose on the lapel. An assistant held the unavoidable giant scissors, which, after some cheers and a forgettable introduction in Rosenberg's nasally voice, were used by him to cut the ribbon, bringing even more applause. Then the doors opened. Rosenberg promised to give a speech to those interested in conference room in thirty minutes. Then he and his bodyguards disappeared around the corner.

"Well, if the Anti-Christ is a Poindexter, then that may well be the Anti-Christ," said Chesterfield, acknowledging the inherent dorkiness of the rich and powerful man that we'd just seen.

After waiting for the people in front of us to go inside the temple, we got our turn. I let Chesterfield pay the suggested donation of nine pounds for both of us.

The first room we entered was a gallery full of artifacts and framed photos.

Off to the right there was a staircase leading down into the temple itself. Not wanting to compete with the crowds to get down there, I suggested we look at the artifacts first. That is where our fears about the mithraeum were confirmed.

The first thing we saw that we recognized was the bust of Serapis with the modius on his head. It had been discovered along with the other artifacts when the mithraeum was first found beneath Bucklersbury House in 1954. It had also been featured in the film Easter Sunday April Fool, when the boy had been castrated among the ruins.

A few feet away from that, we found, in a glass case, the little metal casket on a chain, containing the round strainer, which had also been used in the film.

The plaque next to the case described it as a device for straining and administering psychoactive herbs during rituals. Depicted on the side of the casket was a person, who looked like a child to me, emerging from a rectangular box on the ground while an upright-standing grown man gripped his arm to help him up.

I thought it might be Mithras emerging from the stone. But the plaque said that it probably illustrated a death and rebirth ritual practiced by the cult. In this rite, the initiate would be drugged into a comatose state, buried, and then let out of the tomb upon awakening. I knew it very well could have been a little boy because I had read that Mithra’s temples accepted applicants as young as seven.

Then, as if we didn’t already know what we were dealing with, we saw the final confirmation. The posters of the original dig underneath Bucklersbury House were unmistakable. These were the stones that the boy in the film had been lying on when he was castrated. The site had been opened in 1954, and then the stones of the mithraeum were moved elsewhere just a few weeks later so that they could finish building Bucklersbury House. The first (very poor) “restoration” of the ruins didn’t go on display in Temple Court until 1956. So the castration rite had happened sometime between those two events.

Chapter 19: Rrose Mountain

I am the son of a man and a woman from what I have been told. This astonishes me… I believed I was something more.

—Comte de Lautreamont, Maldoror

Thus we were already feeling very heavy in our hearts, reeling from the implications of what we'd found, when we made our way down the stairs into the mithraeum itself, which was one floor underground. Inside, there was nothing visually surprising. It was my first time being inside such a temple, but it had been restored well, so that it looked exactly how I'd imagined a mithraeum should.

They all generally followed the same plan, and this did too: one long aisle, leading to an apse with an altar in front of it. The taurtoctony, depicting Mithras slaying the bull, was mounted on the wall behind the altar. All along the aisle were stone couches where members would have slouched back and watched the proceedings, or whatever else they did together. It seemed like they all did to me: empty and austere. They were made to look like large open caves, and this they achieved.

What struck me was not the décor or design, which was as expected.

Instead it was the thickness of the atmosphere. Even stuffed with a crowd, the temple felt like it was full of choking energy: fear, anger, and pain. The pungent smell of a putrid flavor of incense came to my nose, even though I knew it was only coming from my mind. I asked Chesterfield if he sensed it too, but he said that he wasn't sure. He suggested that maybe it was just because being underground again was bringing back memories of my kidnapping by Leopold.

We began to follow several of the others back through the gallery, then through the door in the back that led to a large circular hallway. The walls were lined with blond wood paneling, and they curved up in a concave manner. We made our way up the ramp towards the ground floor. It was really more like a tunnel, spiraling up to the next floor and no doubt part of the spiral ramp that ran through the rest of the building. It also led back down the other way to another sub-basement below, but that way was cordoned off.

As we emerged from the underground level and into the light, I looked up at the ceiling and saw that much of it was sunlight, coming through a large piece of glass in the ceiling on top of which was a fountain of dirty water. Hidden jets on the sides were constantly injecting a denser, brown substance that swirled around in the mix. I could see why people thought that the Vortex contained sewer water. I also noted that, instead of merely being a "rounded triangle," as the janitor on 4chan had described it, the shape more closely resembled the Superman logo with rounded corners. I took note of the coincidence.

I also noticed that, once we got to the second floor, so that we were above the Vortex, the carpet on the ramp was lined on both sides with a transparent tube running constantly with a yellow-orange fluid.

These are the tubes carrying urine to the Vortex, I thought.

Cordons and posted signs encouraged us to keep moving up the ramp, while discouraging us from visiting the lobby or any of the other intervening floors, promising that the conference room was "ahead." So we kept going, until we were almost at the top of the building, on what must have been the ninth floor, as there were only ten and just one up above us.

There we found the conference room, surrounded by blonde wooden columns interspersed with clear glass. The podium, projector screen, and red plastic chairs could be seen from the ramp. Along the side of the wall on the left were two tables serving wine and cheese, which Chesterfield and I knew to avoid.

As we all filed in, I saw that the initial crowd of 60 had thinned to about 25.

I spotted a familiar figure sitting in the front row. It was Drexella, the lady cop. As soon as I recognized her, she turned around, smiled, and waved, like she had felt my eyes on her. We had no choice but to sit down next to her.

“Hey Drexella,” I said. “Nice to see you again.”

“Yep,” she said, smacking gum as she spoke. “Wouldn’t miss it. Rosenberg’s a family friend. I’ve been waiting for this for years.”

“Really?” said Chesterfield. “We just met someone downstairs whose mother is also a family friend of his.”

“Oh you mean Dennis? At Oz Pizza? Yep, that’s my boy,” she said proudly. I cringed. “We’ll be on the same ping-pong team later on at the tournament.”

“So how exactly do you know Mr. Rosenberg?” Chesterfield asked.

But just then, the lights were dimmed over the audience, and the spotlight over the podium was put on. Within a few seconds, Rosenberg entered from the back, this time wearing a red Phrygian cap, and everybody clapped. He took the stage and began to speak.

“Just call me Papa Smurf” was his first line, and everybody howled with laughter. He then began a speech about the history of the City of London, and to symbolic connections between the beliefs of the Mithraic cult, which I will attempt to paraphrase below. He said:

It is fitting that the temple which we presented to you fully restored for the first time today was once the site of homage to gods of not one, but three different aspects of finance.

First, of course, it was a temple to Mithras, the god of contracts. The Mithraic cult was called the Syndicoi—the “People of the Handshake,” from which we get our word “syndicate.” This is based on the deal that was struck, according to Mithraic mythology, between Sol and Mithras. After Sol and all of his henchmen, the other planetary Archons, had been defeated by Mithras in his march to the highest sphere in heaven, they made an agreement with each other to share both the power and the glory of the Sun, which they sealed with a handshake, before sitting down to break bread together.

Some historians believe that the very origin of the custom of shaking hands, performed millions of times a day now, most often in a business setting, had its origins with the Mithras cult. This agreement between Sol and Mithras, which Mithraists believed kept the Sun rising and setting each day, was based upon mutual trust in the sacred nature of the oath. This is why they would invoke the name of Mithras as the enforcer of oaths whenever a new contract was signed. This same ethic, as we all know, is what lies behind everything that happens in business and finance today, ever since the Knights Templar invented the concept of the checking system.

I noticed right away several things about this speech. For one thing, Rosenberg’s analysis of Mithraism was very similar to my own, and not entirely consistent with what is right now commonly agreed upon by historians. What I mean is that for some reason they cannot see that the images of Sol and Mithras together clearly show him defeating the Sun god and forcing him to bow down in supplication.

This is shown happening before the handshake, and before the shared meal was permitted to occur (which so many have claimed is the origin of the Christian Eucharist). Rosenberg chose not to mention the specific imagery of the Sun bowing down to Mithras. But he did relate the meaning of it.

Another thing I noted was that he chose to use the term “planetary Archons.” I couldn’t think of any author on the subject of Mithras who has referred to the planetary powers he ruled over as “Archons.” This term brings up specifically Gnostic connotations, and implies a negative view of their role in the cosmos as tyrannical. According to Gnostic thought, we are living in an invisible jail cell, made of illusion, and the planetary Archons are our captors, the rulers of our sad fate in this lonely world of despair.

To interpret this view as being present in Mithraism, as no previous author on the subject had done, would mean that Mithras was a heroic figure precisely because he fought and subdued these powers. It also indicates that he himself became the chief archon then, and thereafter allowed the others to rule underneath him as subordinates. He would then have essentially become the new Demiurge, the new chief jail warden. This viewpoint, I believe, was further reflected in the rest of Rosenberg's speech. He said: Now this temple wasn't always exclusively a temple to Mithras. They found statues of other gods in there as well. One was Serapis, a.k.a.

Hades, Pluto, or Dispater: the god of the underworld, and the god of the mineral wealth beneath the earth. This is where we get the word "plutocrat" for those who rule with the power of gold and silver.

They also found here a statue of Mercury, the wily patron of both commerce and thievery. From his first day of birth, he was making business deals with Apollo, yet another figure to hold the title of "sun god" … There's so many of them….

He trailed off for a minute and coughed, staring off into the corner. He appeared to succumb to a short personal mental trip before shaking it off. Then he continued:

"But we know that Mercury's quicksilver-tongued promises are not to be trusted. We also know that gold and silver lose their shine if we lose our trust in one another. If the Mithraic value of the sacred oath is not honored, all money systems fail. All societies fail when that happens. This is why the real basis of the wealth of a society today is this mutual trust.

The ranks of the Mithraic cult throughout the Roman Empire were initially filled with soldiers. Most of them were foreign legionnaires, rather than native Romans. And these, as any student of history knows, were not free men, but slaves.

In the Roman Empire, virtually every person with any sort of functional job was officially a slave to some landholder. The landholders did not work.

They owned people who would do everything for them. Even the office-holders in the municipal governments were not free men, with the occasional exception of someone who was able somehow to purchase or earn their freedom.

This is why these government office-holders were called, in Latin, servi publici—‘public servants.’

When I served as the Mayor of New York some years ago, I often thought about this fact. I can tell you that being a billionaire businessman makes you feel a thousand times more powerful than being a mere elected official. And most of the public servants I’ve met in my time would have to admit that they are slaves to the businessmen who are truly pulling the strings behind the scenes.

Because Roman soldiers were slaves, it was only fitting that their god, Mithras, wore the Phrygian cap, like I’m wearing now. It was the symbol of a freed slave. Mithras identified himself with Saturn, the highest of the planetary Archons, and Saturn also wore the Phrygian cap.

During Saturnalia, the Roman winter solstice festival, slaves were given temporary freedom, and the whole social order was upended.

Slaves would wear these hats, now called liberty caps, as a symbol of their freedom. This was because Saturn, the alleged founder of the Italian civilization, was remembered for having ruled over a “Golden Age” of abundance in the ancient past, during which no one was compelled to work for another.

Within the Temples of Mithras, the social order was always upended in the same manner. Even in the later years, when the Emperor himself had joined and the latifundia were flocking to mithraeums, we find in the records the names of slaves shown to be worshipping alongside their free superiors, often with the slaves occupying the positions of leadership. As Mithraic scholar Franz Cumont put it, ‘In these societies, the last frequently became the first, and the first the last….’

Today it seems we live in a society where wealth and power has been largely divorced from the privilege of birth. The distinction between slave and freeman has been broken down. Private enterprise, and even public service, are routes to wealth and power that potentially anyone can follow. I came from a family of Jewish immigrants to New York, and I now possess 32 times more wealth than Her Majesty the Queen of England.

At this point, Chesterfield becoming visibly annoyed, nudged me with his elbow, then whispered in my ear.

“He can’t stop pointing that out. He’s obsessed with it.”

I tried to ignore him and strained to hear Rosenberg as he continued:

I dare say that I believe a large part of this change has been spearheaded from right here: the Square Mile of the Sovereign City of London, which still occupies the pomoerium of the old Roman city of Londinium. The pomoerium of a Roman city, by the way, which was the area within the walls, was officially designated by a state auger using divination, and did not necessarily encompass all of the territory controlled politically by the city. It was a sacred boundary, serving obscure purposes that historians still don’t totally understand. Yet for some reason, perhaps mystical, even though most of London’s wall is gone, the sacred boundary remains.

As all of you locals know, the City of London, governed by City of London Corporation, has always been a political power on equal par with the Crown, keeping it in check. The rights of the City are actually protected eternally in a special clause provided in the Magna Carta, to which the Lord Mayor was a signatory. This Corporation is formed by the Freemen of the City, and the Livery Companies. It was a government made of merchants and artisans who owned the freeholds to the buildings out of which they operated, or belonged to guilds that did, and were therefore called “free.”

The City is separate from the kingdom in some ways, and yet it plays a leading part in many others, with the Lord Mayor even playing a role in the coronation of the monarch. As you know, monarchs used to traditionally ask permission to enter the City, with an elaborate ceremony at Temple Bar necessary to grant it. Although this ceremony has since been dispensed with, and the Crown is now quite cooperative with the City, I think this is only because the Corporation of London has so many times in the past not hesitated to remind the monarchs that they must either share power with the City, and respect its rights, or be replaced.

One of the aldermen from the early twentieth century, Lord Wakefield of Hythe, wrote in his book London Forever about how the City had always been the “real kingmaker” in the kingdom. He credits the Corporation with effecting every change of dynasty that has occurred in England, including allowing the formation of the Protectorate, and dispensing with it later when it had outlived its usefulness. He stated:

London stood for Liberty and Moderation, and was the champion of constitutional rights regardless of the nature of the oppressor.

When the King ceased to respect the laws of the land and the interests of his people, the Sovereign City drove him from the throne. When the Commonwealth ceased to represent popular government and tried to rule by force of arms, the secession of the City brought back the exiled Stuarts.

By its action the Sovereign City expressed the national dislike for republican government and England’s firm belief in constitutional monarchy as the best form of government for a free people.

So just as Mithras and Sol agreed to share ultimate power for the greater good, and to keep each other in check with mutual trust based on mutual understanding, the Crown and the City do also. It is fitting then, that today we have been able to open the Temple of Mithras once again, but now in a magical square mile that has led the world in a social revolution based on the merit of earned credit rather than the accident of birth.

How amazing is it that all this time until its discovery in 1954, the temple of Mithras was right here, right next to the official home of the Lord Mayor, whose office has always led this fight? It’s next to the Bank of England, which financed the Royal Navy and allowed Britain to build her magnificent empire. And you know that the national bank provided the prototype upon which the world’s central banks now function, stabilizing currencies and growing economies throughout the centuries since. And of course, the London Bullion Market Association, where the prices of precious metals are fixed for the world each day, is right here as well.

This location we stand upon right now is important for several other reasons. The London Stone once stood at 111 Cannon Street, just one block east of here. There is a tradition, lost in the fog of ancestral memory, that says the Lord Mayor used to be sworn into office upon this stone. Another tradition, confused with Arthurian legend, seems to imply that if a certain sword, once embedded in the stone to the hilt, could be removed from it, the holder would then become the king of England.

The truth veiled behind these myths was that the City of London, represented by the stone, restrained the “Sword of State’ from being abused by the monarch against the freemen. Whenever that gentle but firm restraint failed, and the monarch insisted upon brandishing a weapon that ought best to remain holstered, the City saw to it that new blood would take the throne instead.

That was the millarium of the Roman city, the foundation of all the geographical measurements within. It may also have been their terminus stone, sacred to Jupiter, marking the crossroads where their two main thoroughfares intersected.

Not coincidentally, I believe, this exact point has for the last several centuries been the navel of the finance world and the crossroads of the global marketplace. I believe this is more true now than ever before. And we are just getting started.

We all know that the modern money system, while an improvement upon the past, is still another form of slavery. But I believe that there is another phase coming in our evolution as a species, which will set us free from this once and for all. It involves artificial intelligence, intelligently planned buildings, and intelligently run communities. It involves utilizing the untapped power and potencies that lie hidden within our own human bodies. And it starts right here, at Rosenberg Plaza.

With that anticlimactic summation, with that ridiculous pretension to be the harbinger of the future emancipation of humanity, lacking completely in any explanation, which landed on the ears with an uncomfortable thud, he looked up from his notes awkwardly and stared blankly, waiting for applause. After an uncomfortable moment, people began to clap.

“This guy’s a fascist,” Chesterfield whispered to me, as everybody stood up and cheered.

“No, he’s an anarchist,” Drexella replied, glaring at him. She obviously admired Rosenberg’s philosophy.

After the applause died down, he came down and spoke to people from the audience individually, starting with the woman at the extreme right of our row in the front. I recognized her from the previous night’s news report as Dame Marcia Martina, the Lord Mayor of the City. Their warm handshake, which morphed into a hug, indeed indicated that they were “quite chummy.”

Rosenberg made his way down the row, and soon found his way to Drexella, whom he uncomfortably allowed to hug him. I stood staring at them, wondering how they knew each other, and wondering what I would say to him when I got the chance to touch his sweaty palm. But I didn’t have to worry about that. The problem solved itself.

In a stunning turn of events, Rosenberg, who had not looked in my direction this entire time, let alone made eye contact, all of the sudden turned towards me and stared me in the face directly and deliberately. He had a mischievous expression: a small amount of nervousness mixed with a large amount of excitement.

"Drexella, how do you know Pamela Auger?" he said. "You never cease to surprise me with your interesting personal connections. Aren't you going to introduce me?"

He held out a hand for shaking. I grabbed it for a single shake and then let go, staring at them both confusedly, panicking, but still trying to smile.

I lied to Drexella about my name. How did Rosenberg know it? I thought.

"I have your book about the Templar idol, and your translation of the Hammer-Purgstall text," he said. "It was amazing how you found those artifacts right here in London, in the museum."

I couldn't believe it. The sixth most wealthy man in the world was reading my self-published books. For a moment I was flattered. Then I thought more about the implications of what he had said.

Can there be any doubt that everything I've experienced since I arrived here has been connected since accepting Leopold's bizarre invitation? The disappearance of the Mete coffer from the museum. My kidnapping. The underground bull sacrifice. The forced liver divination at Stratford House. The video of castration and child rape sent to MI5. The murder of the agency's director. Drexella alerting us to the opening of the mithraeum . And Rosenberg reading my book.

I looked to Chesterfield for help, but he was just staring at Rosenberg in shock.

"How about meeting me and some friends for a dinner party we're having tonight? It's just next door. You can autograph my books! I actually have them sitting in my office here. I'll bring them tonight."

For a moment, I let myself consider that maybe I was being paranoid to suspect him of nefarious deeds. After all, it was Leopold/Thomas who was undeniably guilty. The evidence against Rosenberg was still technically circumstantial.

Maybe, I thought, this trip will finally open things up for my career, just like I'd hoped it would.

But I shook off my ego response and listened to my fear.

You're going to get raped and killed, and nobody will ever know what happened to you, I thought more sensibly.

"As long as I can bring my friend, sure!" I said, grabbing Chesterfield's hand.

"Of course!" he responded. "Who's this?"

The question was directed at me, obviously prompting me to introduce him. But Drexella butted in.

"That's Agent Chesterfield from MI5," she said. "He's a cutie, itn't 'e?" She winked at him. He recoiled but tried to hide it. Rosenberg smiled in amusement.

"I'm very sorry to hear about Côme Pindar. I hope you catch the guy," he said. Then he turned to me.

"It's a date then. I'll see you at 5 o'clock. Just go to the New Court building at St. Swithin's Lane, right behind the St. Stephen Church. It's just off Walbrook, right behind us. Give your name to the front desk when you get there."

"You're still coming to the Ping-Pong Tournament, aren't you?" Drexella asked him.

"Oh, you know it," he answered enthusiastically. "I'm bringing friends!" And with that, he moved on to shake more hands.

Chapter 20: Equinox of the Gods

Hail! ye twin warriors about the pillars of the world! for your time is nigh at hand.

…my left hand is empty, for I have crushed an Universe;

& nought remains .

— Aleister Crowley, The Book of the Law Knowing that we absolutely could not consume any of the food at Rosenberg's party, Chesterfield and I opted for a pub lunch at the Green Man, right across Queen Victoria Street. It was inside of another office building that had a remarkable triangular courtyard built in the center of it. We enjoyed fish and chips while we tried to come to grips with all that had just happened.

"Doesn't it seem strange that Rosenberg's having his party in another office building?" I asked. "Why not his own? Surely he has space to entertain guests."

"It's probably his friend the Lord Mayor who is throwing the party for him,"

Chesterfield said.

"Why do you say that?" I asked "Wouldn't the party be at Mansion House then?"

"She hardly spends much time there," said Chesterfield. "She's usually at New Court from what I've heard. And it's hard to beat the Sky Box at New Court for entertaining billionaires. It was built for that. It has the best view in the area."

I stared at him, waiting for a fuller explanation, since I obviously didn't know what he was talking about. Finally, he continued.

“New Court is the site of the Rothschild empire in London. They’ve lived and run their business from that very site since the 1800s. They used to fix the price of gold there everyday, before the Bullion Association started doing it next door. And Marcia Martina is a Rothschild heiress. She married into the family. Her son Crispin works for Rosenberg as his right-hand man.”

“I see,” I said, whipping my laptop out of my bag and setting it up at the table.

“What are you looking up?” asked Chesterfield.

“I’m going to look at the site on Google Maps again.” I dialed it up and stared at the Superman logo-shaped plot of land, with the New Court building, labeled simply “Rothschilds,” just east of it.

“I wonder why Paris isn’t answering his phone,” said Chesterfield, who had just tried to call him. “Surely he isn’t still getting grilled by Miss Equitone. Maybe I should check on him after all. Maybe it’s safe.”

All of the sudden there was a dramatic change in the atmosphere of the room. The music was switched off. The TV, which had been tuned to Rosenberg’s financial news network with the sound muted, was simultaneously turned up.

Several people moved to stand closer to the television. Apparently, it was a very bad day on the stock market so far. The news showed people on the floors of the New York Stock Exchange, the London Stock Exchange, and the Euronext exchange in Amsterdam running around in a panic.

“What’s going on?” I asked.

“France left the Eurozone,” said the man to my left. “And the President says they’re going to default on their debt. The Euro’s collapsing.”

As we stood their watching the European project fall apart, a scream was heard from the back of the pub. It was a woman seated near the window. A man had just jumped from a balcony onto the pavement below, deliberately, she said.

He laid face down on the ground of the building's central courtyard with a pool of blood around him.

Just then, Chesterfield received a text from Paris. He showed me what it said.

Don't come in to the office. And don't call.

"Well, I guess it's not safe after all," he said. "And he sank into an anxious quietude, tapping his feet compulsively with his hands tucked crossways under his armpits. I knew what he was thinking. He was worried about his country. And his partner. And his cat.

So with no particular place to go until 5 pm, we sat there watching the world's economy collapse on Rosenberg TV, drinking Shirley Temples while the businessmen around us freaked out and drank themselves silly. We watched the paramedics come and scrape up the dead guy on the pavement while a news crew filmed it. We saw the news report on this and several other suicides related to the market crash.

Many of the people in the bar were torn between fear of the unknown future and excitement, even glee, at watching a political entity they despised finally kick the bucket. Some were morose, having obviously lost their investments. Some knew they would be losing their jobs soon because of this. All were nervous, rightly, about price volatility. They knew that the chain reaction around the world would be causing all sorts of catastrophic issues as investors freaked out about the likelihood of a currency crisis in Europe and the uncertainty of trade agreements.

Some of the pundits on TV were smirking wryly at rumors trending on Twitter alleging that the events were caused by a curse that the markets had brought upon themselves. For the first time ever, Good Friday and "Easter Monday" had been removed from the list of national bank holidays in the USA, the UK, and the EU—a decision made by international agreement the previous year based on the projected savings of opportunity costs involved in allowing a four-day weekend. They did it so that everybody could make more money—because, hey, more money! Instead, many Catholics and Anglicans agreed, that decision may have cost the West a great deal, perhaps even, some suggested, the bursting of the entire decades-old debt bubble that supported its floundering economy.

"But this is all nonsense based on urban legends," Art Cashin said in a live interview on Rosenberg TV. "People say that the Black Friday gold crash in 1869 was on Good Friday, but it was actually September 24th. The last time the New York Stock Exchange was open on Good Friday was March 29, 1907, and the market was up when it closed at the end of the day."

"But that was the peak of the market that year," countered Seamus Molony, a journalist with an Irish accent also being interviewed in the same segment. "It went down after that. "And the Irish Catholic traders all lamented to the men running the exchange: 'We told you not to open on Good Friday.' That's recorded at the time."

Nobody knew what to make of this superstition. The only thing that was for sure was that nobody had any faith in anything: not the government, the Queen, or the banks. Certainly not "the People"—that is, the lazy mob. And not, most useless of all, the Church or God. When the Pope released a statement against

"global panic," blamed the Eurozone breakup on "xenophobia," and lectured the "rich" of the world not to be "greedy" during the unfolding crisis, people started throwing food at the TV amid loud jeering.

Of course, a lot of these people were also on their cell phones, calling brokers and telling them to move money around. Gold and silver were natural fallbacks, but these were getting ridiculously more expensive by the minute. Or, as the pessimist would see it, currencies were becoming more worthless relative to metal by the minute. The news about France had come just minutes before the price of gold was "fixed" by the London Bullion Market at 3 PM, so it was set by the bankers with the benefit of that knowledge. The FTSE closed 20% down for the day, the biggest one-day loss ever, almost double the previous record, and got shut down 30 minutes early at 4 PM.

Chesterfield's only comment was to point out that Director Pindar's head mounted on Temple Bar was directly facing the London Stock Exchange building right across Paternoster Square. I told him it reminded me of a "nithing pole," the Norse form of cursing an enemy by pointing the severed head of a horse at his house, mounted on a stick. Then the connection with the imagery of bull sacrifice—specifically the blood baptisms of Cybele's taurobolium rite—was pointed out to us by the headlines used on Rosenberg TV to introduce the latest reports on the global stock market collapse:
BLOODBATH ON WALL STREET

and:

BAD FRIDAY: EUROPA SLAYS THE BULL

"How ironic," I said to Chesterfield. "Europa was raped by Zeus in the form of a bull, an event that was commemorated on Euro coins. Now the continent named after her has killed the bull market.

"I wondered how Rosenberg is reacting to the news," he said.

"There's only one way to find out," I said.

At 4:45, we finally left the bar and walked over to New Court, to keep our appointment. Little did we know at the time that if we'd stayed another five minutes, we would have heard Mr. Rosenberg's public comments on the market breakdown, as he was being interviewed live on his own network from his own office there in London while we were on our way to meet him at the Rothschild compound next door.
